And where the prior decision determined the interest of the plaintiff and his codefendant and a defendant in the land, and the defendant afterwards acquired the interest of the coplaintiff in the judgment. Haggin v. Clark, 71 Cal. 444.

And where the prior judgment settled the rights of two persons to be appointed executors, and one of them died after the former appeal. Re Pacheco's Estate, 29 Cal. 224.

And where the prior appeal was by other defendants, and the same question was involved. Hunter v. Hubert (Cal.) 89 Pac. 534.

And where the prior decision was on an appeal by one of the defendants, and the other defendant was made a party to the appeal but filed a disclaimer and prosecuted the second appeal. The reversal of the judgment on the prior appeal operated upon all the parties to the record. Mason v. Burk, 120 Ind. 404.

And where the case had been remanded with instruction to render a decree, and before entry another party prosecuted a writ of error. Phelps v. Davis, 2 J. J. Marsh. 388.

And where some of the parties who did not join in the prior appeal attempted to prosecute the second appeal. Conery v. New Orleans Waterworks Co. 42 La. Ann. 441.

And where the prior appeal was by one of the defendants and the second appeal was by both of the defendants. Kansas City v. Neal, 1 Mo. App. Rep. 196.

And where the first appeal was taken by one of the parties to an action, and the second appeal was taken about nine months thereafter by another party, whose rights were dependent upon that of the prior appellant. Muggrave v. Staylor, 35 Md. 122.

An appeal by two persons was a bar to application for a mandamus compelling the trial court to grant an appeal to one of them. State v. First Dist. Court Judge, 12 Rob. (La.) 320.

1. As to matters necessarily involved.

Matters necessarily involved in the determination of a question on appeal are settled by the decision when the same are again presented on a subsequent appeal.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive on a second appeal where the question presented on the second appeal was necessarily involved in the prior decision. Hutchinson v. Chil- 34 L. R. A.

cago & N. W. R. Co. 41 Wis. 541; Downer v. Croes, 3 Wis. 371; Bangs v. Strong, 4 N. Y. 815; Headley v. Challise, 15 Kan. 602; Crockett v. Gray, 31 Kan. 346; National Park Bank v. Haas, 49 N. Y. S. R. 772; Hollowbush v. McConnell, 12 Ill. 208; Eversdon v. Mayhew, 85 Cal. 1.

And where the same questions were necessarily involved, and the conclusion declared could not have been reached without either expressly or impliedly deciding such questions. Forgeron v. Smith, 104 Ind. 246.

And where the same question must have been considered upon the prior appeal. Milbank v. Jones, 51 N. Y. S. R. 616.

And where the same questions were expressly or by necessary implication decided on the first appeal. McKinney v. State, Nixon, 117 Ind. 28.

And where the same question was involved in the former writ of error. Board of Education v. Parsons, 24 W. Va. 552.

And where the same question was involved in the prior decision, although not discussed in such decision. Joslin v. Cowee, 56 N. Y. 626.

And where the same question was necessarily passed upon in the first appeal although not adverted to in the opinion. Williams v. Rogers, 14 Bush. 776.

And where such prior decision in its meaning and effect held that payments of encumbrances should be treated as payments on the price of land, although the question did not appear to have been formally raised or considered on the former appeal, and on the second trial it was insisted that the payments should be treated as set-off. Stuart v. Heiskell, 36 Va. 191.

And where the same question was involved, and granting a new trial on one issue only excludes all other questions. Pratt v. Boston Heel & L. Co. 134 Mass. 300.

And where the same question was directly and expressly or by implication and in substance disposed of by such appeal. Camden v. Werninger, 7 W. Va. 523.

And where the legal effect of the facts in each appeal was the same although not identical. Amaden v. Atwood, 63 Vt. 322.

And where the same question was involved, it was said that the remedy for any errors must be through the legislature. Luning v. State, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 266.

And where the same question was involved, although the case was reversed upon another question. Adams v. Fisher, 75 Tex. 657.

And where the same question was involved, although a part of the former opinion was not applicable to the second decision because certain evitention now is that, notwithstanding that decision, the last clause of the section is valid, and that no action can be maintained unless the plaintiff, within six months from the date of the injury, filed in the office of the city clerk a statement of the time, place, nature, and circumstances of the injury, and the names of the witnesses. The amended petition avers that the injury was sustained January 21, 1886, and that the statement was filed July 28, or more than six months thereafter. There are averred other facts, by which it is sought to excuse the delay. This feature will be considered separately. The petition and proof both show that no statement was filed within the period required by the statute, and it is in this respect that the city claims that the petition and proof are defective.

The first opinion in the case related solely to that portion of the section providing a special period of limitations, but in the opinion the following language was used: "Questions, no doubt, will arise as to the validity of the provision requiring notice of the names of the witnesses, etc., to be given to the city council at the time the claim for damages is filed. But that matter does not properly arise in this case. While it is proper to present the names of such witnesses to the city authorities, in order that the validity of the claim may be investigated, yet it is believed that the failure to do so will not defeat a recovery, although it may affect the question of costs." While by this language there is ventured an intimation that the action would lie notwithstanding the failure to file a statement, the court expressly states that the question was not involved in the record as then presented. Since the last hearing of the case in this court it has been decided that a provision almost identical in the charter of cities of the first class having more than 25,000 inhabitants, is valid, and that the filing of the statement re-dence in the first trial was not in the second. Murphy v. Hays, 56 N. Y. S. R. 835.

And where the question was necessarily involved in the prior decision. But questions which had not been submitted and were subsequently raised may be examined on second appeal. Green v. Springfield, 180 Ill. 520.

And where the prior decision was by the supreme court on a question reserved by the superior court, and the same question was involved, or should have been presented. New Haven & N. Co. v. State, 44 Conn. 376.

g. As to matters of estoppel.

The general doctrine of estoppel applies on a subsequent appeal, where a party attacks a prior decision as to points on which his conduct of the case was the controlling element.

So, the decision on a former appeal was held conclusive in a subsequent appeal, where the questions made on the second appeal by an attempt to correct the record had been decided on the former trial as though the record was before the court. A party who presents a defective record is concluded by the decision thereon. Adams v. Horsfield, 14 Ala. 223.

And where the same question was involved, whatever might now be said of the conclusion then reached. "It does not lie in the mouth of the same party now to shift his position, and adopt a different view, and to put the circuit court in the wrong, merely because it tried the cause upon a theory which we had laid down for it, which theory was pressed upon us by the party who now complains of it." Hill v. Morris, 21 Mo. App. 256.

And where concessions were made on the former trial that controlled, even if the concessions were improperly made, by the party who afterwards questioned the same. Henry v. Quackenbush, 48 Mich. 415.

h. As to matters of jurisdiction.

The failure to raise the question of jurisdiction on or before the prior appeal will prevent a party from raising that question on a subsequent appeal. Although there is an Illinois case to the contrary, it has been in effect overruled.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive on the second appeal, where the question presented was one of jurisdiction, as such questions must have been involved in the prior appeal. Clary v. Hoagland, 6 Cal. 685.

And where the facts were the same. It was insisted that the trial court did not have jurisdiction, but that question was before the court on the prior appeal, and was necessarily determined in remanding the case. Champaign Company v. Reed, 106 Ill. 389.

And where the first appeal was upon a ruling on an instruction, and the second appeal questioned the jurisdiction which was involved in the prior case. The fact that the reversal of the case was placed on other grounds was conclusive that the supreme court first entertained the opinion that the objection to the jurisdiction of the district court was untenable. (But notwithstanding this the supreme court discussed the question of jurisdiction.) Clarke v. Lyon County, 8 Nev. 181.

And where after the term of the first decision a motion was made to admit an administrator as a party, and to change the mandate showing that the suit had abated. Whether the prior decision was right or wrong after the mandate was sent down, it was too late to question the jurisdiction of the lower court. Noonan v. Bradley, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 121, 20 L. ed. 279.

And where an attempt was made for the first time to question the jurisdiction of the court in the original suit. Whyte v. Gibbs, 61 U. S. 20 How. 542, 15 L. ed. 1018.

And where it was attempted to question the jurisdiction of the circuit court after the mandate from the supreme court. Skinner v. May, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 297, 3 L. ed. 220.

And where it was attempted to question the jurisdiction of the circuit court in the original case, which had been determined by the supreme court. Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 51 Fed. Rep. 329, 5 U. S. App. 97.

And where it was attempted on the second appeal for the first time to question the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace in the original suit. The question of jurisdiction, if available on the prior appeal, could not now be taken advantage of. Rutherford v. Lafferty, 7 Ark. 402.

But in Temple v. Anderson, 9 Ill. 548, the decision upon a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal, where the first decision was upon the question as to the sufficiency of the declaration, and the point made upon the second appeal was that the court had not jurisdiction because process was sent into another county, and the declaration did not show where the action accrued or quired is a condition precedent to maintaining the action, and must be alleged and proved. Lincoln v. Grant, 38 Neb. 369; Dayton v. Lincoln, 39 Neb. 74. In Lincoln v. Grant there was cited on behalf of the contention that the statutory provision was not mandatory the language we have quoted from the first opinion in this case; and the court in the opinion in the Grant Case observed that this language was a mere dictum, and so intended. The opinion in the Grant Case was concurred in by the author of the opinion in 23 Neb.; so it is manifest that the court did not in the latter opinion undertake to decide the question. So far as any express decision or actual consideration of the question is concerned, it has never arisen in this case, and, following the decision in Lincoln v. Grant, the question must be solved in favor of the contention of the city, unless by implication it has formerly been otherwise resolved in this case, and unless, further, the court is bound by such implied decision so far as this case is concerned, notwithstanding its deliberate judgment to the contrary in the Grant Case. The defendant in error contends that there has been such an implied decision, and that this court is so bound. To this contention counsel address an argument of great technical force, supported by very respectable authority. Referring to the decision in 23 Neb., it will be remembered that the case was there presented to reverse the overruling of a demurrer to the answer. It is a familiar rule of pleading, repeatedly enforced by this court, that a demurrer brings up for review not only the pleading demurred to, but all prior pleadings, and judgment on the demurrer must go against that party who is guilty of the first defect. Bennet v. Hargus, 1 Neb. 419; Hower v. Aultman, 27 Neb. 251. Regarding this rule, it is therefore clear that the city on the first hearing could have invoked the aid of that clause of the statute we are now considering the residence of the parties, and the plaintiff in error in the last case had not waived his privilege.

The case of Semple v. Anderson, supra, was cited and approved in Orle v. Turpin, 3 Ill. App. 453, to the effect that a court will not go behind its former adjudication even though it shall appear upon the record that the court acted without jurisdiction; but this was not the decision of the court in the Semple Case, and was the discussion of the decisions in cases quoted, and the contrary was directly decided in the case of Semple v. Anderson.

In Kenney v. Greer, 13 Ill. 432, 54 Am. Dec. 439, the rule was laid down that the jurisdiction of the superior court will be presumed, and to this extent Semple v. Anderson, supra, and a large number of prior cases in Illinois to the contrary, were overruled. The effect of this would be that a plea to the jurisdiction should be made in order to raise the question.

1. As to defective appeals.

A decision under a prior appeal, which is ineffectual owing to technicalities, as defective record, not taken in time, or failure to assign error and the like, has been held conclusive upon the same matter disposed of in that appeal.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive on the second appeal where the prior decision affirmed the judgment of the trial court for failure to serve copies of the case and points. The proper mode in the second appeal was to object to the court considering questions that might have been raised on the first appeal. Schleuder v. Corey, 30 Minn. 501.

And where an order striking out an answer as sham was affirmed for failure of the appellants to serve printed copies of the return, assignments of error and brief, and judgment for plaintiff having been entered the defendants appealed from that judgment. Maxwell v. Schwartz, 55 Minn. 414.

And where the first appeal affirmed a case for want of assignment of error and on the second appeal the evidence would have entitled to a different result, but it was held that the affirmance precluded any other decision. Miller v. Bernecker, 46 Mo. 194.

And where there was no assignment of errors going to the rulings of the chancellor, although Ala. Code, § 683, provided that the supreme court in deciding the case, when there is a conflict between its existing opinion and any former rulings 34 L. R. A.

in the case, must be governed by what in its opinion at that time is law, without regard to such former ruling. National Commercial Bank v. McDonnell, 32 Ala. 387.

And so where the first appeal was from a final decree, which was affirmed, and the second appeal was from subsequent proceedings, but more than twelve months from the rendition of the decree. Ala. Code, § 683 a, providing that a prior appeal shall not be binding in case of error, does not apply to such a case. Stoudenmire v. De Bardelaben, 85 Ala. 85.

And where the supreme court had decided otherwise, since the prior decision and the pleadings on the second appeal did not squarely present the question for decision. Stevenson v. Edwards, 96 Mo. 622.

See also Schleuder v. Corey, 30 Minn. 501, subd. n.

1. As to cross-appeals.

A decision upon a prior appeal is conclusive, where a subsequent appeal is taken on cross-appeal, if the prior decision disposes of the question presented on the cross-appeal.

So, the decision on a prior appeal was conclusive on a second appeal where the question on the second appeal should have been presented by cross-appeal at the first decision. The supreme court will not try a case by instalments. Still v. Anderson, 63 Miss. 545.

And where the defendant appealed in the first case, and the second appeal was by the plaintiff below, who should have prosecuted a cross-appeal on the first appeal. He cannot resist an appeal and obtain an affirmance of his decree and thereafter prosecute an appeal from a portion of the decree which he insisted should be affirmed. Caston v. Caston, 54 Miss. 512.

And where a bill for an injunction for infringement of a patent was answered on two grounds, first that the complainant was not the inventor, and, second, that respondent used the machine under a license. The court below sustained the last defense and entered a decree dismissing the bill, and the complainant appealed, and the case was reversed, and the defendant thereafter appealed for failure to sustain the first defense; but this objection was made on the first appeal and was considered by the court, although not a part of the first decree. Corning v. Troy Iron & N. Factory Co., 56 U. S. 15 How. 451, 14 L. ed. 768.

And where the defendant filed no cross bill of exceptions against the allowance of an amendment of the declaration, and a judgment granting a new trial to the defendant was affirmed on the prior appeal, and on the second trial the verdict was for against the demurrer to its answer, and that a decision on the lines of the Grant Case would have resulted in the affirmance of the judgment on the ground that the petition was defective for not pleading a compliance with the last clause of the section. It may then be fairly said that the court, by sustaining the demurrer to the answer, impliedly held that the petition did state a cause of action, and that it was therefore not necessary to plead, and consequently not necessary to prove, a compliance with the provision we are considering. So, again, on each of the other occasions when the case was before this court, similar considerations would have led to the affirmance of the judgments in favor of the city on the ground that, notwithstanding any of the errors which in fact led to a reversal, the judgment was the only one which could have been rendered under the pleadings and proof. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff in error has quite clearly established the proposition that the question under consideration, had it been presented, would have controlled any of the former decisions; and that the court may be said to have already three times impliedly decided the question now before us in favor of Foxworthy, although on no occasion was that question in fact considered or actually decided.

The argument having advanced thus far, the defendant in error invokes the application of a rule, which has been frequently announced by appellate courts, that a ruling once made in a case by an appellate court, while it may be overruled in other cases, is binding both upon the inferior court and upon the appellate court itself in all subsequent proceedings in the original case, and that in such subsequent proceedings neither the lower court nor the court making the ruling can depart from such ruling.

plaintiff, and the questions presented on the second appeal were as to the allowance of the amendment of the declaration. Story v. Brown (Ga.) 25 S. E. 562.

And where the bill was amended on remanding, but the questions presented were the same, and the attorney general was made a party defendant, who prosecuted a cross-appeal from the second decree. On remanding the case on the first appeal the court should have dismissed the bill in conformity with the prior decision. Newberry v. Blatchford, 106 Ill. 564.

And where the questions settled were the same, it was said that the court had neither the power nor the inclination to review its former decision, as this could only be obtained on a petition for a rehearing. A party cannot by filing a cross bill after a prior decision obtain a reconsideration of the same question that he made in his answer and which was decided on the first appeal. Norton v. Moshier, 114 Ill. 146.

But the decision on a prior appeal was not conclusive on the second appeal where the case was reversed upon cross-error and the appellant assigned upon the second appeal the same errors assigned upon the first appeal, and which were not passed upon in the prior decision, even though he waived them by failure to argue them on the first appeal, and there was no decision upon the merits. Cook v. Moulton, 64 Ill. App. 429.

And where the plaintiff failed to take a cross-appeal on the first appeal, and his amended petition was rejected, and he obtained a judgment, and on the second trial the amended petition was refused and the judgment was for the defendant, and the amended petition was not passed upon in the first appeal. Smith v. Bogenschultz, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 307.

And where the prior judgment in the court below was in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed upon the judgment roll without any bill of exceptions, and after remanding, the judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs, and the defendant prosecuted a second appeal with a bill of exceptions, as Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 960, required the appellant from the judgment only to bring up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions or statement in the case upon which he relies; hence the respondent was precluded upon the prior appeal from having any consideration by the court of errors, which, if the judgment had been adverse to him, might have been sufficient for a reversal. Even though a bill of exceptions containing these errors had been settled, it would not be considered by this court upon an appeal from a judgment in his favor. Klauber v. San Diego Street-Car Co. 98 Cal. 105.

K. Where prior decision is not final.

A decision that is not intended to be final has been regarded as not concluding the parties on a subsequent appeal. But in Maryland, on remanding without reversing or affirming, an opinion expressed on points made before the court was held conclusive on final proceedings.

So, the decision on a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal, where the former decision simply remanded the case for another trial. The opinion or reasoning of the judgment in such a case was no part of it, and the judgment itself was not final between the parties and not conclusive. White v. Downs, 40 Tex. 225.

And where the prior decision was a judgment of the Illinois appellate court, reversing a judgment of the lower court and remanding a cause, and was not final, and the subsequent appeal was from a later judgment of the superior court to the supreme court, as no appeal could be taken from the former judgment. Chicago Bd. of Trade v. Nelson, 162 Ill. 431.

And where the question of damages was not passed upon by the supreme court in reversing a judgment for the recovery of possession of land. Busby v. Mitchell, 29 S. C. 447.

And where the defendant on the first appeal in a criminal case obtained a "reversal" because the crime charged was not sustained by the record, and on the reversal the court discharged the defendant on his motion, and the state prosecuted a writ of error from such ruling. The reversal in effect only granted the defendant a new trial. State v. Newkirk, 49 Mo. 472.

And where the prior decision simply reversed the judgment for reasons therein stated, as on a new trial different questions might be presented. "We are no more bound by that opinion of the court as to the law laid down than in any other case, between other and different parties. The rule in a chancery case would be different, where the decree made could settle the rights of the parties upon the facts of the record." Bynum v. Apperson, 9 Helak. 632.

And where the first appeal from an order denying a new trial was dismissed and the second appeal was from a judgment entered on the verdict, and the question might have been, but was not raised on the prior appeal. The abandonment of plaintiff's appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial did not prevent the plaintiff from raising any question on appeal from the judgment, which he could have raised had the first appeal

A ruling so made is said to become "the law of the case." As a preliminary to the discussion of the application of the rule to this case, it may be well to review the former decisions of this court, and ascertain to what extent it has committed itself to the doctrine contended for. In Hiett v. Brooks, 17 Neb. 83, the court stated the rule in the syllabus as follows: "A previous ruling by the appellate court upon a point distinctly made may be only authority in other cases to be followed or affirmed, or to be modified or overruled, according to its intrinsic merits, but in the case in which it is made it is more than authority; it is a final adjudication, from the consequences of which the court cannot depart, nor the parties relieve themselves." The opinion contains no discussions of the rule, but only a statement that the court would adhere to the views expressed in the former opinion, followed by the statement that it would be inadmissible to review the grounds of such opinion, now that the trial court has obeyed the order before made, with the result logically following. No authorities are cited in the opinion, but the statement of the rule in the syllabus is followed by a citation of "Phelan v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 45, quoted in Wells' Res Adjudicata." From this method of citation it would seem probable that the court had not consulted the decision cited, but only the text-book; and from the summary method on which the opinion disposed of the question it is evident that it was not one considered very important to the disposition of the case. In O'Donohue v. Hendrix, 17 Neb. 287, the case had already been before the court, and this language was used in the opinion: "The first and third objections were considered on the former hearing, and decided against the plaintiff. No motion for a rehearing was filed, nor was any objection made to the decision of the court. Those questions, therefore, never been taken. Had the order been affirmed on the merits or under the rules of court all questions that might have been raised would be conclusive. But a dismissal of the appeal did not have this effect. Adamson v. Sundby, 51 Minn. 460.

And where the prior appeals were from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a complaint, and another from an order granting a new trial after a judgment of nonsuit, and the third was only from an order denying a new trial. The court on the last appeal was limited to a consideration of a review of the action of the court upon the ground upon which the new trial was held. The court said: "Nor are we required upon this appeal to determine what is the law of the case, as established by the opinions upon the former appeals, or whether the allegations of the complaint were sustained by the evidence offered at the trial, as neither of these questions has any relevancy in determining whether the court committed error in admitting or excluding evidence, or made its findings of fact without sufficient evidence to support them." Wheeler v. Bolton, 22 Cal. 159.

And where the questions presented on the second appeal might have been made upon the prior appeal under Cal. Penal Code, § 1237, providing for an appeal from a judgment and from an order denying a new trial, and the former appeal was from a judgment alleging errors in instructions, and the second appeal was from an order denying a new trial. The true rule is that the defendant may prosecute both appeals, but can have but one decision of the same point, and in this case the questions now raised as to instructions were not presented on the prior appeal from the judgment. People v. Thompson (Cal.) 46 Pac. 912.

And where two appeals were allowed by law in the same case, one from the judgment and the other from the order denying a new trial; and the fact that the rule of law was declared in deciding the appeal first reached for decision, and upon which no action could be taken until the second appeal was disposed of, did not prevent the court from deciding the second appeal, and modifying or wholly changing its former decision. Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633.

And where, on the prior appeal, the supreme court affirmed an order granting a new trial, which was granted on the ground that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence. Moore v. Murdock, 26 Cal. 514.

In Mahan v. Wood, 44 Cal. 462, the supreme court held that a note sued upon was void for want of consideration, and reversed the judgment and remanded the case for a new trial. On a retrial the lower court granted a new trial (evidently after a trial and findings in favor of the defendant), and an appeal was taken from the order granting a new trial. On the second appeal, in 79 Cal. 258, it was affirmed and held that although principles decided on a prior appeal were conclusive on a second appeal, and the evidence was the same on both appeals, yet, as there were no findings of fact on the second appeal, they having been set aside, the parties had a right to a judgment of the trial court upon conflicting evidence as to the facts. The supreme court could not say what the facts were without usurping the functions of the trial court.

And where the mandate was but the expression of the opinion of the court upon the case as then presented, and how it must be ultimately determined if no supervenient facts should be brought on to the record, and was not intended to be absolute and conclusive. Filint v. Johnson, 59 Vt. 190.

But the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon a second appeal where the cause was remanded without reversing or affirming, and the court of appeals expressed an opinion on points made before that tribunal, or which was presented by the record, as this controlled subsequent proceedings. Dennis v. Dennis, 15 Md. 73.

See Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649, subd. m; Ryan v. Tomlinson, 39 Cal. 639; Johnson v. Bailey, 17 Colo. 59; Kimball v. Semple, 25 Cal. 455, subd. r.

I. As to matters of pleading.

It is generally held that a prior decision is conclusive upon a second appeal, where such decision settles a principle of law upon a pleading, although it may arise in a different manner subsequently in the case; and this has been applied to a dismissal of a complaint, or a refusal to dismiss the same, or the sufficiency of the complaint, or where pleadings are similar, or where the amendments are not supported by evidence. On the question of demurrer the majority of the cases hold that a decision on demurrer becomes the law of the case where the same question subsequently arises, although it may be presented in a different form. To this there are some exceptions, one in Vermont, but changed since by statute, and one in Tennessee, where the decision did not show the precise ground for the ruling. On the question as to the effect of a decision of the prior appeal on instructions, and a second appeal by the opposite party as against the plaintiff's pleadings, there is some conflict.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal, where the prior decision directed the complaint to be dismissed with costs. Mellen v. Mellen, 47 N. Y. S. R. 980.

And where the prior decision held that a com-will not now be again considered. Hiatt v. Brooks, 17 Neb. 38." In Leighton v. Stuart, 19 Neb. 546, a quotation is made from the former opinion in the same case, followed by this language: "In Hiatt v. Brooks, 17 Neb. 38, it was held, and I think correctly, that," etc. (quoting the syllabus in Hiatt v. Brooks). The court then adds that there is no doubt, independent of this principle, that the conclusions of law already arrived at were correct. The rule in Hiatt v. Brooks was invoked in support of the decision of questions of fact in Lane v. Starkey, 20 Neb. 546, and the court there held that the rule must be applied only to the decision of legal principles, but that it did not require the following of former decisions on questions of fact. In Marion v. State, 20 Neb. 238, 57 Am. Rep. 825, there is no reference to the doctrine in the syllabus, but certain conclusions reached on a former appeal of the case were adhered to, the following being the only reference to the subject in the opinion: "We adhere to our former holdings upon this part of the case, both upon the ground that we believe them to be correct, and for the further reason that, having been so decided in this case on its previous hearing, . . . it has become the law of the case;" citing Hiatt v. Brooks and Leighton v. Stuart. In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hull, 24 Neb. 740, the language of the syllabus in Hiatt v. Brooks is quoted in the syllabus. In the opinion the following is the only language addressed to the subject: "This point was distinctly presented in this case when it was first before this court, and distinctly decided. Under the well-known rule of stare decisis, that decision remains the law of this case." It may be here remarked, that in Hiatt v. Brooks the court refers to the principle of res judicata, while in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hull it is referred to the doctrine of stare decisis. In Meyer v. Shamp, 26-

And where the prior decision held that a petition for an order of sale of real estate stated a cause of action, and that a nonsuit should not have been allowed. Re Couts's Estate, 100 Cal. 400.

And where the question on the prior appeal was as to the sufficiency of the complaint, and that evidence should have been admitted, and the same question was presented on the second appeal. Tanderup v. Hansen (S. D.) 68 N. W. 1073.

And where the pleadings remained unchanged, and the same question was presented. Auburn Opera-House & P. Assn. v. Hill (Cal.) 45 Pac. 645.

And where the question was upon the pleading, and upon the second trial the pleading was substantially the same. Roundtree v. Turner, 38 Ala. 555.

And where the pleading was the same, which was held on the prior appeal to be insufficient. Lincoln v. Ragsdale, 9 Ind. App. 555.

And where the first decision held that an action was barred by limitation and the complaint was not amended on the second trial. Taylor v. McLain, 64 Cal. 518.

And where the second trial was substantially the same without any change in the pleadings, and the majority of the court on the second appeal regarded the question as conclusively settled. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Smith (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 937.

And where the prior decision was on the merits, and the amendment to the complaint stated no new facts. Baker v. Brickell, 102 Cal. 620.

And where the former suit was against a justice of the peace carelessly entering judgment against a party, and the second appeal was on an amended complaint charging fraud. Kress v. State, Wagoner, 65 Ind. 106.

And where the complaint had been amended so 34 L. R. A.

as to present the question of estoppel, the court saying: "We adhere to our former decision, and hold that there is no estoppel." Excelsior Brick Co. v. Haverstraw, 50 N. Y. S. R. 518.

And where the facts were the same, and the amended pleadings were not sustained by additional evidence. Wilkinson v. Merrill, 56 Cal. 550.

And where the same question was presented. But new matter presented by amended pleadings may be examined. McDonald v. Green, 9 Smedes & M. 138.

The decision on a prior appeal was conclusive on the subsequent appeal where the prior decision was on a demurrer and presented the same question. Star Wagon Co. v. Swezy, 63 Iowa, 620; Ellis v. Northern P. R. Co. 80 Wis. 459.

And where the prior decision was upon the sufficiency of the complaint on demurrer, which decision became the law of the case in all subsequent proceedings. *Bartholomew County Comrs. v. And where the first decision was on a demurrer to a bill and the question presented on the second appeal on bill, answer, and evidence did not substantially change the case. If the case was an original one it might be different. Bane v. Wick, 6 Ohio St. 13.

And where the prior decision was a final judgment upon a demurrer to a bill, and a subsequent bill was filed presenting the same question. Smith v. Horneby, 70 Ga. 553.

And where the amendment did not materially change the question, and the prior decision was on a demurrer to a complaint. New Pittsburgh Coal & C. Co. v. Peterson, 14 Ind. App. 634.

And where the first decision was on a demurrer to a bill, and construed a will, and on remanding the case an answer was filed relying on a decree of another state where the testator was domiciled at the time of his death, and which decree was the reverse of the decision on prior appeal. But the plea did not show that a partition had taken place and title to the property had been perfected under the foreign decree. Bridgeforth v. Gray, 39 Miss. 136.

And where the same question was presented in regard to the construction of a will, and the prior decision was on the same complaint on demurrer. But as to any new question not considered or decided the same was open. Brown v. Critchell, 110 Ind. 31.

And where the prior decision was on demurrer for insufficiency of the complaint, and the second appeal was from a ruling on the motion for a new

Neb. 739, the rule is stated in the syllabus as follows: "A judgment or ruling of this court in a case or point distinctly and finally made will be held to be the law of the case in which made, throughout its course of litigation, without regard to the number of times it may be brought before the court, or to the intrinsic merits of such judgment or ruling." The court refers to Hiatt v. Brooks and several of the cases we have already cited, and says that the rule there stated "is believed to be the law."

The foregoing comprises, we believe, all that has ever been said by this court on the subject. Of these decisions we have the following observations to make: In the first place, in each case, either by the language employed or by the adoption by citation of the language in Hiatt v. Brooks, the rule was limited to rulings formerly made on points distinctly presented for decision. Inasmuch as the plaintiff in error here, as we have seen, can invoke only an implied decision, and not one on any point distinctly made on the former hearings, we do not think that any of the cases cited by its terms controls this case. A further observation is that, notwithstanding the repeated statements of the rule, there has never been in any case a discussion of its correctness, or a reason advanced for its application. In the third place, it twice, at least, appears from the opinions that, notwithstanding the rule, the court had reconsidered the questions presented by the former appeal, and believed the former ruling to be correct; and in no case has any doubt been expressed as to the correctness of the former decision. In other words, the court has never yet been confronted with the problem which we are now facing,—that of overruling a former decision in the same case, or else abiding by it, because of the doctrine stated, although such former ruling was manifestly wrong, and opposed to the later decitrial, and the complaint was again questioned on error assigned. Armstrong v. Harshman, 93 Ind. 37.

And where the prior decision was on demurrer to the petition, and the question on the second appeal was on a motion on arrest of judgment on the same ground. Haridan v. Central Iowa R. Co. 69 Iowa, 327.

And where the questions settled were the same, and this rule prevailed although the questions raised in the subsequent proceedings were made in a different way by excepting to the conclusion of facts, and the prior decision was on a demurrer to complaint. Braden v. Graves, 85 Ind. 82.

And where the prior decision was on a demurrer, and the judgment could not have been reached without expressly or impliedly deciding the question presented on the second appeal. Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 458.

And where the prior decision was on a demurrer to a declaration, as this must of necessity have construed the contract upon which the action was brought. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Mills, 91 Va. 612.

And where the prior decision was upon a demurrer, and involved the same question of the statute of limitations. Clay Dist. Twp. v. Buchanan Independent Dist. 69 Iowa, 58.

And where the prior decision was on a demurrer to a pleading, and the second decision was in regard to evidence involved in the demurrer. Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Pleasant Twp. 53 Fed. Rep. 214; Merrill v. Merrill, 102 Cal. 817.

And where the prior decision on demurrer held that an answer presented a valid defense, and the court below on the second trial erroneously refused evidence tending to sustain the same. Ferry v. Hammond, 50 Cal. 22.

And where the prior appeal was from a judgment sustaining a demurrer, and the second appeal was from a judgment on the merits involving the same question. Brown v. Pontiac Min. Co. (Mich.) 3 Det. L. N. 212.

And where the prior decision was on a demurrer to a complaint, and was made by a divided court. Lathrop v. Knapp, 37 Wis. 307.

And where the former decision was on a demurrer to a complaint, and this was the rule whether the prior decision was sound or unsound. Oshkosh Fire Dept. v. Tuttle, 50 Wis. 552.

And where the prior ruling was upon a demurrer. The court said: "This court has held that it is not absolutely bound by its former adjudication, though rendered upon a previous appeal in the same case; but it is expressly decided that only in exceptional cases will a former ruling be departed from, upon the same question, when presented a second time in the same case." Bomar v. Parker, 68 Tex. 435.

And where the first decision was upon a demurrer to a declaration to set aside a judgment for want of notice, and the point made upon the second appeal was that the judgment could not be set aside as it was founded on a just demand. The declaration having been held sufficient without regard to the justice of the demand, that question could not be made on the second trial. Sawyer v. Cross, 68 Vt. 616.

In Hazen v. Smith, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 59, the decision upon a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal, where the first decision was the review of the cause decided upon a demurrer. "The case of the review of a judgment rendered on an issue at law cannot compare with a writ of error brought to reconsider a bench decision, as a review supposes the cause not to have been sufficiently investigated." The declaration was held insufficient on the first hearing and was held good on the second. This case was not referred to in Sawyer v. Cross, supra.

In Herriek v. Belknap's Estate, 27 Vt. 699, the case of Hazen v. Smith, supra, was referred to, and distinguished on the ground that under the former practice in this court, before the right of review was taken away, the party upon review in this court was allowed, as a matter of right, to reargue the same question of law if he chose; but since 1825, when reviews in this court were abolished, every decision of a question of law is conclusive upon a particular case.

The decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal, where the prior decision overruled a demurrer to a bill of complaint, and approved an award made by the court of arbitration, and made a final decree upon the question of estoppel, and the same question was afterwards made by excepting to a referee's report. Grommes v. Theime, 13 Lea, 320.

And where the decree upon the prior appeal overruled a demurrer to a bill, and the question presented on the second appeal from an order dismissing the bill was involved and disposed of in the decision on the prior appeal, and the question had become res judicata. McNairy v. Nashville, 2 Baxt. 251. But see Battle v. Street, infra.

And where the prior decision was upon a demurrer to a bill, and Tennessee special statute provided for appeals from decrees overruling demurrers, and the object of such an appeal was to obtain a final adjudication of the question raised by the demurrer, and such a decree was final and raised the question of jurisdiction which was insions of the court. Had the court on former occasions entertained any doubt of the correctness of the ruling on the first appeal, it can hardly be that such doubt would have been thrust aside without a consideration of the reason for the rule requiring it to be thrust aside, and the statement of some reason in support of such a rule. In a sense, therefore, all the statements which we have quoted may be said to be obiter, and we feel not only at liberty, but required, now, when the application of the rule for the first time would demand adherence to a decision manifestly wrong, to carefully examine the subject, even though such examination may lead to a modification of a rule of practice which has obtained for many years.

In this discussion, before examining the question upon principle, we shall endeavor to examine it in the light of the authorities, and ascertain how the doctrine arose, and to what extent it has received the support of other courts. In Hiatt v. Brooks it was expressly adopted from Phelan v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 45, and in all subsequent cases it has been based solely upon the authority of Hiatt v. Brooks. It may be said, then, that we have adopted the doctrine from California, and we shall look first at the decisions of that state. The case in which we first find the rule announced in California is that of Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 374. It would seem from the report that the case had once before been before the supreme court, but we have been unable to find the first decision reported. The action was one for rent, to which it was pleaded that the landlord had re-entered before the expiration of the lease, and relet the premises to another. The court says that it before held that the re entry and reletting discharged involved in that decision. Jameson v. McCoy, 5 Helsk. 108.

But in Battle v. Street, 85 Tenn. 282, it was held that a decision on a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal, where the prior decision in general terms simply overruled a demurrer and remanded the case for further proceedings without filing an opinion, and the decision did not show the precise ground for the ruling. Such a decree adjudicated only that there was sufficient equity upon the face of the bill to require an answer; citing on the last proposition Rodgers v. Dibrell, 6 Lea, 69, and Kirkpatrick v. Utley, 14 Lea, 97, and saying: "In so far as these cases differ from the earlier cases of McNairy v. Nashville, and Jameson v. McCoy, supra, they necessarily modify the earlier opinions."

In Collins v. North British & M. Ins. Co. 91 Tenn. 422, it was held that a prior decision upon a demurrer to a bill of complaint on an insurance policy, holding that the action was barred by limitation, was conclusive upon a subsequent appeal upon an answer raising the same question as to the bar of limitation. This case does not refer to the prior decisions, and may be regarded as establishing the rule in Tennessee that upon a subsequent pleading a prior decision upon a demurrer on the same question would be conclusive.

The decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal where the same question was involved in that decision and on the second appeal the question was as to the sufficiency of the declaration, and the first appeal was by the plaintiffs below and the judgment was reversed for erroneous instructions, and they could not have been injured by erroneous instructions if the declaration would not have justified a recovery. Great Western R. Co. v. Hawkins, 18 Mich. 427.

And where the same question was presented, but the court on second appeal passed on the sufficiency of the plaintiff's petition, although the former appeal reversed the judgment because of an erroneous instruction on the merits. Senate v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 223.

And where the question as to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's statement in the second appeal was necessarily involved on the rulings on instructions in the first appeal. Forester v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 26 Mo. App. 123.

And where the same question was presented. It was conceded that the former appeal was not conclusive on the question of capacity of plaintiff to sue where the first decision was reversed for error in instructions, and the point decided was whether a common carrier carried goods under a special or general contract. Hance v. Wabash & W. R. Co. 63 Mo. App. 60.

But the decision on a prior appeal was not conclusive on a second appeal where the question in the first appeal was as to ruling on the instructions, and the question on the second appeal was as to the sufficiency of the petition, and a ruling upon the petition had not been asked on the prior hearing. Lampert v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 14 Mo. App. 376.

And where the judgment was reversed on prior appeal with directions to the lower court to sustain a demurrer to the complaint, and on the second appeal matters of estoppel were added to the complaint by amendment, although such matters were set up in the answers before the first appeal but the evidence given on the first trial was not before the court on that appeal. Cluggish v. Koons (Ind. App.) 43 N. E. 158.

And where the points presented on the prior appeal were not the same, and the decision on appeal did not conclusively determine incidental or collateral questions, and the decision upon the sufficiency of the complaint would not determine subsequent questions on evidence unless substantially the same. Union School Twp. v. First Nat. Bank, 102 Ind. 464.

As to demurrer, see Linton Coal & M. Co. v. Persons (Ind.) 43 N. E. 651, subd. b; Wheeler v. Bolton, 22 Cal. 159, subd. k; Rinard v. West, 22 Ind. 359, subd. n.

As to pleading, see Gwinn v. Hamilton, 76 Cal. 265, subd. q.

m. As to injunctions and interlocutory orders.

In regard to injunctions and interlocutory orders, where the decision upon a prior appeal is on the same facts as those presented on the second appeal, or where the decision on the first appeal is a final decree, the same is conclusive. But where new facts are shown or new questions presented, the same is not conclusive.

So, the decision upon a former appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal, where an interlocutory order was affirmed and the transcript was the same on the second appeal except the addition of final judgment in accordance with the decision. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Alsbrook, 110 N. C. 437.

And where the former decision held that a complaint did not entitle an injunction granted upon the complaint alone, and the second judgment was rendered on the trial of the case of the same complaint. Moulton v. Knapp, 28 Cal. 444.

And where the second decision was rendered on a bill and answer, and the former appeal was from an interlocutory decree dissolving the injunction on the answer, and the record on the second appeal presented no material fact or question not consid-

the tenant from his covenant, with the exception that the landlord was still entitled to recover any rent which had accrued at the time of the re-entry. Then follows this remarkable language: "The latter portion of that decision is in abrogation of one of the plainest principles of law, and, if this case was a new one, I would not hesitate to overrule it; but legal rules deprive us of the power to do so. The decision having been made in this case, it has become the law of the case, and is not now the subject of revision." The sole authority cited in support of this radical statement is Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 418, 11 L. ed. 658, a case which we shall show hereafter is not in point, and depends upon entirely different principles, which the California court, as well as others, seems to have overlooked. Hardly less remarkable than the language here used is the fact that it was manifestly obiter. The jury had found a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of the rent claimed. Under the instructions, this involved a finding that there had been no re-entry; so it was entirely immaterial to the decision of the case whether in case of a re-entry, recovery could be had for rent accrued to that time. But behold to what length a too rigid adherence to the doctrine of stare decisis may lead us! In Clary v. Hongland, 6 Cal. 695, the action was one of forcible entry, and had begun in the county court, where judgment had gone in favor of the plaintiff. The supreme court reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause for a new trial. The case was again presented to the supreme court on certiorari to review proceedings wherein the county court had, by mandamus, commanded its clerk to issue a writ on the original judgment. A motion to dismiss the writ was denied, and a rehearing was allowed on the question as to whether the former judgment was conclusive on the parties, ered on the first appeal. Maulden v. Armistead, 30 Ala. 480.

And where the prior decision held that the complaint was insufficient and did not sustain the judgment, and the second appeal was from an order denying a motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction upon the complaint, which was not amended. Pister v. Wade, 50 Cal. 273.

And where the first appeal was on an interlocutory order. If the party failed to complain of error in the decree, he would be excluded from assailing the same, and Va. act June 28, 1870, amending Code, chap. 182, § 23, providing that the appellate court shall affirm or reverse a judgment decree or order, does not authorize any interference with the decree rendered upon the former appeal. Every decree of this court is a final decree so far as the principles of that case are concerned, even though it be on an appeal from an interlocutory order. Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649.

And where the same question was involved, although it was admitted that the general rule was that a decision upon an order as to an injunction was not decisive upon the final hearing; but on the prior appeal from an order continuing an injunction there were no disputed facts, and the question involved was the constitutionality of the validity of an act, and the second decision on that question could not be different without overruling the prior decision. Rogers v. Rochester, H. & P. C. R. Co. 21 Hun, 44.

But in Trinity County v. McCombs, 25 Cal. 117, it was said that the decision on an appeal would not be conclusive upon a second appeal, where the first appeal was taken from an order refusing to dissolve a preliminary injunction and the order was reversed, if on the second appeal a new state of facts should be shown.

And where the former decision was upon an order granting a temporary injunction to restrain the collection of a judgment, and such decision determined nothing as to the merits of the case, and only held that the complaint assuming its allegations to be true in point of fact was sufficient to support the injunction, and on the trial of the case judgment was rendered for the defendant. Beaudry v. Felch, 47 Cal. 183.

As to questions which might have been made on prior appeal.

As to questions which should have been presented on the prior appeal, or which should have been made on the prior trial of the case before it was presented on the prior appeal, the decision then made is conclusive. But in Missouri and Indiana there is some conflict of the cases, and in the latter 34 L. R. A.

state the rule is now that the law of the case is limited to the point expressly decided.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal where the same question presented should have been urged on the prior appeal. Gray v. Dickinson, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 990; Davis v. McCorkle, 14 Bush. 746; Brasfield v. Baugh, 7 J. J. Marsh. 830; Bassett v. Shepardson, 57 Mich. 428; Richardson v. Richardson, 100 Mich. 354; Malmgren v. Phinney (Minn.) 67 N. W. 649; Mason v. Mason, 5 Bush. 187; Tilleny v. Wolverton, 54 Minn. 75; State v. Speaks, 95 N. C. 689; Findlay v. Trigg, 88 Va. 539; Effinger v. Kenney, 79 Va. 551; Dennis v. Kass, 18 Wash. 137; Pearce v. Germania Ins. Co. ("The Lady Pike"), 96 U. S. 461, 24 L. ed. 672; Roby v. Calumet & C. Canal & D. Co. 154 Ill. 190; Pitkin v. Shacklett, 117 Mo. 547.

And where the question presented existed on the record in the appeal, and could have been considered if presented. Pollock v. Cohen, 32 Ohio St. 519.

And where the errors assigned upon the second appeal should have been presented and were necessarily involved on the first appeal. Warren v. Raymond, 17 S. C. 163; Wolverton v. George H. Taylor & Co. 167 Ill. 485.

And where the questions presented on the second trial might have been and should have been presented on the prior appeal before a decree was made which was absolute. The Santa Maria, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 442, 6 L. ed. 361.

And where the only question in the case was as to a rate of interest. Questions that should have been made by exceptions to previous rulings could not thereafter be made. Ellis v. Sanders, 34 S. C. 238.

And where on the prior trial the question was tried on the issue of usury, and on the second appeal the question was made of tender, which was inconsistent with the order remanding on the first trial, and should have been made on the first appeal. Doyle v. Sanford, 26 Ill. App. 155.

And where the question of jurisdiction might have been raised when the case was before the court upon the first writ of error. Magwire v. Tyler ("Tyler v. Magwire"), 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 282, 21 L. ed. 583; Dilworth v. Curtis, 139 Ill. 508; Affirming Phelps v. Curtis, 38 Ill. App. 93.

And where the appellant failed to raise the question of jurisdiction of the trial court until the second appeal, and then to have sustained the question would have barred all claim by reason of limitation. Boone v. Shackelford, 64 Mo. 497.

And where the prior decision affirmed, by a divided court, the judgment of the court below, and it was insisted on the second appeal that the su-the supreme court having in the meantime determined that in such case the district court had no appellate jurisdiction, and the case having been first brought to the supreme court through the district court by an attempted appeal. Here, it will be observed, the court was called upon to say whether or not in subsequent proceedings in a case the parties and the court were bound by a decision announced in an appeal over which the supreme court had no jurisdiction. The court again cited Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, and carried the doctrine of Dewey v. Gray to its logical conclusion, holding that, although it had no jurisdiction in such cases, still, having in this particular case entertained jurisdiction, the parties were bound by the result. Not only this, the question of jurisdiction was not raised on the former hearing, but the court said that it must always be implied that a court at the very first decides the question of its jurisdiction, and, having entertained the case on its merits, the question of jurisdiction must be considered as having been decided, although not in fact raised or considered. In Davidson v. Dallas, 15 Cal. 75, the doctrine was again stated very nearly in the language in which it appears in some of the Nebraska cases. Dewey v. Gray is quoted at length, and, in addition thereto, there are cited Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart and several other cases in the supreme court of the United States. Also Hosack v. Rogers, 25 Wend. 318; Stiver v. Stiver, 3 Ohio, 19; Booth v. Com. 7 Met. 286, and Russell v. La Roque, 18 Ala. 151. Only one of these cases, we shall undertake to show, was in point. The case we are considering is, however, noteworthy as being one of a very few cases in which the court has attempted to give a reason for such a rule of law, and the reason given is that, after a mandate, the appellate court loses jurisdiction over the case, and that questions decided preme court had not jurisdiction on the first appeal, as it was discovered that the appeal was from an interlocutory order, and not a final decree. The question should have been made on the first appeal. Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 413, 11 L. ed. 658.

In Fowler v. Bishop, 32 Conn. 199, where the question had been reserved by the superior court and decided by the supreme court at a prior hearing and came up on error again, the supreme court said that on all questions that could have been presented on the prior hearing the defendant should be concluded. But the court then proceeded to discuss the question of jurisdiction of the superior court and of the supreme court, which was really involved on the prior hearing.

The decision on a prior appeal was conclusive upon a second appeal where the first decision held that evidence of a mortgage on property before the assignment of a policy should have been admitted, and on second trial it was contended that it should not have been admitted because the assignment was with the assent of the company. This question should have been made before. But the court discussed the question as though it was not res judicata. Ellis v. State Ins. Co. 68 Iowa, 578-56 Am. Rep. 865.

And where the questions involved were the same, or where the matters presented on the second appeal should have been presented on the first appeal, as where on the first appeal the court sustained a tax deed on certain grounds, upon the second appeal without new issues the deed should not be held invalid. Smyth v. Neff, 123 Ill. 310.

And where upon an appeal from an order denying a new trial, the order was affirmed under Minnesota supreme court rules 14 for failure of the appellant to serve copies of the case and of his points, the questions that might have been presented on the prior appeal were res judicata on the second appeal. Schleuder v. Corey, 30 Minn. 501.

And where error that might have been assigned existed prior to the former decision, and was not presented for review. Rehmyer v. Odell, 45 Ill. App. 616; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Kirchoff, 51 Ill. App. 67, Affirmed 149 Ill. 536; Hook v. Richeson, 115 Ill. 431; Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 252; Hobson v. Doe, Harper, 4 Blackf. 499; Brooks v. Brooks, 16 S. C. 621; Meredith v. Clarke, Sneed (Ky.) 189.

And where, on a prior writ of error, the defendant in error had pleaded that there was no error in the record, and the judgment had been affirmed, and the errors alleged on the second appeal existed before the first appeal. Booth v. Com. 7 Met. 285.

And where the errors complained of occurred before the first decision. But as to errors since the first decision, they might be reviewed. Smith v. Brittenham, 94 Ill. 624.

And where it did not appear that the matters presented differed from those alleged in the former action, or which then existed and might have been alleged, or that they were not within the knowledge of the plaintiff when the action was tried. Guest v. Brooklyn, 79 N. Y. 624.

And where the matters were the same and should have been put in issue in the former proceedings. Watkins v. Lawton, 69 Ga. 671.

And where the error alleged occurred prior to the former appeal. All errors not assigned will be considered as waived, and cannot afterwards be urged. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Kirchoff, 149 Ill. 536.

And where the same question was involved, and it was said that matters once determined could not be reopened, and this was true whether actually adjudicated or not. If they could have been adjudicated in that suit they were settled. Carter v. Hough, 39 Va. 508.

And where the case had been remanded with directions as to the decree that should be entered. The appellant cannot assign errors on the second appeal that occurred prior to the first appeal. Ogden v. Larrabee, 70 Ill. 510.

And where the prior decision refused to set aside a sale and sent back the case for further proof before confirmation, and an attempt was made on the second trial to have the sale set aside by reason of evidence that should have been and was not used on the first trial. Hill v. Hoover, 9 Wis. 16.

And where the prior decision confirmed a sale, and on the second trial it was attempted to be set aside by reason of evidence that should have been used on the first trial. Pierce v. Kneeland, 9 Wis. 24.

And where on the prior appeal the sale was set aside, and subsequently the trial court upheld the sale for matters which existed before the prior decision although the prior decision had reversed the judgment and remanded the case for further proceedings, but at the same time and in the same decree the sale was set aside. The trial court had no jurisdiction to ignore any part of the prior decision. Hill v. Draper (Ark.) 37 S. W. 574.

And where the facts were the same. It was said, not only the facts which were formerly pleaded, but those which might have been known with proper diligence, were included with all questions growing out of them in the prior judgment, and that the court had no power to interfere with such judgment. McWilliams v. Walthall, 77 Ga. 7.

And where the plaintiff took the first appeal from leading to the judgment and mandate constitute a final adjudication. This reason is undoubtedly sound as applied to a certain class of mandates, as is illustrated in a class of cases which the California court has considered as supporting its doctrine. But we cannot see how it is applicable to a mandate reversing a case, and remanding it for a new trial. In the latter case the whole case is tried anew, and nothing is settled by the first appeal beyond the fact that the first trial was erroneous, and that all the issues must be tried again. The case of Phelan v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 40, being the only case which our court has cited in support of the doctrine, states it in the language of the syllabus in Hiatt v. Brooks, citing Davidson v. Dallas; but there is no discussion of the doctrine. In the same volume, however, appears the case of Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 388, where Judge Field delivered the opinion of the court, and again stated the doctrine. He says that the court entertained no doubt of the correctness of the former decision; then cites Dewey v. Gray, and the other California cases, and three of the cases cited in Davidson v. Dallas. The reason is stated to be that the court, by its mandate, abandoned jurisdiction of the first appeal, and lost the power to modify its judgment therein expressed. A number of California cases later than the 20th might be cited supporting the contention of Foxworthy. It will not be necessary to review them. It is sufficient to say that the California court has by repeated decisions adhered to that doctrine, and that all these cases fairly support Foxworthy's contention. Inasmuch as our cases, if adhered to, based as they are on the authority of California, would require a decision herein in favor of Foxworthy, we have reviewed the cases down to the 20th, at which point our court adopted their doctrine, for the purpose of a judgment discharging a garnishee, and the judgment was reversed and the fund held liable, and the second appeal was by a claimant of the fund who was a party to the former appeal, and should then have claimed that the attachment was void in its face, although the prior decision was erroneous. It was said that the second decision would not bar another appeal by the garnishee or defendant under Ala. Code, § 2555, providing for an appeal by the defendant or garnishee. Matthews v. Sands, 29 Ala. 126.

But the decision upon a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal, where the question involved was an erroneous instruction, although the same instruction was in the first bill of exceptions, but it was not directly called in question and made a ground of complaint on the first appeal, and was not discussed or decided. Haynes v. Trenton, 123 Mo. 226.

And where the error in the second appeal was an instruction on the theory of abandonment in forcible entry, and a similar instruction was in the record of the prior appeal, but no special objection was made, and that question was not discussed upon the prior appeal. Walser v. Graham, 60 Mo. App. 323.

In Davis v. Krug, 95 Ind. 1, the decision on a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal, where the question might have been but was not decided and considered on the first appeal. The court cites the cases sustaining the proposition that the prior decision was conclusive upon the second appeal upon the questions decided, and says: "The law of the case, thus limited to the point decided, is approved. But this does not preclude us from deciding questions which might have been but were not considered and decided, as the case was presented on the first appeal. Such claim seems to us unreasonable although we are aware that it is supported by many respectable authorities, and even by the language used in some of the reported opinions of this court."

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was not conclusive on a second appeal where upon the prior appeal the complaint was held good upon demurrer, but on the second appeal other defects were shown which were not discussed or considered upon the prior appeal. Rinard v. West, 92 Ind. 359.

And where the prior decision was reversed because it did not appear to be by the consent of parties, and a supplemental cross bill was filed after the case was remanded, setting up that the decree was by consent, although this question could have been presented on the original appeal by a plea of release of errors. Hogerson v. Fanning, 38 Ill. App. 326.

And where the question was not decided on the prior appeal and there was some change in the evidence, although the point made upon the second appeal might have been and was not raised on the prior appeal. The circuit court of appeals rule 24, requiring counsel on both sides to specify the grounds upon which they will rely, either for a reversal or for an affirmance, limits the questions decided on such appeal to the points made. Belch v. Haas, 78 Fed. Rep. 974. See further, Klauber v. San Diego Street Car Co. 98 Cal. 105, subd. 1; Adamson v. Sundby, 51 Minn. 460; and People v. Thompson (Cal.) 46 Pac. 912, subd. k.

o. As to excessive verdicts.

Some cases hold that the fact that a verdict was held excessive on a prior appeal is not conclusive as to the amount on the second appeal, although one case regards an increased verdict as a contempt of the decision.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal where the prior decision required a reduction of the verdict to $2,000, and upon the second trial the verdict was obtained for $4,000, as it could not be said in the last case that the jury acted with prejudice. Holmes v. Jones, 60 Hun. 346.

And where on a prior appeal the plaintiff was required to remit a part of his verdict before a new trial would be granted, and he refused to remit, and a judgment was obtained larger than that to which the former remission would have reduced it, the former decision cannot be urged as binding. Ibid.

In Mahar v. Simmons, 47 Hun. 479, where the prior decision set aside a verdict of $200 as excessive, and on the second trial on the same facts the verdict was increased to $750, and appeared to be in contempt of the advice of the supreme court, the court refused to accept this verdict, saying: "If the verdict had been the same it would have indicated that the appellate court was mistaken in supposing it to be unjust, or that it was inexpedient to prolong the litigation, and if the plaintiff will reduce the verdict to $200 it will be allowed to stand."

p. Change of court.

That the former decision was made by one court and the last appeal was to a court succeeding the same, or where the members of the same have changed, will not prevent the prior decision from being conclusive.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal where the same question was involved, although the second court was not the same but the successor of the prior showing that they originated in California in an obiter dictum, and that California traces the doctrine to certain cases in the Supreme Court of the United States and elsewhere, which do not support the doctrine; and for the further reason of showing that the California court has given a reason for its decisions applicable to those cases which it cites, and furnishing a sufficient ground for those decisions, but which does not in any way apply to the cases decided in California, or to such a case as the one now before us. The California doctrine is not without support in the decisions of some other states. In Russell v. La Roque, 18 Ala. 149, the opinion opens as follows: "This cause has been tried before this court, and the rules applied to it then is the law of it now." In better English, but just as bluntly, the same court said in Thomason v. Dill, 84 Ala. 175, that propositions laid down on a former appeal "are the law of this case, and must not be lost sight of." In neither case was any doubt expressed as to the correctness of the former decision, and there is no discussion of the rule announced.

In Rector v. Danley, 14 Ark. 804, the opinion opens with a statement that it is a settled doctrine that a decision made when the cause was in the court before is the law of the case, and nothing then determined can be reviewed. Here, again, no authority is cited and no reason is given. Precisely of the same nature is the case of Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. E. Co. 67 Mich. 677. The doctrine has also been adopted in Indiana, the rule being stated there also, unaided by argument or authority. Kress v. State, Wagoner, 65 Ind. 106; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hixon, 110 Ind. 225; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Houser, 111 Ind. 266. The doctrine also receives apparent support in the cases of Hill v. Hoover, 9 Wis. 16, and Pierce v. Kneeland, Id. 19, although both of those court. Plymouth County Bank v. Gilman, 3 S. D. 170; Spicer v. Norton, 13 Barb. 542.

And where the same question was involved, and the first decision was rendered by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the second appeal was to the court of appeals, which succeeded to the jurisdiction of the former court. Holcomb v. Dearing, 24 Wash. L. Rep. 236.

And where on former trial a defeasance of a right of way was established for nonuser, and on the second trial an attempt was made to show an intent to resume the use, although since the former decision there had been an entire change of the members of the appellate court with one exception. Hickox v. Chicago & C. S. R. Co. 94 Mich. 237.

In Ten Eyck v. Whitbeck, 60 Hun. 450, on a second appeal the court said, although the members of the court have changed, yet on the same case it could hardly be expected that a different conclusion could be reached. "If we are not concluded by the former determination the opinion may be deemed an authority," and under the circumstances the court is not called upon to discuss the case, and then the court discusses the case.

q. As to effect of dicta.

The general rule is that a decision which is an obiter dictum is not conclusive, and so held in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Missouri, Vermont, and Federal courts. But decisions on issues made on a former appeal, that were not necessary to the question disposing of the appeal, have been held conclusive, where the party insisted on a decision on a particular question, and where a pleading was construed.

So, the decision on a prior appeal was not conclusive on the second appeal where on two prior appeals a lease was regarded and treated as valid by all the parties and by the court, and on the last trial was held void for want of proper acknowledgment. McLeran v. Benton, 73 Cal. 329.

The decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive on the second appeal, where the matters were the same, but was not conclusive as to dictum of the former case. Jesse v. Cater, 28 Ala. 475; Price v. Price, 23 Ala. 609.

The decision upon a prior appeal was not conclusive on the second appeal where the former decision was an obiter dictum. Wixson v. Devine, 80 Cal. 386; Mulford v. Estudillo, 82 Cal. 131.

And where the question on the second appeal was passed upon in a dictum of the prior case, and was not in issue, and was made subsequently by amended pleadings. Clark v. Hershey, 52 Ark. 473.

And where an opinion was expressed not at all material to the decision, and was a dictum. Barney v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 117 U. S. 223, 29 L. ed. 858.

And where the question on appeal was the validity of an instruction, and the court passed on the sufficiency of evidence, which was only an obiter dictum, and the sufficiency of evidence was not a direct question with which the court was dealing, and the court did not intend in passing on the sufficiency of evidence to foreclose the trial court from declaring it insufficient to establish a prima facie case. Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514.

And where the question was decided by mere implication from the general disposition of the case, or was merely collateral to the matter actually considered. To the general rule that the prior decision was res judicata, the Missouri cases have made exceptions. Gwin v. Waggoner, 116 Mo. 143.

And where the appellate court made a suggestion as to a mode of relief which was acted on by the lower court, but which suggestion was not equivalent to a declaration of law and was not on a question actually in issue in the prior appeal. Meeker v. Swift, 45 Mo. App. 183.

And where what was said by the court was outside of the record, and was not presented to the court for its decision, and was not necessary to a decision of the question involved. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. Swan, 120 Mo. 30.

But the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive on the second appeal where the error assigned was the refusal to transfer the case to the equity docket and the question was considered by the court in appeal, although not disposed of by the opinion rendered. Com. v. Tate, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1045.

And where a party on the former appeal insisted on an opinion which as to that appeal might have been only a dictum. (This is really on the ground of estoppel.) San Francisco v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 53 Cal. 608.

And where the decision was upon a point which arose in the case, although it was not necessary to the disposition of the appeal. The former judgment was reversed because a part of the demand was barred by limitation, and the court held in addition that the complaint stated a cause of action. Gwinn v. Hamilton, 75 Cal. 265.

In Hosack v. Rogers, 25 Wend. 313, the question was made as to the effect on a second appeal of an obiter dictum on the first appeal. Four of the members of the court were divided on the question, and were the only members who took part in the discussion. The second appeal was affirmed by a vote of eleven to eight.

cases might have been solved under a strict and correct application of the doctrine of res judicata. Of the same character is the case of Hopkins v. Hopkins, 40 Wis. 462. In none of these cases was the first reversal general, but the cause was remanded with certain features finally adjudicated, so that they could not again properly arise in the further proceedings in the case. In Stacy v. Vermont C. R. Co. 32 Vt. 551, the court, while intimating some doubt as to the correctness of the doctrine, states that it had been so long established that it will not be departed from; but also states the reason for it to be, in the first place, that the former decision has the same weight as authority as a decision in another case, and, in the second place, that it is an adjudication between the parties. The latter reason is the only one which could be advanced for holding the decision conclusive upon the court; and the Vermont court says that it is not conclusive as a matter of law, because the court may revise and reverse it. Thus this case is, after all, ambiguous, leaving the former decision in scarcely any stronger position than a decision of the same question between other parties. In Simple v. Anderson, 9 Ill. 546, the rule seems to be for the first time in Illinois announced, and the court cites in support of its conclusion the cases in the Supreme Court of the United States cited by the California court, and Booth v. Com. 7 Met. 286. As we have already stated, we shall show that these cases are based upon a different principle, which is illustrated by the case of Hol'oubush v. McConnel, 12 Ill. 203. In that case the opinion was by Judge Trumbull. On the former appeal the cause had been remanded for certain specified proceedings, not remanded for a new trial generally. In the inferior court an effort was made to relitigate the questions which had been finally determined by the first appeal,

r. Where the questions are different.

The rule is clear that where the facts are different so that the principles of law announced on the first appeal are not applicable, as, where there are material changes in the evidence or pleadings or findings, a prior decision is not conclusive upon questions presented on the second appeal and are only conclusive so far as the principles are applicable.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal, where the evidence materially changed the question of contributory negligence, and negligence on the part of the defendant. Meeks v. Southern P. R. Co. 56 Cal. 513, 38 Am. Rep. 67.

And where the pleadings were amended and the evidence was different. Greenberg v. California Bituminous Rock Co. 107 Cal. 667.

And where upon the second trial the evidence was materially different. Fellows v. St. Louis Bridge Co. 45 Ill. App. 589; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 80 Ga. 526; McNamara v. Pengilly (Minn.) 67 N. W. 661; Hart v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 76 Hun, 226; Walker v. Cole (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 832.

And where the previous decision, which granted a new trial, was based upon an erroneous translation of a document, and the correct translation was presented on the second appeal. The binding ruling of the prior decision can only be invoked when the fact appears under the same circumstances in which it was originally presented. Nieto v. Carpenter, 21 Cal. 455.

And where the evidence in the first appeal was not in the record, and it was not shown that it was the same in both cases. Société des Mines v. Mackintosh, 7 Utah, 35.

And where the first decision held that the deceased was a passenger and on the second trial the evidence was different. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Bryant, 65 Fed. Rep. 990, 27 U. S. App. 681.

And where the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded and new evidence was introduced on the second trial, and it was not apparent that the opinion of the supreme court was intended to be a final disposition of the cause. Ryan v. Tomlinson, 39 Cal. 639.

And where the case made upon the second appeal was an entirely different one from the prior one, under an order opening the case upon the issues. McLennan v. Prentice, 85 Wis. 427.

And where the evidence materially differed in many respects so far as any legal principle was involved. The prior decision was conclusive as to matters common to both cases. Lane v. Starkey, 20 Neb. 566.

And where the evidence was materially different, 34 L. R. A.

It was said that the principles of law established on former appeal, so far as applicable, remain the law of the case through all its subsequent stages, and must be adhered to whether right or wrong. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Hill, 7 Ind. App. 255.

And where the evidence as to an agreement on the first trial was uncertain and ambiguous, and on the second trial on a supplemental pleading the evidence was clear and direct. Frisby v. Parkhurst, 29 Md. 58, 96 Am. Dec. 503.

And where the first decision was that when nothing appeared but a mortgage and a quitclaim, the mortgage title would be regarded prima facie as merged in the quitclaim, and the second trial overcame this presumption by showing a different intention. Stantons v. Thompson, 49 N. H. 275.

And where the first decision held that the judgment was against the weight of evidence, and there was a trial without a jury, and on the second trial there was a jury, and there was a change in the witnesses. New York Small Stock Co. v. Third Ave. R. Co. 16 Misc. 64.

And where new and different facts were presented, requiring the application of a different rule of law from that applied on the former appeal. Bloomfield v. Buchanan, 14 Or. 181.

And where the question presented on the first appeal was in regard to the facts on conflicting evidence, and there was a different state of facts on the second appeal. Wallace v. Sisson (Cal.) 45 Pac. 1000.

And where there was an essentially different state of facts. Baxter v. Rollins (Iowa) 68 N. W. 721; Ocean S. S. Co. v. Cheeny, 95 Ga. 381; Elston v. Kennicott, 52 Ill. 272; Mitchell v. Davis, 23 Cal. 381; People v. Hamilton, 108 Cal. 496.

And where the facts were different, and the opinion was not intended to be res judicata, but remanded the case for a trial de novo. Johnson v. Bailey, 17 Colo. 59.

And where the same questions were not again presented on the same state of facts. McKinlay v. Tuttle, 42 Cal. 570.

And where a different question was presented, and the pleadings were amended and what was said in the former opinion only applied to the facts as disclosed. Burton v. Perry, 146 Ill. 71.

And where the pleadings were amended and the facts were not the same. Cross v. Zellerbach, 63 Cal. 623; Heldt v. Minor, 113 Cal. 385; Chickering v. Failles, 29 Ill. 304; Pressley v. Lamb, 105 Ind. 171; Green v. McDonald, 13 Smedes & M. 445.

The decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal where the facts were the same; but while the prior decision held that a judgment of divorce was void for want of jurisdiction, and which were not within the scope of the mandate. The court properly held that these issues were res judicata and cited Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 8 How. 418, 11 L. ed. 658, which is in point on this proposition. Unfortunately, however, in Cook v. Norton, 61 Ill. 285, the court, on the sole authority of Hollowbush v. McConnel applied the doctrine to a case remanded generally for a new trial, losing sight of the distinction between a final order adjudicating an issue and an order remanding a case for a new trial throughout, leaving all issues still undetermined. Later Illinois cases have followed the doctrine in Cook v. Norton, the question not seeming to have ever again been examined on its merits.

We have now referred to the decisions of all states which, in our opinion, lend either actual or apparent support to the doctrine of the California court. We have seen that in every case the rule first originated in a bald dictum without the support of reason or argument, or else it was based on the authority of certain cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, or of New York, Massachusetts, and Ohio. The New York case cited is Hosack v. Rogers, 25 Wend. 318. This was a case before the court for the correction of errors. A doctrine somewhat akin to that here contended for is stated in the syllabus prepared by the reporter. There is only one opinion supporting that view; three adverse thereto. The vote of the court was eleven to eight for affirmance, and it nowhere appears that that vote was because a majority of the court agreed with the one member who advanced the "law of the case" doctrine, except by a note of the reporter to the effect that it was "generally understood" that, but for the principle of stare decisis, the judgment would have been reversed. The case of Booth v. Com. 7 Met. 285, often cited in support of the doctrine, was where a judgment had been affirmed, and the plaintiff in error undertook to sue out a second writ of error from the same judgment. The court, of course, held that this could not be done; but we cannot see how, by any stretch of the imagination, the rule here contended for can be discovered as involved in that question. The case of Stier v. Stier, 8 Ohio, 19, is also cited. But that case merely held that a bill in chancery would not lie to correct a judicial error. Polock v. Cohen, 82 Ohio St. 514, was precisely like Booth v. Com.

The cases most frequently cited as supporting the doctrine are, however, those in the the second appeal on an amended pleading showing an estoppel might require a different judgment. Israel v. Arthur, 18 Colo. 169.

So, the decision upon the prior appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal where the facts involved were the same: but when the judgment was reversed for defective pleading and proof, and an amendment was made presenting new facts, the decision was not applicable. Castagnino v. Balletta, 82 Cal. 250.

The decision on a prior appeal was not conclusive on a second appeal where the question then presented was not necessarily involved in the first decision. Clews v. Bank of New York Nat. Bkg. Assn. 106 N. Y. 398.

And where the same question was not presented. Thompson v. White, 78 Cal. 381.

And where the former decision declared a trust and directed a partition, and on the partition proceedings it was disclosed that the ancestor's title was devised under a deed of trust made by him in his lifetime, and the question in the second appeal was admitting that a trust was established, it was defeated by the deed of trust. Kingsbury v. Buckner, 70 Ill. 514.

And where the prior decision did not settle the question in regard to boundary lines that were presented on the second appeal. Pearl v. Pittman, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 16.

And where the prior decision only held a tax deed not invalid on account of the description, and another question was made on the second trial. Anderson v. Hancock, 64 Cal. 455.

In Baker v. Baker, 87 Ky. 461, where a case was reversed and came up on appeal on amended pleadings, the court did not discuss the effect of the prior decision.

In Kimball v. Semple, 25 Cal. 455, it was said that if we mistake the facts for evidence, it cannot injure either party in a new trial of the action, for in that forum the parties must again produce their evidence and have the facts found in the same manner as required at the first trial.

a. As to ambiguous decisions.

Where the prior decision is ambiguous, it is not conclusive.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was non-binding on a subsequent appeal, where this was the third appeal and the decision on the first and second were in conflict with each other. Moore v. Barclay, 28 Ala. 739.

And where such prior decision by inadvertence determined two principles of law standing in such opposition to each other as to be incapable of a harmonious construction. Gage v. Downey, 94 Cal. 241.

t. As to limited decisions.

Where the prior decision is limited by its express terms it will not be conclusive upon a second appeal except as to matters within the limitation.

So, the decision on a prior appeal was not conclusive on the second appeal as to the effect of its pendens where on a rehearing of the first decision the effect of the its pendens was expressly omitted from that determination. Welton v. Cook, 61 Cal. 481.

And where the court in expressing the former judgment waived an examination of the law in some of the exceptions, and did not examine or decide as to them. These exceptions may be re-examined. Duval v. Farmers' Bank, 9 Gill & J. 81.

And where the supreme court expressed an opinion upon an incomplete case, and carefully avoided passing finally upon the rights of the parties, and the second appeal was to the circuit court of appeals. The E. A. Packer, 58 Fed. Rep. 251, 14 U. S. App. 684.

See also Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, subd. q; Balch v. Haas, 73 Fed. Rep. 974, subd. n.

u. As to decisions by a divided court.

A decision by a divided court has been held conclusive in some cases, but a case in New York holds the contrary.

So, the decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon a second appeal where on the prior appeal the members of the supreme court were equally divided upon one or more questions and the judgment was reversed upon other questions upon which the court agreed. The opinion of the judges who agreed with the court below on the question about which there was a division becomes

Supreme Court of the United States, and we shall now proceed to their examination. The first case in point of time is Himely v. Ross, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 313, 3 L. ed. 111. This was an admiralty case. There had been an appeal, in which the sentence was reversed with a direction as to what the sentence should be, and an order remanding the case for the entry of a sentence in accordance with the opinion. For the purpose of entering such a sentence the circuit court referred the case to auditors, and there was an appeal from the auditors' report. In arguing this appeal Mr. Martin was about to open a question covered by the first appeal when Chief Justice Marshall remarked: "Nothing is before this court but what is subsequent to the mandate." It will be observed that the Chief Justice in effect stated that everything prior to the mandate had been adjudicated, and this was undoubtedly correct. The mandate did not send the case back for a new trial, or for a new hearing, but with specific instructions as to further proceedings. The propriety of such further proceedings was, therefore, finally adjudicated, and not involved in the second appeal. In Skellern v. May, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 287, 8 L. ed. 220, a cause had come to the supreme court from the circuit court for the district of Kentucky. The decree of that court had been reversed, with directions to make partition. When the cause came up before the circuit court upon the mandate, it was discovered that the jurisdiction of the circuit court was not pleaded, and the case, again, came to the supreme court on a certificate of division as to whether the circuit court should then dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction. The supreme court wrote no opinion, but merely entered an order that it was the duty of the circuit court to obey the mandate. This case certainly involved no question of the power of the supreme court to change its conclusion. It merely repeated to the circuit court what the mandate had already directed. The next case is the famous case of Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat, 304, 4 L. ed. 97. The case had been brought to the Supreme Court of the United States on a writ of error to the court of appeals of Virginia. The supreme court had reversed the case and remanded it to the court of appeals, which refused to execute the mandate, on the ground that the Supreme Court of the United States had no jurisdiction. A writ of error was then taken to review the refusal of the court of appeals to obey the mandate, and it was argued that, if the supreme court had no jurisdiction of the first writ, all subsequent proceedings were void. To this the supreme court answered the law of the case in all further progress of the case. Smith v. Brannin, 79 Ky. 114.

And where upon a prior appeal the case was affirmed because the court was equally divided, and such decision could not be changed even if the court was then disposed to change it. Chahoon v. Com. 21 Gratt. 822.

And where the same question was involved, although the prior decision was not the unanimous opinion of the court, but nothing new by way of reargument was presented. Allen v. Colorado C. R. Co. (Colo.) 43 Pac. 1015.

But the decision upon a prior appeal was not conclusive upon the second appeal where the members of the court were not unanimous in the former decision, and the reasoning of those who concurred was not in harmony, and the question was one of some doubt. Oakley v. Aspinwall, 13 N. Y. 600.

See also Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 413, 11 L. ed. 658, subd. n; Lathrop v. Knapp, 37 Wis. 307, subd. l.

v. Statute and Constitution changing the rule.

In Alabama the statute prevents a prior decision from being conclusive.

So the decision on a former appeal was not conclusive on a second appeal where Ala. Rev. Code, § 3810, required the supreme court to disregard such decision if it was erroneous, and the adoption of this rule by an interior court was approved. Moulton v. Reid, 54 Ala. 320. See also National Commercial Bank v. McDonnell, 92 Ala. 387, and Stoudemire v. De Bardelaben, 85 Ala. 85, subd. l.

Missouri Const. art. 6, Amended Laws of 1888, p. 215, § 6, provides that when any one of the courts of appeals shall render a decision which any one of the judges therein sitting shall deem contrary to a previous decision of any one of said courts of appeals or of the supreme court, the court of appeals must of its own motion certify, the same to the supreme court, and the last previous rulings of the supreme court shall control.

w. Rule in intermediate courts.

The law of the case has generally been applied to cases where the prior decision was by the court of 34 L. R. A.

highest resort; but it seems that it is also applicable to intermediate courts, although there have been some decisions and intimations to the contrary.

The decision upon a prior appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal where the questions presented were the same. This applies to the judgments in the appellate court of Illinois as well as in the supreme court of Illinois. Henning v. Eldridge, 146 Ill. 805.

And where both appeals were in the Illinois appellate court, and the decision on the prior appeal was not criticized by the supreme court to which the case had been taken. Kankakee Coal Co. v. Crane Bros. Mfg. Co. 88 Ill. App. 555.

And where the prior decision was rendered by the supreme court of the territory of Utah, although it was contended that the territorial supreme court was not a court of last resort. The rule seems to be that when an appellant ceased to pursue his appeal from one appellate court to a higher, the decision of the court where he sees fit to rest is a final one within the meaning of the rule. Silva v. Pickard (Utah) 47 Pac. 144.

The contrary was decided in Jungk v. Reed (Utah) 42 Pac. 222, but the decision of Silva v. Pickard, supra, in effect overruled that decision without referring to the same.

In Ogle v. Turpin, 8 Ill. App. 458, it was held that the doctrine of res judicata applies to the appellate court of Illinois in regard to former decisions, although such court was not a court of last resort.

In Lawrence v. Ballou, 37 Cal. 518, it was said that the conclusiveness of a prior decision upon a subsequent appeal applies only to a court of last resort.

The decision upon a former appeal was conclusive upon the second appeal where the questions presented were the same. But the dissenting opinion said that the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, made since the former appeal upon a similar question, indicates that it would be useless to apply the rule of a decision which would not be regarded by the higher tribunal and prevents the former decision from being the "law of the case." Carr v. Quigley, 79 Cal. 130. I. T.

that the former record was not before it, and that the second writ of error did not draw in question the propriety of the first judgment. In Hunter v. Martin, 4 Munf. 1, the first mandate is set out at length, from which it appears that the supreme court remanded the case with directions to the court of appeals to enter a judgment for Martin. It will be observed that the first judgment of the supreme court was a final one upon the merits, constituting an adjudication of title. The cause was not remanded for a new trial, and no question had been left open. In the case of The Santa Maria, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 431, 6 L. ed. 359, the supreme court on the first appeal had entered a decree and issued a mandate to carry that decree into effect. Pending the appeal a claim had been interposed for insurance and other charges on the boat. On the second appeal this claim was resisted, on the ground that the petitioner was a mala fide claimant. The court remarked that no question could be raised which had been before the court on the first appeal; but that all new questions were opened for determination, and the whole record before the court for that purpose. This was another case of final adjudication by the first appeal. The matters there involved had not been reopened for a new hearing. Sibbald v. United States, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 488, 9 L. ed. 1167, was a similar case. The case most frequently cited by the courts which have adopted the doctrine contended for by Foxworthy is Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 8 How. 415, 11 L. ed. 638. In that case an assessment had been made on the stockholders of the bridge company. Stewart and others, who were stockholders, did not pay, and the company undertook to forfeit their stock. Congress passed an act to purchase the bridge, whereupon these stockholders filed a bill in the circuit court for participation in the purchase money. The court entered a decree holding that the plaintiffs were still stockholders, but that, before division of the purchase money, certain other stockholders should be reimbursed from that fund for advances which they had made. The decree also ordered a reference to an auditor to state an account in accordance with the decree. An appeal was immediately taken from this decree, and the decree affirmed by the supreme court. The auditor then proceeded to state the account, after which a final decree was entered. An appeal was taken from this decree by the bridge company, which had also been the appellant before. The company undertook to question the propriety of the first decree on the ground that it was interlocutory merely, and therefore not appealable; and that the bridge company was not estopped by the decision on the first appeal. The supreme court held that, the bridge company having appealed from the interlocutory decree, and no exception having been taken to the jurisdiction, and the case having been decided on its merits, the parties were now estopped from alleging the want of jurisdiction, and that the first decree, affirming the interlocutory decree of the circuit court, constituted an adjudication of all matters therein involved. This case was like all the others. The refusal of the court on the second appeal to reconsider the questions was based, not on any want of power to do so after a new trial in the same case of the same issues, but was based on the fact that the first appeal had led to a judgment in the supreme court finally adjudicating the issues, and leaving none of those already disposed of to be retried after the mandate.

The foregoing are the cases usually cited by the advocates of the California rule. Many others of like character in the Supreme Court of the United States might be cited, but that court has never laid down the California rule, and has never decided a case which lends any support to it. We need not review the decisions of the courts of the other states. We have examined very many of them. We find many cases like those in the Supreme Court of the United States, and, indeed, this court has applied the principle therein involved. Younkin v. Younkin, 44 Neb. 729. On the other hand, many courts have, without question, on a second appeal, after a mandate reversing a case for a new trial, reconsidered questions presented on the second trial which had also been presented on the first. The distinction which we have endeavored to point out—a distinction ruling the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and one which the California court failed to observe—was distinctly recognized in Adams County v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. 55 Iowa, 94. It was there urged that a decision did not become res judicata so long as the case remained pending. The court said: "Whatever force there might be in this position in an action at law where the right to introduce new evidence after verdict involves the retrial of the whole case, we think it cannot be maintained in a case like this." On a rehearing the same result was reached, upon the ground that when the cause was first reversed it was remanded for a single purpose; for all other purposes there was held to have been an adjudication. In Davis v. Curtis, 70 Iowa, 398, general language was used to the effect that a ruling once made became the law of the case. Adams County v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. was the only authority cited; and Davis v. Curtis was a case like that, the first appeal having determined the rights sought to be relitigated. On this branch of the case we shall refer to only three other authorities. These are Bane v. Wick, 6 Ohio St. 18; Bell v. Lamprey, 58 N. H. 124; and Frankland v. Cassaday, 62 Tex. 418. The doctrine of these cases is that conclusions reached on questions of law on the first appeal will ordinarily not be examined on a second appeal, but that in exceptional cases, when the court is very clearly satisfied that its former opinion was erroneous, this rule will not be applied.

In the discussion of the authorities we have gone far beyond the proper limits of most opinions. We have done so because we deem the question one of very great importance, and have felt the necessity of a close examination, both upon principle and upon authority. The general course of the review has been to trace the doctrine back. Adopting now the contrary course, it will be observed that its history is this: The Supreme Court of the United States and other courts, having once entered judgments or decrees finally adjudicating certain issues, decided very properly that on a second appeal nothing so adjudicated could be relitigated. Other courts declined to permit a party, after an unsuccessful appeal, to prosecute a second appeal from the same judgment. A few courts,—notably California,—failing to draw the distinction between a judgment upon the merits and a venire de novo, adopted these cases as authority for the proposition that, where a new trial had been awarded, the court could not, on a second appeal, re-examine any questions of law decided on the first. Having gone so far, they were driven to the further conclusion that the principle applies to every question involved in the first appeal, whether in fact examined or not. Then, in a very few instances, after this doctrine had been established, but never in a case of first impression, some reasons have been given in its support. That usually given is that the first opinion is an adjudication. It needs but a moment's reflection to show that there is no adjudication by the expression of an opinion on a point of law where no judgment is entered in accordance with that opinion, but the cause is remanded generally. The only thing adjudicated is that there was error in the record, and that the whole case should be relitigated. To apply the rules of res judicata to such a case would require a further holding that, where a court has overruled a demurrer, it may not afterwards, on the trial, dismiss the case, because no cause of action is stated; or, having granted a temporary injunction, that it may not dissolve that injunction if it becomes satisfied that it was improvidently granted. Another reason given is that there must be an end to litigation. This is a salutary maxim, but to say that a court may not correct its own mistakes for this reason is to push it to an absurd conclusion. A third reason somewhere given is that on a second appeal the court only reviews the record for error on the second trial; that it is the duty of the trial judge to follow the opinion of the appellate court, although he may think it is erroneous, and technically he never errs when he does so. It is true that it is the duty of the trial judge to follow the directions of the appellate court, but, when the case comes again before the appellate court, the question is not, Did the trial judge proceed according to its former opinion? but, Were his rulings correct in law? To enforce erroneous rulings simply because the appellate court had directed the error would be to pervert the law, and sacrifice justice to the technicalities of practice. That the rule is not well-founded in principle may be seen by the confusion of the courts in their efforts to base it upon a known principle. Some courts trace it to the principle of res judicata; some to that of stare decisis; and some, evidently realizing that it falls within neither principle, fall back upon the indefinite term "the law of the case," as if it were possible, under our system of jurisprudence, that there should be one law for one case and a different law for other cases entirely similar thereto.

It has never been doubted that an appellate court is not bound blindly to follow precedent. A rule of law once announced affords a guide for similar cases, and will ordinarily control their decision; but, having announced a rule, when another case arises, presenting the same question, if the court is satisfied that its former opinion was wrong, it may, and frequently does, overrule it. The limitations resting upon courts in this respect are usually stated to be: First, that a former decision will not be overruled when it has become a rule of property; and, secondly, that it will be followed, although erroneous, where more mischief will result from overruling than from following it. This is as far as the doctrine of stare decisis should go. When, however, a decision in one case is overruled in another, there is no remedy for the defeated party in the first case. His rights have been determined, and a decision overruling a former opinion in a different case amounts always to an admission by the court that it has subjected the unsuccessful party in the first case to an injustice which can never be remedied. Notwithstanding this, subject to the limitations we have stated, courts do overrule such opinions. Why should the rule be more stringent when the same case is up for review, the erroneous judgment still unexecuted, the parties before the court, and the case in such a situation that by the correction of its error no injustice will be done, beyond, perhaps, the creation of additional costs? If the doctrine contended for is to prevail here, then it follows that the only instance in which the court is not permitted to correct its mistakes or refuses to do so, is also the only instance where the mistake can be corrected without injustice. Take the case before us. The court in the Grant Case decided, in effect, that its former decisions in this case should have been in favor of the city instead of Foxworthy. In subsequent cases, by reason of the decision in the Grant Case, the city would prevail under the same state of facts; but if the former decisions in this case are conclusive upon the court, the rule will be different for the city of Hastings and for Mr. Foxworthy in this one case than it is for all others and in other cases; and, if so, what is to be done with that part of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution which forbids any state to deny to any person the equal protection of the laws? A court has no legislative power. Its duty is to declare what the law is, not to make law. To hold that it is bound to follow in a given case an erroneous decision formerly rendered in the same case would be to hold that, although the court believes the law to be otherwise, it will make a special law for the particular parties and the particular case before it, contrary to the general law; to substitute what it is pleased to call "the law of the case" for the law of the land,—for the law which every member of the court is sworn to administer. To do so it must not only legislate, but legislate specially, in a manner which our Constitution forbids to the legislative body itself.

We conclude that the principles governing the case are these: The cause having been remanded generally, there was no adjudication of any rights between the parties; that the record presents the question upon this trial as well as upon the others, and that it is within the power of the court to re-examine its former decisions, and apply the law correctly. We think that ordinarily the court is justified in refusing to re-examine questions of law once passed upon, and that it is only where it clearly appears that the former decision was erroneous that this should be done. It is, however, now clearly established that the former opinions in this case were erroneous, and the court should correct the error.

In the amended petition the averment appears that the plaintiff was confined to his bed and house for more than ten weeks, and was wholly incapacitated, mentally and physically, to do any business or transact any affairs until the 1st day of May thereafter. On the trial a witness testified that for six or eight weeks Mr. Foxworthy suffered intense pain, and that for a month or six weeks he was insane through pain. It will be remembered that the injury was sustained January 21, and the statement was filed with the city council July 28. Do the facts so pleaded and proved excuse the delay? We think not. The filing of the statement was a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action. It was not in the nature of a limitation, and the existence of a disability preventing plaintiff from filing a claim would not extend the time for filing it for the statutory period after the disability was removed. We think the uniform line of authority on this subject is that the condition must still be performed within the time specified, provided a reasonable time after the removal of the disabilities remain for that purpose. It has been so held even in the case of a limitation by contract. Steel v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 47 Fed. Rep 863; Blanks v. New Orleans Hibernia Ins. Co. 86 La. Ann. 599. Giving the utmost possible effect to the pleadings and evidence in regard to Mr. Foxworthy's disability, there remained, after its removal, several months within which the statement might have been filed.

Reversed and remanded.

LOS ANGELES CONSOLIDATED ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. A person riding between the rails of an electric street railway upon a bicycle has the duty to look out for and endeavor to avoid danger from the electric cars.
2. It is matter of common knowledge that a bicycle under a rider of ordinary strength and experience can attain a much higher rate of speed than that of an electric car running about 10 miles an hour, and by mere pressure of the hand can be instantly turned aside so as to leave a street-car track on which it is going.
3. The motorman of an electric car seeing a bicycle rider going on the track in front of him may assume up to the last moment that the rider will get out of the way by increasing his speed or turning aside in time to avoid the danger.
4. The negligence of a bicycle rider who continues to ride on the track of an electric car up to the very moment when he is struck, when by the slightest care and effort on his part he could have put himself out of danger up to the last moment, is a contributing and efficient cause of the injury, which precludes the conclusion that the negligence in managing the car was later in time and therefore the proximate cause of the injury.

(Beatty, Ch. J., and Temple and Heushaw, JJ., dissent.)

NOTE.—As to negligence in running a cable car too closely behind a buggy on the track, see Hicks v. Citizens' R. Co. (Mo.) 25 L. R. A. 508 (annotated on the question of street-car collisions with vehicles or horses).

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's husband and father. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. John D. Pope, for appellant:

Defendant had the superior right to the space covered by its tracks for the movement of its cars, and it was the duty of the deceased to get off the track and permit defendant's train to pass.

Booth, Street Railways, § 303.

Defendant was not bound to anticipate the negligence of the deceased, and had a right to act upon the assumption that he would move to one side and permit the train to pass.

Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 279; Moore v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 108 Pa. 349; Yancey v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 93 Mo. 433; Holmes v. South Pacific Coast R. Co. 97 Cal. 164.

It was the duty of the deceased, if he proposed to run along defendant's track in the direction in which he must have known that the trains of cars were running every few minutes, to look backward as well as forward, and if necessary to listen so that he might know when a train was coming and move off the track on the approach of the train and permit it to pass without stopping or slowing up.

Being a man in full possession of his faculties,—having perfect sight and hearing,—being an experienced rider on the bicycle and having the ability to leave the track in an instant, he was inexcusably negligent in not keeping out of the way of the train. His own gross negligence was not only the cause but the sole cause of his death.

Glascok v. Central P. R. Co. supra; Kelley v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 75 Mo. 188; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Depew, 40 Ohio St. 181; *Holmes v. South Pac. Coast R. The motorman acted in the reasonable belief that deceased had ample time and opportunity after being fully warned of the approach of the train to get out of the way, and he lost his life solely through his own negligence, and the court should have instructed the jury that the evidence would not justify them in finding for the plaintiffs.

Geary v. Simmons, 39 Cal. 224; Vanderford v. Foster, 65 Cal. 49; Fagundes v. Central P. R. Co. 79 Cal. 97, 3 L. R. A. 8; Toulouse v. Paire, 103 Cal. 252.

Plaintiffs had no right to recover because of the contributory negligence of the deceased, even if it were conceded that defendant's employees were negligent.

The doctrine that the negligence of the person injured is no defense when it appears that the defendant after becoming aware of the peril of the person injured might by the use of reasonable diligence have prevented the injury, does not apply where the person injured, though conscious of his danger, deliberately refuses to take any steps for his own safety.

O'Brien v. McGlinchy, 68 Me. 552; Kirtley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Co. 65 Fed. Rep. 886; Holmes v. South Pac. Coast R. Co. 97 Cal. 169.

Deceased must be held to have known of the approaching train, and to have heard the bell and the loud calls of motorman and passengers.

Where the injury is not wantonly or willfully inflicted the ordinary rule applies that contributory negligence on the part of the person injured is a bar to an action for damages.

Where the negligence of the person injured is a proximate cause, and is subsequent in time to the negligence of the person who inflicts the injury, there can be no recovery.

Camden & P. Ferry Co.* 45 N. J. L. 368, 46 Am. Rep. 781.

Nor does the exception to the rule exist where the negligence of the party inflicting the injury and that of the person injured are contemporaneous.

Bigelow, Torts, 311; Zimmerman v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 71 Mo. 476; Fraser v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 81 Ala. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 145; Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455, 3 Am. Rep. 390; Holmes v. South Pac. Coast R. Co. 97 Cal. 161.

The qualification of the rule as of the effect of contributory negligence, first adopted in Davis v. Mann, is founded upon the idea that the contributory negligence of the person on whom the injury is inflicted is only a remote cause of the injury.

Davis v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546; Kirtley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 65 Fed. Rep. 886; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, § 58; Holmes v. South Pac. Coast R. Co. supra.

The test is, Did the negligence of the party injured contribute directly and approximately to the injury?

Mr. William J. Hunsaker, for respondents:

Whether or not under the circumstances as developed by the evidence the servants of the defendant were guilty of negligence was a question solely for the jury.

Whether or not the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence was a question which could only be determined by the jury.

Conceding the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in not leaving the track before the car reached him, still the question whether, after his danger became apparent to the motorman he could have stopped the car and avoided the injury to Everett, was a question which alone could be determined by the jury.

Contributory negligence was not a defense in this case unless it was the direct and proximate cause of the injury, and it was for the jury to determine whether or not, notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the deceased, if he was negligent the defendant's servants were guilty of either a want of ordinary care or of careless and wanton conduct in not stopping the car after it appeared or should have appeared, to those in charge of the car, as reasonable men, that the deceased was in imminent danger, and that he apparently did not apprehend such danger; for it was then the duty of those in charge of the car to have brought the car under control and to stop the same, if necessary, in order to have prevented the injury.

The evidence was such that the jury might find that even though the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, yet that, after his danger became imminent and known to the person in charge of the car, he could by the exercise of reasonable diligence have stopped the car and prevented the injury, and there being evidence which would support such a theory of the case, it was proper to submit it to the jury.

A bicycle is a vehicle, and a person riding one upon the public highway has the same rights in so doing as persons using other vehicles.

Thompson v. Dodge, 58 Minn. 555, 28 L. R. A. 603.

The degree of care required of a person at the crossing of a highway of, or walking or driving upon, an ordinary steam railroad is not the test of care required in crossing the track of or driving or walking along a street railroad in a public street.

The law imposes upon the defendant the duty of employing competent and careful persons to manage and control its cars while running on its track, and it was the duty of the motorman in charge of the car to exercise proper care and keep a proper lookout in order to avoid, if possible, all accident and injury.

Where a motorman in charge of an electric car sees a person riding on a bicycle on the track ahead of him, having crossed over to such track to avoid a car approaching from the opposite direction, and after having sounded an alarm by ringing the bell, the person on the bicycle pays no attention to the alarm given and to all appearance has no knowledge of the approach of the car behind him, and all these facts are obvious to the man in charge of the car, and he still continues to run his car at a rate of speed of 12 miles an hour or thereabouts with a heavily loaded train without any attempt to check the speed of his car or to bring it under control, or to prepare to stop if necessary to avoid a collision until he is so near the person that it is impossible by the use of the appliances at his command to stop his car and avoid an inevitable collision,—such conduct on the part of the motorman is wilful and wanton—it is deliberate.

On petition for rehearing.

The decision of department is rested solely upon the erroneous assumption that it was negligence per se for the deceased to travel with his bicycle upon that portion of the public highway occupied by the tracks of the street-railway company, and that the company's duty to avoid running him down and killing him was no greater than that of a steam railroad company to a trespasser upon its tracks. This is not, and in the very nature of things cannot be, true.

It is no part of the plaintiff's case to prove an absence of contributory negligence, but contributory negligence is defensive matter the burden of affirmatively proving which is upon the defendant.

Instead of appellant being relieved from the exercise of proper care by reason of its use of electricity rather than horses for the purpose of moving its cars, the dangerous character of electricity as a motive power imposed upon the servants of the appellants the duty of exercising additional care and foresight to avoid injury to travelers upon the highway.

The motorman of appellant did not discharge the duty of the company to the deceased by merely ringing the bell and sounding the gong, but when it became apparent to the motorman that the deceased did not hear or pay any attention to the signals given it was his duty to bring his car under control, and even to stop it, if necessary, to avoid a collision; and his failure to do so was actionable negligence on the part of appellant.

J. L.) 38 Atl. 404.

Van Fleet, J., filed the following opinion: Verdict and judgment were for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The action was by the widow and minor child of one Charles E. Everett, deceased, to recover damages for the death of the latter, caused by his being run over by an electric car operated by the defendant on its street railroad in the city of Los Angeles, and alleged to have been through defendant's negligence. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence in chief, defendant moved the court for a nonsuit, on the grounds, substantially, that the evidence wholly failed to show negligence on the part of the defendant, but did establish affirmatively that deceased came to his death through his own negligence, contributing directly and proximately thereto. The court denied the motion, to which ruling defendant excepted, and this exception constitutes the only material question in the case.

The evidence in behalf of plaintiffs tended to show that the deceased, at the time of the accident resulting in his death, which was on October 17, 1894, was forty years of age, in good health, and in full possession of his faculties, having good eyesight and unimpaired hearing.

He was an experienced rider of the bicycle, had owned one of those vehicles three or four years, and used it every day. On the date in question, about 1 o'clock in the afternoon, or a little thereafter, deceased was on his bicycle, riding along McClintock avenue, in a suburb of Los Angeles, known as "University," on a portion of the street where ran a double line of defendant's railway, one line used for south-bound and the other for northbound cars. He was going south at the time, and traveling at the rate of about 6 miles an hour. Following him, and going in the same direction on the south-bound track, was a train of defendant's cars, consisting of an electric motor car and a trailer, heavily loaded with passengers going out to the race track. This train was running at its ordinary rate of about 10 miles an hour. When deceased was first observed by those on the train, he was between a block and a half and two blocks ahead of the train, and was riding between the rails of the north-bound track.

He continued on this track for some distance, when he crossed over to the south-bound track, apparently to avoid an approaching car going north, and continued on his course, riding between the rails of the latter track. At this time he was something over half a block in advance of the south-bound train, but the latter was rapidly overtaking him; and when the north-bound car passed him, which was at a point a short distance south of where the south-bound train then was, passengers on the former, evidently noting the rapid approach of the train, called out a warning to deceased to apprise him of danger; and at about the same time, when the train was within from 20 to 40 feet from him (the estimates of the witnesses varying on this point), the motorman on the latter rang his gong, and, together with several of the passengers, cried out to deceased to "get off the track," "look out," and other words of like import. These warnings, although distinctly heard by a witness standing on the street some four or five times as far from the train as deceased then was, were either unheard by him, or totally unheeded, as he was not observed to look back or turn his head, or attempt to turn or increase the speed of his bicycle. Thereupon the motorman, when within about 10 to 20 feet of deceased, reversed the current, and applied the brakes, and endeavored to stop the train, but did not succeed in time to avoid running deceased down; and he was struck by the motor, and killed. At no time from the time he was first seen riding ahead of the train was deceased observed to turn his head or look back, until just as the train was upon him, when he partly turned his head, and turned his wheel a little to the right, but not sufficient to get out of the way. University is a settled suburb of Los Angeles, laid out in blocks, crossed and intersected by public streets, and the point where deceased was killed was at the intersection of McClintock avenue with Thirty-Seventh street. Deceased was not a resident of Los Angeles, but had been there for about a week, more or less, before the accident, stopping at the house of a relative on Thirty-Ninth street, off McClintock avenue, south of Thirty-Seventh street and the point where he was killed. During his sojourn he had been in the habit of riding back and forth to and from the city on his bicycle, and, when on McClintock avenue, would ride on the railroad tracks, as it was smoother for travel between the rails than on the outside, where the space was narrow and rough and a poor road for the bicycle, by reason of the condition of the street. At points on McClintock avenue the soil was sandy, and had receded somewhat from the rails, so as to leave the latter in places standing a little above the surface of the street; but what the condition was in this respect at or in the immediate vicinity of the accident was not made to appear. At the date in question, races were in progress at the race track, situated south of the scene of the deceased's death; and, owing to the increased travel, extra cars were being run by defendant, and at shorter intervals than at other times, but whether the train which killed deceased was an extra or running on regular time was not shown. The motorman in charge of the train had been in the employment of defendant about two weeks. For the first ten or twelve days he was under instruction from an experienced motorman, and was then put in charge of a motor, and had been so employed some four or five days at the time of the accident. The statements of the witnesses vary considerably as to how far the train was from deceased when the motorman commenced ringing his alarm gong. A number of them show no recollection on the subject, but, taken as a whole, the evidence tends strongly to indicate that the gong was being sounded before the motorman and passengers commenced to call out to deceased to get out of the way. There is a like difference as to just when the brakes were applied, and whether the speed of the train was slackened any before the deceased was struck. The head end of the motor passed the point where deceased was struck between 20 and 80 feet before the train came to a full stop, and the evidence tended to show that it could have been stopped in a shorter distance. There was also some evidence tending to show that the wind was coming from the southeast; at what velocity does not appear, but that it was calculated to deaden to some extent any sound in deceased's rear.

This is substantially the case made by the evidence in behalf of plaintiffs upon the points material for our consideration. It can scarcely be made a question in the case—indeed, we do not understand it to be seriously controverted—but that the conduct of the deceased under the circumstances narrated constituted negligence on his part in the highest degree, and such as, standing alone, would necessarily preclude a recovery for his death. In walking or riding along a line of railway where cars or trains are passing, or likely to pass, at short intervals, one while in a position to be endangered by such vehicles must pay attention to his surroundings, and employ his natural faculties, and exert due diligence to avoid such danger. He must listen and look to ascertain whether danger is threatened by his situation and a failure so to do constitutes negligence per se. This principle is settled by a practically unbroken line of decisions in this and other states. One or two of the latest expressions upon the subject by this court, in cases where the rule is fully discussed and authorities cited, may be given as aptly stating and applying the doctrine. In Kenna v. Central P. R. Co. 101 Cal. 26, it is said: "It is a fixed rule that it is the duty of any one when attempting to cross a railroad track upon a highway to be vigilant, to look and to listen before attempting to cross, and a failure to do so is regarded as such negligence on his part as to preclude a recovery. Glascock v. Central P. R. Co. 78 Cal. 187. With greater reason does the principle of this rule apply to one who is traveling laterally along the route of a railroad, and knows that engines will soon follow. 'It is negligence for a person to walk upon the track of a railroad, whether laid in the street or upon the open field; and he who deliberately does so will be presumed to assume the risk of the perils he may encounter,'"—citing a large number of cases. In Holmes v. South Pac. Coast R. Co. 97 Cal. 161, where the person for whose death it was sought to recover was killed while walking along the railroad track near a station, while waiting for the train which ran him down, and when it appeared that deceased did not look out for the approach of the train, which he could have seen in time to get out of the way, the court says: "A railroad track upon which trains are constantly run is itself a warning to any person who has reached years of discretion, and who is possessed of ordinary intelligence, that it is not safe to walk upon it, or near enough to it to be struck by a passing train, without the exercise of constant vigilance, in order to be made aware of the approach of a locomotive, and thus be enabled to avoid receiving injury; and the failure of such a person so situated, with reference to the railroad track, to exercise such care and watchfulness, and to make use of all his senses, in order to avoid the danger incident to such situation, is negligence per se. The following are a few of many cases which might be cited to sustain this proposition: Harlan v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 64 Mo. 480; Id., on rehearing, 65 Mo. 22; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Depew, 40 Ohio St. 121; Kelley v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 75 Mo. 188; Glascock v. Central P. R. Co. 78 Cal. 187." Nor is there any distinction, in the application of this doctrine, between an electric or cable line operated upon the public streets of a city, and that of an ordinary steam railway operated upon the right of way of the corporation. While the deceased had the undoubted right to a reasonable use of the public street, notwithstanding its occupancy by defendant's tracks, he could not ignore or disregard the rights of the latter in the premises, nor neglect to take reasonable precautions for his own safety. If he chose to make use of the part of the street occupied by the tracks, it was his duty to look out for and endeavor to avoid the dangers incident to such use. In Haight v. New York C. R. Co. 7 Laus. 11, speaking of this rule, the court says it is said by counsel for plaintiff that, while this may be the rule in regard to steam railways, it cannot be applied to street railways. In Carson v. Federal Street & P. V. R. Co. 147 Pa. 219, 15 L. R. A. 257, it was held that failure to look for approaching cars on the part of one about to drive across the tracks of an electric street railway company is such contributory negligence as will prevent his recovery for injuries received by colliding with a car. The court said: "If, by looking, the plaintiff could have seen and so avoided an approaching train, and this appears from his own evidence he may be properly nonsuited." In Ward v. Rochester Electric R. Co. 43 N. Y. S. R. 84, it appeared that plaintiff's intestate was fatally injured while attempting to drive across a street-railway track. There was evidence that, at any time before reaching the track, deceased, by a glance, could have informed himself of the approach of the car, but that he drove onto the track without looking in either direction. It was held that he was guilty of contributory negligence. In Creamer v. West-End Street R. Co. 153 Mass. 820, 16 L. R. A. 490, the supreme court of that state held that where a person stepped from a horse car at the junction of two streets, and immediately started to cross the track of an electric road, without looking or listening, and was run over by the electric car running at the rate of 15 miles an hour, there could be no recovery, because the deceased was not exercising due care. We see no more reason for applying the rule that one must look and listen before crossing the tracks of a steam railway than that one must look and listen before crossing a street-car track upon which the motive power is electricity or the cable. See also Bailey v. Market Street Cable R. Co. (No. 16,004; decided by this court December 10, 1895) 110 Cal. 820. When the evidence discloses a failure to take such reasonable precautions for one's own safety, it constitutes negligence in law, and is not a question to be submitted to the jury.

This brings us to the only other consideration arising: Does the evidence tend to show such negligence on the part of defendant, contributing to the death of deceased, as would in law authorize a recovery, notwithstanding the negligence of the deceased? We find nothing in the evidence to sustain this view. The case is not like one where the injured party is discovered in time lying or standing upon a railroad track, under such circumstances as to make it doubtful whether he can or will get out of the way; or where one is seen attempting, either on foot or otherwise, to make a crossing, or passing along or on its track over a bridge or narrow causeway, or in a deep cut or tunnel, where to turn aside would be either dangerous or impossible; or under other circumstances of similar character. In such instances it may be conceded that the driver of the engine or motor would not be justified in law in proceeding without effort to stop his vehicle up to the point of collision. Persons cannot be recklessly or wantonly run down on a railroad track, however negligent themselves, where the circumstances are such as to convey to the mind of a reasonable man a question as to whether they will be able to get out of the way. But the evidence has no tendency to make such a case. Here the deceased was in full and open view of the approaching train for several blocks, and had perfect opportunity and ability to apprise himself of its coming. He was upon a swift and noiseless vehicle, which, as a matter of common knowledge, can be made with very little effort, under a rider of ordinary strength and experience, to attain a much higher rate of speed than that with which the cars were progressing, and which, furthermore, is susceptible, by a mere pressure of the hand, to turn aside instantly,—in much less time, indeed, than a pedestrian could step aside,—so as to completely avoid an object no wider than a street car. He was upon level ground, and, assuming that the surface was too rough or the space too narrow outside the railroad tracks for him to safely turn that way, there was nothing, so far as appears, to prevent his return to the other track or to the space between the tracks. In fact, he had but a few moments before crossed from one track to the other to avoid a like danger, and had been seen to do so by the motorman on the train. Under these circumstances, we think it perfectly clear that the latter was justified, reasoning in the line we have suggested, in keeping on his course, and assuming that the deceased, obeying the most ordinary dictates of prudence, had made himself aware of the approach of the train, and would either increase his speed or turn aside in time to avoid the danger which threatened him. In Holmes v. South Pac. Coast R. Co. supra, it is said: "As the deceased was a man of mature years, and nothing to indicate that he was not able to take care of himself,—as he was in fact,—the engineer might reasonably believe that he knew of its approach, and would, in obedience to the ordinary instinct of self-preservation, move away from the track before being overtaken by the engine. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 279." See also Cambell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 55 Kan. 586. The motorman was not required to assume that the deceased would continue his negligent conduct to a point which would endanger his life or limb, and it was not negligence in the driver, under the circumstances, to indulge the presumption that the deceased would get out of the way, up to the last moment. There is nothing in the circumstances to indicate any wantonness or recklessness on the part of the engineer, or that he did not take all the precautions to warn the deceased and to stop his train that would have been suggested to one more experienced, or to any other reasonable mind.

But, were it to be conceded that the evidence disclosed a case tending to show negligence on the part of defendant's servants, the plaintiffs could not recover under the circumstances of this case. The rule which renders a defendant liable for injuries, notwithstanding some negligence on the part of the plaintiff or the person injured, can only apply "in those cases where such negligence was the remote, and not the proximate, cause of the injury, that is, where the negligent acts of the parties are independent of each other, the act of the person injured preceding that of the defendant." Holmes v. South Pac. Coast R. Co. supra. In that case, quoting from O'Brien v. McGlinchey, 68 Me. 552, it is said: "But in cases falling within the foregoing description, where the negligent acts of the parties are distinct and independent of each other, the act of the plaintiff preceding that of the defendant, it is considered that the plaintiff's conduct does not contribute to produce the injury, if, notwithstanding his negligence, the injury could have been avoided by the use of ordinary care at the time by the defendant. This rule applies usually in cases where the plaintiff or his property is in some position of danger from a threatened contact with some agency under the control of the defendant when the plaintiff cannot and the defendant can prevent an injury. . . . But this principle would not govern where both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault, and by their mutual carelessness an injury ensues to one or both of them." See also Hager v. Southern P. Co. 98 Cal. 809; Errey v. Southern P. Co. 103 Cal.

54. The rule can never apply to a case where, as here, the negligence of the party injured continued up to the very moment of the injury, and was a contributing and efficient cause thereof; for it is apparent that, by the slightest care and effort on the part of the deceased, he could have put himself out of danger up to the last moment before he was struck.

Our conclusion is that the plaintiffs did not make out a case entitling them to recover, and that the refusal of the trial court to grant the motion for nonsuit was error. It may be added that an examination of the evidence on the part of the defendant serves only to strengthen the case as to the negligence of the deceased, and the absence of negligence on the part of the defendant, and makes it clear that the court should have granted defendant's request to instruct the jury to find for the latter. It follows that the judgment and order must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Upon further consideration of this cause in banc, we adhere to the views expressed in the opinion filed in department 1 (48 Pac. 207), and for the reasons therein given the judgment and order are reversed.

Temple, J., dissenting:

I dissent. This action was for damages for the death of Charles E. Everett, which was caused by a car of defendant. The main question presented on this appeal is whether this court can say, as matter of law, that the deceased was guilty of negligence which contributed proximately to his injury, in the face of the verdict of the jury, which is in favor of the plaintiffs, who are heirs at law of the deceased. This is not a question as to what the evidence, taken as a whole, may be considered fairly to establish, or whether the facts which we think plainly established by the evidence show such negligence on the part of the deceased, but whether the conclusion of the jury could be rationally drawn from the evidence. And this must be determined, also, in view of the exclusive province of the jury to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses. The facts may be stated thus: Deceased was an experienced bicycle rider, about forty years old, in the possession of all his faculties, and familiar with the operation of the street railway. At least, he lived in the vicinity, and had often been on this street. Defendant had two tracks on McClintock avenue, there being 7½ feet between them. It was in the suburbs of Los Angeles, and the street was unfinished. Outside of the two tracks the ground was higher, and too rough for travel on foot or on bicycles. The rails were raised some 2 inches above the roadbed. Just before the accident deceased was seen on the north-bound track, going south. He was going at the rate of 6 miles per hour. On the south-bound track a car was following at the rate of 10 miles per hour. At that time a car was approaching on the north-bound track, and, although it was not so near as the car which was approaching from behind, deceased turned, evidently to avoid it, to the south-bound track, and in front of the nearer car on that track. At about a block and a half away, the motorman of the south-bound car rang his bell "good and hard," to warn deceased of his danger. Upon this subject the motorman testified as follows: "I was the motoneer in charge of car No. 109 at the time Mr. Everett was killed. When I first observed him, I was about two blocks away from him, I should think. I just turned around the curve off from Olin onto McClintock avenue. He was on a wheel, on the north-bound track. I was on the south-bound track. He traveled on the north-bound track, I should think, a block and a half or two blocks; something like that. Then he crossed over onto our track, the south-bound track. When he crossed over, he was about a block and a half or two blocks ahead of me. We were going considerably faster than he was. I did not notice him look back. I saw him all the time after I left the curve. I had been ringing the bell, off and on, ever since I left the curve at Olin street. I rang the bell for the purpose of giving notice to the man on the bicycle. I should think I was then a block away from him, when I was ringing it good and hard. I had been ringing it for about two blocks constantly. When I rang the bell purposely to give him notice, I might not have been as far as a block away from him. He did not do anything when I rang, in regard to looking back, but kept right on. I called out to him when I was within about 50 feet of him, I should think. I do not remember what I said. When I was within about 30 or 50 feet of him, I threw off my currents and applied my brakes, and reversed my car, and did all that I could to stop the car from that time. I attempted to stop the car because I didn't think he heard me. I supposed all the time he did, until that time. Immediately before I put on the brakes, I rang the bell as hard as I could. Other persons called out to him besides myself; everybody in the front end of the car. There was a big crowd there, and a heavy load on the train. They called out as loud as they could hullo. He paid no attention to them. If he was a man of good hearing, he must have heard the noise. There was enough noise made in the front of that car to raise the dead, I should think. He made no attempt to get off the track at all, that I saw. I did not attempt to stop my car sooner because I expected every minute to see him get out of the road. It is the general custom of people riding bicycles to get out of the road. They generally manage to get out of the road. There is no difficulty in a man getting out of the road, if nothing is in the way." On cross-examination this witness said: "When I first began to ring my bell to warn him, I must have been a couple of blocks away, and I kept on ringing it. He paid no attention to the ringing of the bell, and did not seem to know that I was coming behind him. I did not slacken speed at that time." The south bound train was not so near as the north-bound train, but its passengers called to deceased, and made signs to him, trying to warn him of his danger. The north-bound train had not passed when the accident occurred, but stopped on the happening of the accident, something like 100 feet away. The motorman testified that he reversed the current 80 or 50 feet before the car struck the deceased, but several other witnesses testified that speed was not slackened at all till it struck the deceased, and some that the current was reversed some 5 feet away. There was testimony to the effect that the car moved from 50 to 60 feet before it was stopped, after the accident. Upon this question of distance there was a conflict. Upon the day of the accident more cars than usual were run on this road, because of races. There was a strong wind from the south, which would tend to prevent the deceased from hearing.

Now, Everett was guilty of gross negligence in going upon the south-bound track without looking to see if a car was dangerously near. But he was not a trespasser there, and, in my opinion, he had just the same right to believe that, if a car did approach from behind, it would not run over him, but would stop or slacken its speed, and see that he did have fair warning and an opportunity to get out of the way, that the motorman would have had to suppose he would leave the track and avoid the danger, if it had been obvious that Everett knew the true state of affairs. The real question is, however, Admitting the negligence of Everett, within the rule applicable to such cases, was it the proximate cause of the injury? or, rather, whether the jury could not reasonably draw any other conclusion from the evidence than that his negligence contributed proximately to the injury. The rule upon this subject is thus stated by Mr. Justice Sander-son in Needham v. San Francisco & S. J. R. Co. 87 Cal. 409, as follows: "Therefore, if there be negligence on the part of the plaintiff, yet if at the time when the injury was committed it might have been avoided by the defendant in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, an action will lie for the injury."

The rule is stated with equal clearness by Mr. Justice Garoutte in Earey v. Southern P. Co. 108 Cal. 541. He said: "By her own negligence she placed herself in a position of danger, but defendant was aware of her danger and did not exercise ordinary care to protect her from the danger that surrounded her. Under these conditions the law gives the injured person a right of action. This right of action is based upon the principle that a failure to exercise ordinary care by a defendant under such circumstances amounts to a degree of reckless conduct that may well be termed wilful and wanton; and when an act is done wilfully and wantonly, contributory negligence upon the part of the person injured is not an element which will defeat a recovery. Some text-writers and courts declare the same principle in another form, by holding that under these circumstances the contributory negligence of the party injured is not the proximate cause of the injury, but that the negligence of the defendant, being the later negligence, is the sole proximate cause. As has been said by one of our law reviews: 'The party who last has a clear opportunity of avoiding the accident, notwithstanding the negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible.'"

Upon this question plaintiff contends that the most reasonable conclusion from the evidence is that the motorman knew a sufficient time before the car struck the deceased that he was unheeding, and did not know of his danger, and that Everett would inevitably be injured unless he slackened his speed. To sustain the verdict, it is only necessary to find that the motorman should have believed, from what he saw, that injury was likely to happen unless the speed was slackened. The defendant must maintain the position that there was no negligence on the part of the motorman, because he believed, and, notwithstanding what he knew, had a right to presume, that the deceased either knew of his danger, or would discover it in time to leave the track before injury resulted.

I have carefully examined the evidence, and I believe the conclusion reached by the jury is fully warranted by a preponderance of the evidence. And, if we apply the rule which has heretofore always obtained in such cases, I am unable to understand how anyone can reach the opposite view. It is, of course, true that there is evidence which will warrant a statement more favorable to the defendant than that which I have stated; but even upon the view most favorable to the defendant which can be drawn from the evidence, in my opinion it is plain that the motorman must have actually known that deceased was unheeding long enough before the injury to have slackened his car sufficiently to have prevented the injury. To do this, it would only have been necessary to have reduced the speed to 6 miles per hour from 10 miles per hour. If, as defendant claims, the motorman had attempted to stop when within 20 feet of deceased, he had then 50 feet within which to stop before the injury could occur, for while the car moved 10 feet Everett moved 6. This supposing that both continued at the same speed, but as soon as the car commenced to slow up the difference of speed would diminish; and, if the car had slowed a little, Everett would have escaped. The motorman testified that he commenced ringing good and hard a block away, and had rung off and on, from the time he was two blocks away. If we assume this distance to be 400 feet, he must have thus pursued Everett for 1,000 feet; and during all that time, according to his own testimony, Everett did not look back, and did not seem to know that he was approaching from behind. Several witnesses testified that, when about 40 feet away, a passenger called to the motorman that, if he did not stop, he would kill the man. After that time, according to the testimony, the car ran 100 feet before it struck the deceased. In fact, I cannot doubt that, had the motorman made an honest effort to stop the car when 5 feet away, Everett would not have been injured. Even from that point the car ran 12½ feet before it struck Everett, and, of course, as soon as the speed diminished the discrepancy of speed would be less. If these cars cannot be so handled, it is criminal to allow their use on the streets. I think it matter of common knowledge that they can be. Now, could this court say that the jury could not reasonably conclude from this evidence that, at some point of time when the injury could have been avoided, the motorman knew, or should have known, that Everett was un-heedings, and that injury was likely to result unless he checked his speed? Can we say, as matter of law, that such was not the fact?

It has been suggested that the rule invoked does not apply when the person injured is negligent at the very time of the injury, as it is claimed Everett was here. I deny that there is any such qualification of the rule, beyond this: that such negligence on the part of the plaintiff may contribute proximately to the injury. In such case the defendant would not be the last who had a clear opportunity to avoid the injury. If Everett did not know of his peril, he had no such opportunity. If one lies upon a railway track to sleep, and is injured, his negligence continues to the injury. But the rule has been held to apply to such a case. Williams v. Southern P. R. Co. 72 Cal. 120. On no question are the authorities more numerous, and I think it will be found that, in a vast majority of them, such was the case as fully as in the case at bar. One who does not know of his danger does not have the last opportunity to avoid the injury. If these views be correct, they furnish a complete answer to the contention of appellant that the motorman was guilty of no negligence, and that the accident was due wholly to the negligence of the deceased; for, conceding gross negligence on the part of Everett, in going upon the track and continuing there without looking back, still, if, as we must concede to the verdict, the motorman knew, as we must also concede, that he was ignorant of his danger, and after such knowledge the motorman could, by the use of ordinary diligence, have prevented the injury, defendant is liable. I am convinced that all these propositions are established in favor of the verdict, by a clear preponderance of the evidence.

It is really not necessary to discuss the rule by which the conduct of Everett should be tried, but I cannot permit the apparent claim that the same rule which has become crystallized into a rule of law in regard to crossings of steam-railway tracks applies here, to pass unchallenged. Negligence is always relative to circumstances, and the circumstances of the two cases vary greatly. It is true, a general statement as to the duty of those using the public highways may be made which will include all cases. All such persons are bound to use ordinary care to avoid injuring others, and to escape injury to themselves, and may expect the like care from others. What conduct this rule would dictate in any given case will depend upon the special facts of that case. One has no right to obstruct unnecessarily a street car, but he has no better right to obstruct any other vehicle. As to all, he is bound to use the same diligence not to delay. On the other hand, all are bound to use ordinary care not to obstruct or injure him, and he may use the street, relying upon such diligence on the part of others, including those in charge of street cars. If one were to step blindly into the street, closely in front of a push cart, and receive injury, his negligence would deprive him of a right of action. It was his duty to look and avoid danger. The same duty, and no other, rests upon him as to a street car; but as the danger is greater, and the conditions different, a different degree of diligence may be required. The rule in regard to a steam railroad, requiring that a person approaching a crossing must stop, look, and listen, implies that, if a train is imminent, he must stop until it passes. In such case it is not expected that the train will stop for him, and it would be unreasonable to require it. Not so as to street cars. As a hypothetical case, I may state that on Market street, in San Francisco, during a portion of every day, four cars per minute pass on the cable road any given point. There are two other tracks upon the street also operated. The track is thronged with trucks, drays, express wagons, and other vehicles. They have frequent occasion to pass from one side of the street to the other. It is safe to say that at such time such crossing generally stops a car upon each track of the cable road. Yet they have a right to cross, and to drive on the track, although a car is near at hand, and will be required to stop. In other words, the car must beat its way along, like any other vehicle in a crowded street. Neither should move so closely in front of another that a collision is likely to occur. All must use ordinary care not to obstruct others, and all may rely upon the use of that care on the part of others not to injure them. These considerations do not similarly affect a train on a steam railroad, even at the crossings; for the train is not expected to wait for others to pass, and its velocity and momentum would ordinarily prevent it. In conclusion, I wish to say that, in my opinion, if a man of ordinary prudence in the place of the motorman would have seen that perhaps Everett was not aware of his danger, and that injury might occur unless he stopped his car, then it was his duty to stop and make sure. I do not think the jury were misled to the injury of defendant by any instruction given, and in my opinion, the jury were fully instructed upon all points on which instructions were required by defendants. Judgment and order should be affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Emma J. VAN EPPS, Appt.,

v.

J. R. REDFIELD, Admr., etc., of John
O. Wasserbach, Deceased, et al.

1. A complaint alleging an agreement and promise to convey real estate is not demurrable because it does not expressly allege that the contract was in writing.
2. A relinquishment by the mother of a bastard child of her right to compel the father by legal proceedings to assist in the maintenance of the child, and her support and education of the child at her own separate expense, are a sufficient consideration for his promise to make a conveyance of real estate to her.
3. An agreement to convey real estate appraised at $3,800 in consideration of the release of the grantor from his liability with respect to a bastard child, when the amount of this burden does not appear, is not based on such an inadequate consideration that a bill for specific performance of the agreement to convey will be bad on demurrer, but the sufficiency of the consideration will be left for determination at the trial.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract to convey real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William B. Stoddard and Sylvester Barbour for appellant.

Mr. Charles E. Perkins, for appellees:

It is a fundamental principle of the doctrine of specific performance that a plaintiff has no right to call upon the court to exercise its power, but the court will always exercise its discretion whether to decree a performance or not.

FENN, J., delivered the opinion of the court:—

The original complaint in this action was demurred to, and said demurrer was sustained. Thereupon an amended complaint was substituted. This was also demurred to, and again the demurrer was sustained. Although the appeal assigns error in reference to both of these rulings, we need only to consider the last complaint and the last demurrer, on which all the questions properly presented arise. The cause of action alleged may be thus stated: John C. Wasserbach died September 12, 1895, leaving a considerable estate and a valid will. He also left one child, John C. Wasserbach, Jr. The estate is in settlement. Included in the inventory is a certain lot of land, described in the complaint, with dwelling house and other buildings thereon, situated in Hartford. Said child, John C. Wasserbach, Jr., was born May 20, 1884. The plaintiff is his mother. The deceased gave the child his own name, by which name such child has always been called, and said child was always recognized by said deceased, and adopted as his own child. The plaintiff and the deceased were never married. About the time of the birth of said child, "in consideration of the premises, and in consideration of the legal and moral obligation which the said Wasserbach, deceased, was under to the plaintiff, and in further consideration of the plaintiff's promise to, and agreement with said Wasserbach, deceased, not to enforce by legal proceedings her legal rights and claims against him, said Wasserbach, deceased, to compel him to pay her towards the support and maintenance of said child, John C. Wasserbach, Jr., said Wasserbach, deceased, in part performance of his obligation to the plaintiff, agreed with and promised her to purchase and convey to her the aforesaid real-estate premises. No. 14, Westland street, which property was formerly owned and occupied by members of the plaintiff's family and relatives of hers." The plaintiff, in fulfillment of her said promise to and agreement with said Wasserbach, deceased, has never commenced any legal proceedings against him to compel him to pay any part of the expense for the support and maintenance of said child, but has always supported, maintained, and educated said child at her own expense. After said promise and agreement said deceased, in pursuance thereof, on or about September 23, 1885, purchased said real estate, but took the title in his own name. Immediately after such purchase he informed the plaintiff that he had purchased said estate for her, according to his aforesaid promise and agreement, and delivered possession of said premises to the plaintiff, and informed her that said real-estate premises were her own property, to be owned by her in fee simple, and be occupied by her as a home for herself and said child; and the plaintiff entered into possession of said premises under a claim of ownership, and has ever since occupied and now occupies the same with said child under said claim of ownership. This she did with the knowledge and consent of said deceased. From time to time since the aforesaid purchase, and up to the time of his death, the deceased renewed his said promise to and agreement with the plaintiff, upon the consideration aforesaid, to convey to her the legal title to said real estate, and had partially made arrangements so to do in the summer of 1895, when he was suddenly killed by an accident, and never in fact did deliver to her a conveyance of said premises. The plaintiff claimed—First, specific performance; second, damages.

In addition to a demurrer to the relief sought the following grounds of demurrer were stated: "(1) Upon the allegations in the complaint, the agreement set up is not one which will be enforced in a court of equity, as not coming within the rules applicable to the specific performance of a verbal agreement relating to real estate. (2) Said complaint does not state any good and sufficient consideration for the said agreement therein asked to be enforced, as the consideration of the premises, and the legal and moral obligations the deceased was under to the plaintiff is not a sufficient statement of a sufficient consideration for said agreement. (3) It is not a sufficient allegation to support the alleged agreement that the plaintiff agreed not to enforce by legal proceedings, her legal rights and claims against the deceased to compel him to pay her towards the support and maintenance of said child, as such agreement, if ever made, would be invalid, under § 1209 of the General Statutes, without the consent or provision referred to in said section, and it is not alleged that such consent or provision was ever obtained. (4) Such agreement not to enforce said claim, if made, would not be a sufficient consideration, and would be contrary to public policy and void; nor would it have been an adequate consideration. (5) Said agreement alleged in said complaint, for the specific performance of which said suit is brought, was void as against public policy, and is not such a one as a court of equity will enforce." The demurrer to the legal relief, namely, damages claimed upon the complaint, was well taken and properly sustained by the court below for reasons fully stated by this court in Grant v. Grant, 68 Conn. 530-545. The demurrer to the claim for equitable relief by way of specific performance, should have been overruled, because that was the appropriate relief to be demanded upon the allegations of the complaint, provided these were sufficient to call for any relief whatever. Rules of Practice, 58 Conn. 567, § 11. We come, then, to the special grounds of demurrer which have been stated. It is perhaps to be regretted that we cannot regard the first of these grounds as presenting any question properly before us at this time for decision. We are not at liberty to say that the plaintiff relies upon "a verbal agreement relating to real estate." The record discloses that the defendants moved in the court below that the plaintiff make the original complaint more specific, by stating whether the promise and agreement alleged to have been made to her was in writing or verbal. This motion, the court, however, overruled. It is true that a considerable portion of the complaint consists of allegations apparently introduced to show sufficient part performance of an oral agreement to remove the operation of the statute of frauds. It is also true that a large part of the brief as well as the oral argument before us in behalf of the plaintiff was directed to the claim that the facts stated were sufficient to denote such valid part performance. But notwithstanding this we feel constrained to take the pleadings as they are, and to be limited in our decision to the issues as they are presented upon the record. This limitation prevents also the full application, as a test of the correctness of the decision of the court below, of the doctrines concerning discretionary power in the court, so fully urged upon us by counsel for the defendants. It is very apparent that the trial court, in deciding upon the demurrer, did so, not in the exercise of any actual or assumed discretion, but because, in the view of the law held by said court, a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, upon the allegations of the complaint, could not be vindicated or sustained, not because of discretion to so decide, but because it had, as it deemed, no discretion to do otherwise. If this be true, there was no occasion and no opportunity for the exercise of the power of discretion. If it be not true, the fact that such power did really exist does not justify a decision in no wise based upon it. It is not too much to say that there are cases where complaints may show what may be called (as it is called in Bispham on Equity, § 864) a prima facie right to come into equity to ask specific performance; but after coming into equity it may, upon a hearing of facts relevant under such complaint, and in support of its allegations, nevertheless appear that the contract is not so equitable, reasonable, certain, or on good, adequate, mutual consideration, consistent with policy, and free from fraud, suspicion, or mistake, that specific performance should be decreed. Patterson v.

Bloomer, 35 Conn. 57, 95 Am. Dec. 218. In such a case a demurrer to the complaint will not reach the difficulty in the way of the plaintiff's recovery, which the full trial on the merits will disclose. On such a trial the considerations which the defendants have urged upon us as reasons why the relief prayed for should, in the exercise of discretion, be denied, will doubtless receive, as they will merit, full attention and weight.

The third ground of the defendants' demurrer is not well taken, and was not pressed. Gen. Stat. § 1209, was not passed until 1887, and does not affect the validity of the alleged cause of action in this case.

The remaining grounds of demurrer present, in effect, only a single question: Does the complaint allege a contract founded upon sufficient consideration, consistent with public policy, which a court of equity, in the exercise of its discretion, can enforce? Concerning the allegations of consideration in the complaint, what the legal or moral obligations of a person to a child which such person caused to be called by his own name, and "always recognized and adopted as his own child," may be, it is unnecessary to inquire, since such child is in no sense a party to this suit. Nor is it essential to determine what obligation the said John C. Wasserbach, deceased, was under to the plaintiff, except so far as it enters into the question of the alleged consideration for the asserted agreement and promise to her. Upon the facts stated, he, the said Wasserbach, was at the time stated,—about the time of the birth of the child,—by virtue of the statute (now Gen. Stat. §§ 1206-1208), under a legal obligation to the plaintiff, enforceable by what are called "bastardy proceedings," based upon such statutory enactments. She thereby, and by reason of the premises, had a valid and lawful cause of action against him, to compel him to assist her in the maintenance of their child. The prescribed proceeding is of a civil nature, and the plaintiff mother, in such a suit, has the rights of a party in an ordinary civil action, and her interest in such suit is a pecuniary one. Hamden v. Merwin, 54 Conn. 418; Booth v. Hart, 43 Conn. 480-486; Robbins v. Smith, 47 Conn. 182-186. The complaint states that the plaintiff had the statutory right above referred to, and that in consideration of her promise and agreement not to enforce it by legal proceedings, but to support and educate the child without assistance from said Wasserbach, and at her own separate expense, he agreed and promised to convey to her the property in question. We cannot, in view of these allegations, indorse the claim of the defendants that "there is no suggestion here that there was any other consideration, legal or moral, than the fact of the illicit connection and the birth of the child," which assertion is made the basis of the claim that a past act is not a valid consideration, and that "a promise made in consideration of past illicit intercourse is void" unless, indeed, under seal. We will not discuss or express any opinion here concerning the soundness of these propositions, because it appears to us that the obligation relied upon has its sufficient basis in the legislative authority which created it, though, were it necessary, it would be easy to see that the provisions of such statutes are not opposed to, but in furtherance of, public policy, and in close accordance with the principles of natural justice.

But the defendants further claim that no liability as imposed by the statute arises unless the statutory provisions are followed. The case of Heath v. White, 5 Conn. 228, 235, was referred to, where this court said: "There is no possibility of deciding who is the father of a child begotten of a lewd woman. Her testimony is permitted to rise so high in the scale of probability as to subject him to a contribution towards the child's maintenance, not as the father in fact, but the putative father only." But surely, if the testimony of a lewd woman is permitted to rise so high in the scale of probability as to accomplish the effect stated, what shall be said of the altitude in the scale of such testimony when coupled with the facts alleged, that the asserted father gave the child his own name, by which such child was always called, and always recognized and adopted it as his own child? Truly, it cannot be claimed that this court meant to say in Heath v. White that the putative father only of an illegitimate child is liable to contribution, but that the real father is not. But it is said liability attaches only at the end of litigation of bastardy proceedings, which might be brought by the mother or by the town, and then only the amount would be fixed which the defendant should pay, either to her or to the town, for some indefinite time. It is further said that a promise on the part of the mother that she would not commence the suit would not terminate the liability of the deceased. As we have before said, the effect which the provisions of Gen. Stat. §§ 1209, 1210, might have had, if such statute had been in existence in 1884, is not involved, since such enactment was not made until 1887. But the very provisions of those sections appear clearly to recognize the authority of the mother, prior to that time, to effect a settlement, and the object of the statute was to limit and qualify that before-existing right. But it is further to be noticed that the complaint alleges that a part of the promise which the plaintiff made and fulfilled was to relieve the deceased, not alone from his obligation to her, but from the burden of the support, maintenance, and education of the child; thus in this way, at least, doing what would "terminate the liability of the deceased."

But finally, the defendants claim that the real question is whether the court, as a court of equity, will say that the consideration stated is such an adequate and sufficient one that under the circumstances of the case it will enforce the specific performance of the alleged agreement. But regarding this claim, for reasons which we have already somewhat considered in another connection, we do not feel at liberty to base a decision in the defendants' favor upon it, as the case now stands. It is alleged in the complaint that the appraised value of the real estate claimed is $3,300. What the amount of the burden from which the plaintiff relieved the deceased by her promise and undertaking was, or would have been, does not appear. The trial would probably disclose much material information bearing upon this question of which we are ignorant. We can only refer to general principles applicable to the matter. In Grant v. Grant, 63 Conn. 540, 541, the cases of Wallace v. Rappleye, 103 Ill. 229, and Woods v. Evans, 118 Ill. 186, are quoted from and approved. The principle is affirmed that "specific performance of a verbal contract affecting real estate will not be decreed except upon due and conclusive proof of its existence and terms, and that the contract must be certain, equal, and fair, founded upon a valuable as distinguished from a merely good or moral consideration, and that, so proved, it is not a matter of right, but of sound discretion." Such discretion, in such a case so proved, pertains, at least in the first instance, to the trial court, guided also by what is further said by the court in the citation above given,—that such claims as the present "are always dangerous, and when they rest on parol evidence they should be strictly scanned."

There is error in the judgment complained of, and it is reversed.*

The other Judges concur.

*This case went back for a new trial and the trial judge, Wheeler, made a finding of facts in substantial conformity to the allegations of the complaint, and decided in favor of the plaintiff, filing the following memorandum of decision:

The facts set up in the second count are abundantly proved.

Disinterested witnesses of established character, friends of the deceased, testify that at the time he purchased this property in question he said it was to be the plaintiff's. He repeated to different persons the same thing, and only two months before his death he told General Harrison that he had given the plaintiff these premises. The evidence is overwhelming and absolutely convincing that the deceased purchased these premises for the plaintiff and down to his death regarded them as hers. The evidence is entirely satisfactory that the plaintiff has maintained, supported, and educated the boy, and that the deceased loved him greatly and had great pride in him, and the appearance of the boy would entirely justify such a pride. It was equally clear that the deceased had up to his death affection for the plaintiff. He said to General Harrison she had been a good friend to him and done all for him she could.

This was no ordinary case of illicit connection. The only essential fact which rests upon the plaintiff's testimony was that she agreed to support the child at her own expense if he would deed to her these premises. That he agreed to deed the premises there can be no doubt and corroborated as this woman's story is on all sides, and uncontradicted, I must find that she speaks the truth when she says the consideration of these premises was to be her support and maintenance of the child.

The questions of law raised by the defendant were these:

1. There was no consideration to support the claimed agreement.

2. The agreement was a parol one and within the statute of frauds.

3. There was no part performance to take the case out of the statute.

4. The case was one which no court of equity ought to enforce.

5. The case was against public policy.

When this case was before the supreme court upon a decision sustaining a demurrer to the first count of this action the court held that by reason of the statute (Gen. Stat. §§ 1206-1208) Wasserbach was under a legal obligation to the plaintiff enforceable by what are called bastardy proceedings; that such an action was of a civil nature and the plaintiff's interest in such suit was a pecuniary one. Further the plaintiff had a right to effect a settlement with him of his statutory obligation to her. Further, that relieving him from the burden of the support, maintenance, and education of the child would thus terminate his liability.

The evidence disclosed that the plaintiff did agree with him to terminate his liability under the statute by agreeing to support and maintain the child, and that she has kept her agreement by supporting, maintaining, and educating the child. He agreed in consideration of her agreement to thus terminate his liability that he would purchase certain property and deed it to her, that she might have a home for herself and the child.

We think that this agreement on her part is a sufficient consideration to maintain such an agreement on his part. We think that our court has so decided when this case was before it, and the authorities would support such a decision if it were adjudicated in our courts. Hook v. Pratt, 78 N. Y. 376, 377, 84 Am. Rep. 539.

The English cases cited in this opinion are decisive of the law of England upon the validity of an agreement by a putative father to pay a sum of money in consideration of the support of the child being furnished by the mother of the child. Ibid.; Todd v. Weber, 36 N. Y. 159, 47 Am. Rep. 20, and the many cases cited and full discussion therein.

This case cites with approval Hook v. Pratt, supra. Ibid.; note to Simmons v. Bull, 66 Am. Dec. 260, and large number of English cases cited; Hargrove v. Freeman, 12 Ga. 345; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 5th ed. § 279, and note 6, p. 242.

A child at common law is under no liability to support his parents. By statute he may be. A promise to pay for future support furnished will be upheld. Stone v. Stone, 22 Conn. 144; Graves v. Atwood, 52 Conn. 512, 52 Am. Rep. 310.

An equal, if not stronger, case, is the agreement of the father of a child to pay for support furnished the child by the mother. It was urged that no part performance had been shown sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds, but I cannot regard the evidence in this case as leaving this question in doubt.

The case of Andrew v. Babcock, 65 Conn. 120-124, is conclusive upon this point.

"The case seems to be sustained by a wholesome public policy and to represent such a state of facts as must appeal to the conscience of a court to carry out the certain wishes of the dead in his desire to do tardy and inadequate justice."

APPEAL by defendants, from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Joseph County in an action brought to recover back money paid by plaintiff to defendant Sandage for a patent and to enjoin defendants from prosecuting suits in another state to enforce further payments of moneys due under the contract of sale. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only questions arising and argued by appellants in this appeal are those based upon the alleged error of the court in overruling their separate motions for a new trial. Two principal propositions are presented for our consideration by appellants' learned counsel, namely: (1) That the decision of the court is not sustained by sufficient evidence, and is also contrary to law; (2) that the court erred in excluding certain evidence of the appellant Joshua Sandage. Appellee, by this action, sought to recover a certain sum of money paid by it to appellant Sandage in the purchase of letters patent for an improvement in steel skeins, and to enjoin him, together with his coappellant, the Sandage Steel-Skein Company, from bringing or further prosecuting suits in the courts of Cook county, in the state of Illinois, upon certain contracts in writing, mentioned in the complaint, and for the cancelation of these contracts. The complaint is in two paragraphs and the following is, substantially, a correct summary of the facts, as alleged in this pleading: Appellants, at and long before the commencement of this action were residents, and had their domicils, at the city of South Bend, Indiana. Appellee is a corporation, also having its domicil at said city, long prior to the instituting of this action, and is there engaged in the business of manufacturing wagons and carriages. On July 19, 1882, appellant Sandage was the owner of certain letters patent for an improvement of steel axle skeins, issued to him by the government of the United States. On the date mentioned he sold and transferred these letters patent to the appellee by a contract in writing executed by him and appellee. By this contract the latter agreed to manufacture the patented skein, and to employ Sandage as a foreman in its factory for a period of two years, at a salary of $1,500 per year, and to pay him $2,000 in cash, and one third of the net profits arising from the manufacture of the skeins, until he should receive $20,000. Sandage agreed to also assign to the company any improvements which he might make in the patent, and in the contract he guaranteed the validity of the letters, and agreed to pay all costs and expenses in enforcing and sustaining the same, and to defend the appellee in all suits for infringements, and to pay all costs and expenses occasioned thereby. Upon the execution of this contract, and the transfer of these letters to appellee, it erected buildings and provided machinery, and engaged in the making and selling of the steel skeins; and Sandage was taken into its employ for two years, as per agreement. He was paid his stipulated salary, also $2,000 in cash, and, in addition, appellee paid him $7,000 in profits accruing up to 1886, as the consideration for the sale and assignment of the patent. On November 20, 1886, the parties executed what was termed a "supplemental contract," whereby they changed the original agreement by providing that Sandage, as a final and additional compensation for, and in consideration of, his letters patent, and any improvement he might make thereon during the life of the patent, should be paid by the appellee the sum of $18,000, to be payable as follows, to wit: January 1, 1888, $4,000; January 1, 1889, $3,000; January 1, 1890, $4,000; January 1, 1891, $2,000. It was further provided in this supplemental contract that in the event that appellee was compelled to defend its right and title to the patent, or if it should find it necessary to prosecute persons for infringements between November 26, 1886, and January 1, 1891,—the date of the last payment,—then and in that event the reasonable expenses of these suits should be paid by Sandage, to an amount not to exceed the final payment of $2,000; but, in the event the appellee brought a suit and was defeated, appellants were not to be held liable for the costs of such suit. It was also stipulated that: "So much of the agreement made between the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company and Joshua Sandage on the 19th day of July, 1882, as relates to the payment by the said Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company to the said Sandage of moneys for and in consideration of his letters patent herein indicated, or which is in any way inconsistent with this agreement, is hereby repealed and made of no effect. The other particulars of said first agreement to continue and remain in full effect." On January 8, 1888, appellee paid Sandage $4,000, being the instalment due, under the supplemental agreement, on the 1st of that month. After receiving said sum, appellant, in November, 1889, made an assignment of both the aforesaid contracts to his coappellant, the Sandage Steel-Skein Company. The second instalment, of $3,000, was not paid at maturity; and the latter company, claiming to be the holder of these contracts, by virtue of an assignment to them by Sandage, brought an action in the circuit court of Cook county, Illinois, upon the contract, in the name of Joshua Sandage, for its use, against appellee, to recover this unpaid instalment. In 1890, after the second instalment of money specified in the second or supplemental contract had become due, and which appellee had refused to pay, the Sandage Steel-Skein Company commenced a second action in the same court against appellee to recover this latter instalment. After the assignment of these contracts to said steel-skein company, and the commencement of these actions, in January, 1890, appellee began a suit in the circuit court of the United States, at Chicago, Illinois, against the Illinois Iron-Bolt Company, for an infringement of said patent, and on January 27, 1890, served both of the appellants with notice to the effect that such an action had been commenced in that court, and that the validity of the patent would be assailed and in issue therein, and requested that said parties assist in said cause, in defending the validity of the letters patent; claiming an estoppel against them by any judgment that might be rendered therein against the validity of the patent. At the March term, 1890, of said United States court, in said action, these letters, by that court, were adjudged and held to be invalid, for want of novelty. Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Illinois Iron & Bolt Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 52. Thereupon, on May 16, 1890, appellee executed and tendered to appellant Joshua Sandage a reassignment of said letters, and a cancelation of said contracts, and requested him to repay to it the sum of $20,000, all of which was refused by him. A like demand for cancelation of said contracts was made upon the Sandage Steel-Skein Company, which was also refused. That, in addition to the two suits already commenced by said skein company against appellee, said company was threatening to bring other actions on these contracts in the courts of Illinois, and attach appellee's property situated in that state. Sandage, at the time of the sale of the patent right to the appellee, had wholly failed and neglected to comply with the requirements of §§ 6054, 6055, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 8130, 8131), in relation to the sale of patent rights, and sold his said patent to appellee in violation of this statute. The supreme court of Illinois having held a statute of that state in relation to patents (being one similar to the statute cited above) void on the ground that it violated the Federal Constitution, it is averred that the appellants have resorted to the courts of Illinois in order to escape the laws of Indiana on that subject. It is also averred that after this action was commenced, and a temporary restraining order was granted against the appellants, that they made a sale of these contracts in suit to a resident of Chicago, Illinois. It is also shown that the tender of a reassignment of this patent was continued by bringing the same into court for appellants' use. These are the conspicuous facts, as presented by the record in this action. A trial upon the issues joined, in the lower court, resulted in a judgment to the effect that appellants be perpetually enjoined from prosecuting or commencing any suit or suits for the purpose of enforcing the contracts in question, and that the same be canceled and delivered up to the appellee, and that appellee recover of Joshua Sandage the sum of $13,447.42 and costs.

One of the contentions of appellants is that "the facts in this case, as alleged in the pleadings and as shown by the proofs, do not make such a case as entitled the appellee to the equitable relief prayed in the petition, and granted by the decree." Upon the contrary, appellee contends that the evidence fully authorized and justified the court in finding that the appellants commenced their suit in the state of Illinois for the purpose of evading the laws of Indiana, and thereby gaining an advantage over the appellee in the forum of a sister state. We have examined the evidence in the record, and are of the opinion that it establishes the facts alleged in the complaint, and sustains the finding and judgment of the court. It is insisted by counsel for the appellants that the alleged facts in the case at bar are a complete and adequate defense at law to the actions commenced upon the contracts in controversy in the courts of Illinois. Conceding this contention, however, can it be urged, consistent with reason, that this principle of equity can be invoked to require appellee, under the facts, to go into the courts of another state, and there assail these contracts by pleading the facts in bar to the actions therein pending? This contention cannot be sustained upon any reasonable grounds. It is, however, a familiar rule that it is not sufficient that there is a remedy at law but the same must be plain and adequate, and as practical and efficient to the ends of justice, and its prompt administration, as is the remedy in equity. It is manifest, we think, that had appellee been compelled to avail itself of the facts on which it based its cause of action in this case, as a cause of defense to the suits already commenced by the appellee, or to the others that they might institute upon the obligation in question, its remedy would not have been as adequate and efficient as the one invoked in this cause. Two actions had been commenced upon the alleged invalid contract, and another was threatened, in order to recover the instalment of $2,000 not yet matured. By waiting to contest, by way of defense, the right of appellants to enforce these payments of money under this contract, appellee might have been at least harassed by and subjected to repeated and vexatious litigation, and much expense incident thereto, by appellants, or those to whom they might have assigned the contract in controversy. By appealing to a court of equity, the remedy was at once adequate and complete, and by one action all the relief to which appellee was entitled under the facts could be awarded.

Counsel further contend that appellee was not entitled to have this contract rescinded until it had placed Sandage in statu quo. We recognize the full force of the rule that, where a party desires to rescind a contract, he must do so in toto, and return the consideration which he received thereunder, and otherwise do that which will put him and the other party in statu quo. But what was necessary to be done, in view of the facts and circumstances in this case, to put Sandage in statu quo? All that appellee received from him was an assignment of his right and title to the patent right in question. This right proved to be invalid and worthless, and appellee re-assigned the letters, and tendered back the same to Sandage. This, evidently, in our opinion, was all that appellant could, at the furthest, demand. Sandage had guaranteed the validity of these letters. Their validity was assailed in a court of competent jurisdiction. Of this fact he was notified, and requested to sustain them. They were adjudged by the court to be void for the reason herein stated. By this judgment appellant was bound. That money paid for worthless securities or rights, or where the purchaser does not get that for which the money was paid, may be recovered back, is a well-settled proposition. Whart. Cont. § 744; Benjamin, Sales, p. 540; Burt v. Bowles, 69 Ind. 1; Jarboe v. Sererin, 85 Ind. 496. It was established on the trial that Sandage had failed to comply with the prerequisites of sections 6054, 6055, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 8120, 8131), by neglecting to file copies of his letters with the clerk of the circuit court of St. Joseph county, wherein the said patent was sold, and by not inserting in the written contract wherein appellee obligated itself to pay the purchase price of the patent the words, "given for a patent right." The penalty for disobeying this statute is a fine, or imprisonment in jail. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 6056 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8132). That the noncompliance with this law rendered the contract—at least, so far as appellee therein obligated itself to pay the purchase price of this patent—invalid, as between the parties, is no longer a disputed question. New v. Walker, 108 Ind. 365, 58 Am. Rep. 40; Brechbill v. Randall, 102 Ind. 528, 52 Am. Rep. 695; Robertson v. Cooper, 1 Ind. App. 78. That there can be no recovery on a contract made in violation of a statute, as between the parties thereto, the violation of which is prohibited by a penalty, is a principle well recognized by the courts. This is true, although the statute does not in terms pronounce the contract void, nor expressly prohibit the same. This doctrine is well supported by many English and American decisions. Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150, and the authorities collected in note to this case in 25 Am. Rep. 674; Dillon v. Allen, 46 Iowa, 299, 26 Am. Rep. 145; Winchester Electric Light Co. v. Feal (at this term) (Ind.) 41 N. E. 334. Counsel for appellant urge that this statute is in conflict with the Federal Constitution, and therefore void. This question has been settled to the contrary in this state, and is no longer an open question. New v. Walker, supra; Hankey v. Downey, 116 Ind. 118, 1 L. R. A. 447;

Pape v. Wright, 116 Ind. 502. It was in evidence that the supreme court of Illinois, in the case of Hollida v. Hunt, 70 Ill. 109, 23 Am. Rep. 63, held a similar statute of that state, relating to patent rights, to be repugnant to and inconsistent with the rights exercised by Congress in regard to such rights, and therefore void. In view of this latter fact, in connection with the other evidence in the case, we are of the opinion that it is shown that appellants, by bringing actions upon this contract in Illinois, instead of instituting the same in Indiana, where all the parties resided, did so for the purpose of obtaining an advantage over the appellee which they were not entitled to under the laws of the latter state. As long as a citizen belongs to a state, he owes it obedience; and, as between states, the state in which he is domiciled has jurisdiction over his person, and his personal relations to other citizens of the state. Keyser v. Rice, 47 Md. 203, 28 Am. Rep. 48. That a citizen of a state, under a showing of sufficient facts, can be enjoined from commencing or prosecuting a suit against his fellow citizen in the courts of another state, is an equitable rule, recognized and enforced by this court and many others. See Wilson v. Joseph, 107 Ind. 490; Keyser v. Rice, supra; Dehon v. Foster, 4 Allen, 545; 23 Cent. L. J. 268. This rule seems to be sustained by a clear weight of authority in this country. See 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 909. It is declared in the decisions that the court, in the exercise of this authority, does not proceed upon any claim of right to control or stay proceedings in the courts of another state or country, but upon the grounds that the person against whom the restraining order is issued resides within the jurisdiction, and within the power of the restraining court. The court issuing the writ does not pretend to direct or control the one in the foreign state, but, without regard to the subject-matter of the dispute, it considers the equities between the parties, and decrees in personam according to these equities, and enforces obedience to its decree. We think that in the case at bar the facts sufficiently show a manifest equity in favor of appellee, so as to entitle it to the decree herein.

Appellants complain of the action of the court in not permitting Joshua Sandage to answer the following question of appellee: "What, if anything, was the consideration of the second or supplemental contract, as to releasing you of your guaranty in the second contract?" The appellants' attorney explained to the court, on the court's request, as follows: "That that statement in the first contract, and the second statement in the supplemental contract, in reference to the having of suits and payments of costs, are ambiguous and not fully explained in the contract; that the contract was entirely abrogated, and that was a part of the consideration of the second contract; that the first contract was for royalties, and in consideration that Mr. Sandage gave up his right to the royalties, more valuable to him than the second contract gave him,—in consideration that he gave that up,—he should not be held responsible for the patent, and not be liable for any expense on the patent, explained as stated in the contract; and that the defendants wished to show by this witness, in answer to this question, that the second contract was made upon the consideration, and with the full understanding of the plaintiff; that they had investigated the said patent, and told the defendant Joshua Sandage that they were willing to take their chances as to the patent being upheld in the courts; and that the said Joshua Sandage should not be held responsible for such patent if such patent was at any time held to be invalid." By this question appellants' counsel say that they desired and sought to show what the consideration of the supplemental contract was, and to explain what was meant to be repealed by it. It is obvious, we think, that the purpose of the evidence sought to be elicited by this question was to contradict the written obligation. The written contract in question is not incomplete, and there is no apparent ambiguity therein that requires an explanation by parol evidence. Nor was it in any way rendered necessary to show what part of the first agreement had been repealed and rendered of no effect by the second. This was easily disclosed by a comparison of the one with the other. The evident purpose of the question, as it appears from the statements of counsel, was to show that the guaranty of appellant Sandage, made in the first contract, as to the validity of his patent right, had been repealed by a parol agreement contemporaneous with the second written contract, and thereby contradict this latter instrument. The cases of Kieth v. Kerr, 17 Ind. 284, to the effect that, when a written contract is incomplete, parol evidence that does not contradict it may be admitted to show the whole contract, and Martindale v. Parsons, 98 Ind. 174, where it is held that parol evidence may be received to aid in the construction of ambiguous contracts, lend no support to appellants' claim upon this question, as herein presented. The court did not err in excluding this question.

We have examined all the questions necessarily presented by this appeal, and are of the opinion that there is nothing appearing in the record that would entitle appellants to a reversal.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

BRIDAL VEIL LUMBERING COMPANY,
Replt.,

v.

D. S. JOHNSON, Appl.

(.....Or.....)

A railroad chartered to extend from a certain town past a sawmill, through rough, mountainous, timbered, and sparsely-settled country, to the middle of a certain section on lands of the United States, without going near any other town, city, or settlement or other railroad, but which has been built only from the sawmill, about 2 miles from the town, for 5½ miles into the timbered region, and has no freight or passenger depots, passenger coaches, or freight cars, except trucks, and has never charged passengers any fare, is a public way for which eminent domain may be exercised, where it is not shown that it was intended simply as a logging road, and everyone having occasion to use it as a passenger or for the transportation of freight has a right to require the service.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to condemn a right of way for a railroad. Affirmed.

Statement by Bean, J.:

This is an action to condemn a right of way for a railroad. The defense is that plaintiff was organized for the operation of a sawmill for the manufacture of lumber, and the proposed railroad is intended for its own private use and benefit in connection therewith, and not for the ordinary purposes of a railroad for the transportation of freight and passengers, and that therefore the use for which the land is required by the plaintiff corporation is not public, so as to justify the exercise in its behalf of the power of eminent domain. The cause was tried without the intervention of a jury, and on July 31, 1892, the court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, from which it appears that plaintiff was incorporated in 1889; that by its original and supplementary articles of incorporation one of its purposes is that of constructing and operating a railroad for the transportation of freight and passengers from Bridal Veil, Oregon, by way of the mill of the Bridal Veil Falls Lumbering Company to the center of Sec 1, T. 2 S., of R. 7 E. of the Willamette meridian, near the base of Mt. Hood, in the state of Oregon, both of its terminal points being in Multnomah county; that it was not organized for the sole purpose of operating a sawmill, or for supplying the mill with saw logs, or for constructing and maintaining a logging road thereto; that a portion of the railroad has already been constructed, and so operated and maintained that "the general public have had the use and benefit thereof, for the transportation of freight and passengers, whenever freight was offered or passengers desired to ride;" and that, "so far as completed, it provides means of transportation useful and beneficial to the people living in the section of country in which it is built," and "gives to them and persons having business in that vicinity improved facilities for the transportation of freight not possessed before." From these findings the court concluded, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to exercise the power of eminent domain. A short time after they were filed the defendant moved for additional findings of fact, and presented a series of proposed findings, some of which the court adopted. From these it appears that the northern terminus of that portion of plaintiff's road, as located and constructed, is at the sawmill referred to, about 2 miles from, and at an elevation of 1,800 feet above, the town of Bridal Veil; that no line or route of the proposed road has ever been surveyed, located, or constructed from Bridal Veil to the sawmill; that, as surveyed and constructed, it extends a distance of 5½ miles, to lands owned by plaintiff; that the southeastern terminus of the route, as described in the articles of incorporation, is near the base of Mt. Hood, upon land owned by the government of the United States, and that there is not, at or near thereto, any town, city, or settlement, or other railroad; that the country along such route is rough, mountainous, covered with timber, and sparsely settled, and, except the town of Bridal Veil, there is at no place on the line or in its vicinity any town, city, or thickly-settled neighborhood; that the plaintiff has connected with its railroad no freight or passenger depots, no passenger coaches, and no freight cars, except that it has a number of trucks, on one of which there is a platform, covered in time of rain; and that plaintiff has never carried over its road any passengers for hire, but has always permitted any person who wished to ride on its trucks to do so without charge. Among the findings proposed by the defendant, but rejected by the court, is one to the effect that the principal purpose for which that portion of the road already constructed was built, and for which it is and has been used, is that of transporting saw logs from the lands of plaintiff to its mill. A judgment having been entered upon the findings in favor of plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Mr. E. B. Watson for appellant.Mr. L. L. McArthur for respondent.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There being no bill of exceptions in the record, the only question for our determination is whether the findings of fact support the judgment. The right of eminent domain is a right of sovereignty, and can be exercised only by legislative authority, and for a public use or benefit.

When, therefore, a particular corporation claims the right to take private property without the consent of the owner, it must show, not only a legislative warrant, but, if its right is challenged on that ground, it must be able to establish the fact that the enterprise in which it is engaged is one by which a public use or benefit is to be subserved or promoted, so that such taking can be said to be for a public, and not a private, use. The necessity or expediency of taking private property for public use, the instrumentalities through which it may be done, and the mode of procedure, are legislative, and not judicial, questions. But, whether the proposed use thereof is in fact public, so as to justify its taking without the consent of the owner, has always been a question for the courts to determine; and in doing so they are not confined to the description of the objects and purposes of the corporation as set forth in its articles of incorporation, but may resort to evidence abundant showing the actual business proposed to be conducted by it. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 158; Re Niagara Falls & W. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 375; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Willes, 116 Ill. 449.

Now, in this case, from the findings of fact, it clearly appears that plaintiff is a corporation organized for the construction of a railroad for the transportation of freight and passengers, and therefore §§ 8239, 8240, Hill's Ann. Laws, invests it with authority to exercise the power of eminent domain, if the use it intends to make of the property sought to be taken is in fact public. Bearing upon this question, the findings are that it has already constructed five and one half miles of road, and is now and has been operating the same, for the use and benefit of the general public, in carrying freight and passengers; and there is nothing in the record anywhere to indicate that the road has ever been used, or is intended to be used, for any other or different purpose, or that it was built or intended for a logging road, or has ever been used for that purpose, or, in fact, that it is in any way connected with or a part of the mill enterprise, or, indeed, except by inference, that it belongs to the mill company. We are therefore unable to say that the court was in error in holding that the railroad of plaintiff is public, so as to justify the exercise in its behalf of the power of eminent domain. The fact that it has not been fully completed between the termini indicated in its articles of incorporation, or that there is at present no town, city, or settlement, or other railroad, at its proposed southeastern terminus, or that its proposed route is through a rough, mountainous, and sparsely settled country, or that the plaintiff has not yet fully equipped the road, or supplied itself with complete and perfect terminal facilities, or that it has not charged the passengers upon its railroad any fare, does not affect its right to exercise the power of eminent domain. The question of public use is not determined, as a matter of law, by any of these things, but by the fact that the proposed road is intended as a highway for the use of the public, in the transportation of freight and passengers. And it can make no difference that its use may be limited by circumstances to a small part of the community. Its character is determined by the right of the public to use it, and not by the extent to which that right is exercised. State, De Camp, v. Hibernia Underground R. Co. 47 N. J. L. 48; Phillips v. Watson, 63 Iowa, 28; Ross v. Davis, 97 Ind. 79.

If everyone having occasion to use the road as a passenger or for the transportation of freight may do so, and of right may require the plaintiff to serve him in that respect, it is a public way, although the number actually exercising the right is very small. The findings of the court show that the enterprise in which plaintiff is engaged, and for which it requires the land in question, is of this character, and therefore we have no alternative but to affirm the judgment. In doing so, however, we do not desire to be understood as holding that a railroad constructed by a mill company for the evident purpose of transporting logs to its mill can become a public highway, so as to justify the exercise of the power of eminent domain in its behalf, because of any declaration in its articles of incorporation to that effect, or on account of any right of the public to use it for the transportation of freight and passengers. No such question is presented by this record. The findings of the court by which we are bound, negative such an inference, and this decision is based upon the facts as found by the court below.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

STATE of Missouri, ex rel. ST. LOUIS UNDERGROUND SERVICE COMPANY,

v.

Michael J. MURPHY.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A city has no power to grant to a corporation the right to lay subways for electric wires under all the city streets without reserving the power of supervision and control, not only of the work of excavating in the streets, but of all matters incident to its location, construction, maintenance, and use, although the sole purpose of the subway may be that of leasing to public wire-using corporations.

2. The only power of regulation impliedly reserved by a city on giving to a telegraph company or other such corporation its

NOTE.—Grant of franchises to electrical subway companies.

The decision against the validity of a grant to an electrical subway company of the right to make such a subway under streets, made in the above case of STATE, ST. LOUIS UNDERGROUND SERVICE CO., v. MURPHY, is based on the fact that the company, although declared a common carrier by the ordinance, was not bound to perform services for or allow the use of its subway by other electric consent that electric wires may be laid under the streets is such regulation as the safety and welfare of the public may demand, where the corporation derives its power to place wires underground from the state, subject only to the consent of the municipality.

3. An ordinance granting to a subway company and its assigns the right to occupy space under any streets in the city for the period of fifty years, to the practical exclusion of all other public uses, with power to select its own patrons and dictate its own terms and elect which streets it will use, is void as an attempt to surrender the power to regulate the underground use of streets by wire-using companies.

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to allow relator to construct a subway beneath the public streets of the city of St. Louis. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. John G. Chandler, R. L. McLaran, E. A. Noonan, and Boyle, Priest, & Lehman for relator.

Messrs. D. D. Fisher and Edward C. Kehr, for respondent:

A municipal corporation possesses, and can exercise, only such powers as are conferred by its charter. All acts beyond the scope of the powers granted are void. Under the present charter the city has no power to lay conduits and pipes for the transmission of electricity, and therefore no power to grant to others a franchise to use the streets for that purpose.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 89; Charter of St. Louis, art. 8, § 26, Rev. Stat. 1889, pp. 2065-2100; Spaulding v. Peabody, 153 Mass. 129, 10 L. R. A. 397.

If the power is claimed to exist, it can only be derived from the power of the city to regulate the use of its streets. But a street can be devoted only to public use, and an ordinance which diverts it to private use, or curtails the right of the city to control it at all times for public use, is ultra vires and void.

companies, and was not obliged in any way to use them or cause them to be used, while it was given the right to occupy every street in the city for fifty years. It would seem from the opinion of the court that the decision would have been different if the ordinance had required the subway company to serve the public, either by its own wires or by the wires of other companies using its subway. In the absence of any obligation on the part of the company it is held that the grant was not for public use, and therefore was invalid.

In New York subway statutes which have been held constitutional have provided for the construction of conduits of electric wires under streets and for the appointment of subway commissioners with power to compel all companies operating electric lines to use the subways.

A statute confirming a contract between subway commissioners and a subway company for laying subways is sustained in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New York (C. C. S. D. N. Y.) 8 L. R. A. 449, and United States Illum. Co. v. Hess, 19 N. Y. S. R. 883. The court in the former case said: "The statute is none the less an exercise of the police power and within the competency of the legislature because of the special privileges given to the subway company."

As to police regulation of electric companies generally, see note to State, Laclede Gaslight Co., v. Murphy (Mo.) 81 L. R. A. 798.

The contract sustained in the above cases authorized the subway company to charge a rental for the use of the subways, and contained provisions reserving such control in the commissioners over them as were calculated to secure to all companies desiring to use them reasonable facilities and protection. It contained a provision by which all companies occupying space in the subways were to own their own conductors and have the full management and control thereof, subject to the rights of all other occupants and such reasonable rules and regulations as should be made by the commissioners. It also contained a stipulation that the commissioners would use all lawful means to compel all companies to place their conductors in the subways and pay a fair rental for the same, but it provided in express terms that it should not be 84 L. R. A.

construed as granting to the subway company any exclusive privileges or franchise. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New York, supra.

A subway company which obtained permission to construct conduits and lay wires in certain streets of New York under certain conditions, among which was the requirement that the work should be performed under the control and supervision of the commissioner of public works claimed to have a contract right under this permission, to use such streets, and contested the validity of New York Laws 1885, chap. 499, providing that the approval of a board of commissioners of electric subways must be obtained before constructing such a conduit. But the New York court of appeals decided that it did not have such a contract, and that even if it did it was subject to the police power. People, New York Electric Lines Co., v. Squire, 107 N. Y. 593. This decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (145 U. S. 175, 36 L. ed. 686), in which it was also decided that the provision of the New York statute requiring electric companies to pay the salaries of the subway commissioners did not violate the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution by depriving them of property without due process of law.

That telegraph companies may be compelled to place their wires underground although they have accepted the benefits of the United States Revised Statutes, §§ 5253, 5263, giving them the right to operate their lines over post roads, was decided in American Rapid Teleg. Co. v. Hess (N. Y.) 18 L. R. A. 454; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New York (C. C. S. D. N. Y.) 8 L. R. A. 449; H. Clausen & Sons Brewing Co. v. Baltimore & O. Teleg. Co. (N. Y. Sup. Ct.) 2 Am. Elec. Cas. 210.

The discretion given to the board of electrical control in respect to the construction, use, and control of subways under the New York act of 1887, chap. 716, § 1, is held to be beyond judicial review in the absence of fraud or improper motives. United States Illum. Co. v. Hess, 19 N. Y. S. R. 883.

In case of unjust discrimination by the board of electrical control between electric companies the New York act of 1887, § 7, provides a remedy by man-

The franchises granted by the ordinances in question are not for a public use, but for the private use, gain, and emolument of the subway company, its successors or assigns, and such franchises so granted are utterly void.

The sole purpose for which the conduits are constructed and used by the subway company is to rent or lease them to others for its private gain and emolument, and upon its own terms. The city is not authorized to rent or lease any portion of its streets for private use, and hence cannot confer any such right on the subway company.

damus to compel the board to furnish just and equal facilities, and an injunction is not the proper remedy in such case. Ibid.

An electric-light company which had applied for and been granted the right to place its wires in the subway, and had placed them therein with knowledge of the rental price fixed therefor, on refusal to pay the rental, claiming that it was exorbitant, met a threat of the removal of its wires by application for an injunction. But an injunction was denied on the ground that its remedy, if it had any, was by mandamus under the New York act of 1887, § 7. But it was also decided that it must pay or offer to pay reasonable rental in order to obtain any remedy under the statute. Brush Electric Illum. Co. v. Consolidated Teleg. & E. S. Co. 60 Hun. 448, affirming 15 N. Y. Supp. 81. The court likened the interest of the owner of an electric wire in such a subway to that of a passenger's right to a place in a railroad car, subject to termination in case of failure to pay the rates required.

The validity of the New York subway acts was also recognized in United States Illum. Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun. 223, although the questions actually decided were as to the right of the public authorities to remove dangerous wires from the streets where the board of electrical control was alleged to have refused permission to make the proper repairs to the electric plants.

The making and execution of a contract for the construction of electric subways in the city of New York was enjoined at the suit of a taxpayer authorized by New York Laws 1887, chap. 673, where the proposed contract was uncertain in many of its provisions and omitted to include as a part thereof a resolution of the board of electrical control in regard to the streets in which and the time when the subways were to be constructed, or to bind the contract to such construction, and provides that the decision of the board as to the use of the subways shall be final, and gives the option to the city to purchase the subways subject to encumbrances placed thereon by the company. Armstrong v. Grant, 55 Hun. 226. The court says the contract would leave it to the volition of the contractor to construct subways or not, and this was deemed the most serious defect.

An electric-light company has no such rights in the subway in which its wires have been placed as to entitle it to interfere with the action of the board of electrical control for the construction of other subways. Manhattan Electric Light Co. v. Grant, 31 N. Y. S. R. 254.

The constitutionality of the New York subway acts was also sustained in United Lines Teleg. Co. v. Grant, 137 N. Y. 7, by upholding an assessment upon a telegraph company for its share of the expense of building a subway and placing the electric wires therein.

An exclusive right to maintain subways and conduits for electrical conductors was claimed by a subway company, but denied by the court, in Empire City Subway Co. v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co. 87 Hun. 279. The court said it found no statutory provision showing that the legislature intended to confer an exclusive right upon any corporation or authorizing the grant of such a franchise by municipal or state authorities, while it further found that the contract with the subway company expressly provided that it did not give any exclusive privileges. The right of a street surface railroad company to have its own subway for its cable was therefore sustained as against a subway company.

In New Jersey a statute was enacted creating a board of commissioners of electrical subways, and providing for the placing of electrical conductors underground in cities. This act was in question in Presbyterian Church v. Electrical Subways Comrs. 55 N. J. L. 436, but the only question raised under it was as to its power to grant a franchise for erecting poles and wires in the streets for the transmission of electricity for a street railway. It was decided that the board did not have power to grant a franchise. But this statute has since been repealed by N. J. Laws 1894, chap. 7.

The great danger and inconvenience caused by the numerous electric wires which have been hung in the streets of large cities within recent years and which have caused the legislation referred to in the above cases will undoubtedly cause still further legislation in other states. The cases cited in this note probably represent only the beginning of the law on this subject.

The relator never acquired title to the franchises attempted to be granted by these ordinances. The alleged assignment and transfer by sheriff's sale are void, and did not pass any right or title whatever. The power to make such transfers is not given by statute and does not exist at common law.

After a hearing on demurrer, Macfarlane, J., on June 25, 1895, delivered the following opinion:

On the 15th day of February, 1889, an ordinance of the city of St. Louis, No. 14,798, entitled "An ordinance to provide for laying electric wires underground," was passed and approved. By § 1 permission and authority were granted the National Subway Company of Missouri, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate conduits, pipes, mains, conductors, manholes, and service and supply pipes in any of the streets, alleys, squares, avenues, and public highways of the city of St. Louis, for the term of thirty-five consecutive years. The objects are declared to be that of "distributing and maintaining a line or lines of electric and other wires, together with all necessary feeders, outlets, service wires or other electrical conductors to be used for the transmission of electricity for any and all purposes." It was further provided that before said company, its successors or assigns, should lay any conduits or pipes in any of the streets, it should submit to the board of public improvements its plans, and the same should be approved. Section 2 prescribed the manner and depth in which conduits and pipes should be laid in the streets. Section 3 required the work to be done with the least possible injury or delay to the public, and that the streets be left in proper condition. Section 4 required the deposit of $1,000, to secure the proper repair of streets, and impose a penalty for neglect to repair. Section 5: The corporation is declared to be a common carrier, and is required to permit any person or persons, company or companies, to use said system of underground conduits upon terms agreed upon by the respective parties, and, in case of a failure to agree, arbitration was provided for. Section 6 requires the corporation to furnish, in addition to other taxes assessed by law, and maintain at its own expense, all the wires of the fire and police alarm and telephone service of the city of St. Louis, free of charge to the city. Section 7 makes the corporation subject to ordinances of the city now in force, or that may hereafter be passed, in relation to making excavations in streets. Section 8 nullified the ordinance unless a bond for $25,000 with approved security, should be filed in ninety days, conditioned for the faithful observance of the ordinance. The ordinance was also made null, unless work was commenced in sixty days. Section 8 declares a forfeiture for violation of the conditions and provisions of the ordinance. Section 10 gives the city the right to purchase the property at the end of the term granted.

On February 6, 1891, Ordinance No. 15,953 was passed, entitled "An ordinance amending Ordinance No. 14,798 of the city of St. Louis entitled 'An ordinance to provide for the laying of electric wires underground.'" This ordinance strikes out §§ 6 and 10 of Ordinance 14,798, and substitutes for §§ 1, 4, and 5 three other sections. The only material change made by § 1 is to extend the duration of the franchises to fifty years, and to grant the right to distribute and maintain "electric, telegraph, telephone, and other wires." No material change was made in § 4. Section 5, as amended, besides declaring said company, its successors and assigns, a common carrier, requires a payment to the city for the rights and franchises granted semiannually in advance of the sum of $500. No provision is left for the use of wires by the city, or the right of any other company or person to use them.

Said National Subway Company was incorporated January 28, 1889, under the act providing for the incorporation of telegraph and telephone companies, now art. 5, chap. 42, Rev. Stat. 1889, with a capital stock of $250,000, divided into 25,000 shares of $10 each. The purposes of the incorporation, as declared in the articles of association, are to construct, own, operate, and maintain a line of underground magnetic telegraph in the city of St. Louis. On the 5th of February, 1889, the board of directors sold and assigned all the rights and franchises granted by said ordinance to Charles Sutter for the consideration of $100. On the 25th of February, 1889, the St. Louis Subway Company was incorporated under art. 8, chap. 21, Rev. Stat. 1879, as a private business corporation, with a capital stock of $500,000, divided into 50,000 shares of $10 each, which was alleged to have been actually paid up in lawful money of the United States. Of this stock the said Charles Sutter subscribed for 49,800 shares. The purposes of this corporation, as declared in the articles, were: "To lay out and maintain, construct, and operate, lines of subway in this state for the purpose of carrying wires for the transmission of electricity and electric currents, and in and about said business to acquire and hold such property, both real and personal, as may be requisite and necessary in the premises: to make all necessary leases, contracts, and other agreements as may be required to carry out the purposes of the company." On February 28, 1889, this corporation was organized, and purchased from Charles Sutter the rights and franchises granted under said ordinances, for which it agreed to pay $498,000. Mr. Sutter accepted 49,800 shares of fully paid-up stock in satisfaction of the purchase price. The other shareholders, except one who subscribed for 25 shares, paid for their stock by services rendered. From June, 1889, to the end of that year, the St. Louis Subway Company obtained permits upon plans approved by the board of public improvements, and caused a line of subways to be constructed, about 1½ miles in length, as follows: On Broadway, from Elm street to St. Charles; on Market street, from Broadway to Tenth; on Tenth street, from Market to Chestnut; and on Chestnut street, from Tenth to Fourteenth streets. The subways occupy a space in the streets about 6 feet deep and 3 feet wide, with man-holes about 5 to 6 feet in diameter at each street crossing, and at other points where obstructions are to be passed. From 1889 to 1894 nothing was done in the way of building conduits.

On the 10th day of May, 1890, John B. O'Mera obtained judgment against the St. Louis Subway Company in the St. Louis circuit court for $8,869.28, for work done on the subways above mentioned, and on the 10th day of June, 1890, Emile A. Meysenburg obtained a judgment against it in the same court for $42,911.22, on account of work, material, and money applied to the construction of said subways. Upon these judgments executions were issued, and the sheriff seized all the right, title, and interest of the St. Louis Subway Company in and to the franchise acquired by it under Ordinance 14,798, and all its title in and to the subways above mentioned, and all pipes, mains, iron, etc., belonging to said company, and on July 21, 1890, sold the same to Emile A. Meysenburg for the sum of $1,000, to whom the sheriff executed a deed as for the sale of real estate. Alias executions were issued on said judgments, and the same property seized and sold under them, as personal property, on January 7, 1891, at which sale Emile A. Meysenburg was again the purchaser at the sum of $500, and for which he received a bill of sale from the sheriff.

The relator, the St. Louis Underground Service Company, was incorporated February 26, 1891, as a private business corporation, under art. 8, chap. 42, Rev. Stat. 1889, with a named capital stock of $1,000,000, divided into 10,000 shares of $100 each, which is alleged to have been fully paid in lawful money. The stock was subscribed as follows: Emile A. Meysenburg, 9,000 shares; Robert McLaren, 250; Benjamin Von Puhl, 250; Andrew J. Cooper, 250; and Charles Sutter, 250 shares. The purposes for which this company was organized "are to lay out and maintain, construct and operate, lines of subway in this state for the purpose of carrying wires, for the transmission of electricity and electric currents; also to lay out, construct, and maintain and operate, lines of pipes, mains, and conductors in this state for the purpose of distributing substances, either for fuel or illuminating purposes, or for both, and for said purposes to acquire and hold such property, both real and personal, as may be requisite and necessary in the premises, to make all necessary leases, contracts, and other agreements as may be required to carry out the purposes of the company." Emile A. Meysenburg, on March 10, 1891, for the expressed consideration of $900,000, by bill of sale transferred to the St. Louis Underground Service Company all the property and rights he acquired by purchase at the sheriff's sales above mentioned. By this transfer he paid his subscription for the 9,000 shares of stock subscribed by him. From this time, March 10, 1891, until the summer of 1894, the St. Louis Underground Service Company did nothing in the way of building conduits. In May, 1894, relator made application for and received a permit to lay, and laid, a subway 180 feet in length, on Olive street, from Broadway east to an alley at the middle of the block, and south on said alley to a point opposite the operating room of the Postal Telegraph Company, in the Laclede building; and on August 20 it obtained a permit and constructed a subway on Fourteenth street, from Chestnut to the alley in the middle of the block, and about 16 feet into the alley, to a telegraph pole, about 165 feet in length.

In November, 1894, relator made application in due form to respondent, as street commissioner, for permit to construct conduits on Chestnut street. The plans had previously been submitted to and approved by the board of public improvement. Respondent refused to grant the permit. This proceeding is by mandamus to require the respondent, as street commissioner, to grant the permit. A writ was issued and respondent has made return thereto, to which relator demurred. From the pleadings and the evidence taken the foregoing facts are deduced.

While the legal questions involved are raised by demurrer to the return, the entire case was presented by oral argument and brief of counsel, and we will consider the merits of the case without regard to the form in which it has been presented.

1. A number of questions were discussed by counsel, both in argument and brief, but the most important, and, as we think, the controlling one, is whether the city of St. Louis had the power to grant to the National Subway Company the franchises now claimed by relator. If it had no such power, and is not estopped by what it has done in affirmance of its grant, the controversy necessarily ends, and consideration of other questions will be unnecessary. Municipal as well as other corporations derive their power from the legislature, and can exercise none not confided to them. To the charter of the city of St. Louis, then, we must look for authority to make the contract in question. State v. Clarke, 54 Mo. 35, 14 Am. Rep. 471. The charter undoubtedly vests in the city large power and control over the streets and other public property within its limits. It has power to establish, open, and vacate all streets, public grounds, and squares, and regulate the use thereof; to lease portions of the unimproved wharf; to license, tax, and regulate telegraph companies and street-railroad cars; to have sole power and authority to grant to persons or corporations the right to construct railways in the city; and, finally, to pass all such ordinances, not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter or the laws of the state, as may be expedient in maintaining the peace, good government, health, and welfare of the city, its trade, commerce, and manufactures. Charter, Rev. Stat. 1889, pp. 2085, 2100.

The power to regulate the use of streets is very comprehensive. "The word 'regulate' is one of broad import. It is a word used in the Federal Constitution to define the power of Congress over foreign and interstate commerce, and he who reads the many opinions of this court will perceive how broad and comprehensive it has been held to be." Mr. Justice Brewer, in St. Louis v. Western U. Tel. Co. 149 U. S. 469, 37 L. ed. 813. Under the power thus delegated, it cannot now be questioned that the municipal authorities can permit the use of the surface of the streets for the erection of telegraph and telephone poles, and the laying of railroad tracks; the space above the surface for stringing electric wires for the transmission of messages and the creation of light; and may also permit the laying of water and gas pipes and sewers beneath the surface. Julius Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398; St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co. 96 Mo. 629, 3 L. R. A. 278; Ferrenbach v. Turner, 86 Mo. 416, 56 Am. Rep. 437; Schopp v. St. Louis, 117 Mo. 136, 20 L. R. A. 783. These uses are all of a public nature, and are not inconsistent with the public uses to which the streets were dedicated. Under its general power to regulate the use of streets, the city has authority to authorize corporations and persons, for the purpose of serving the public, to string telegraph, telephone, or electric-light wires, upon poles above the surface, or through conduits beneath the surface of the streets, provided such structures and mechanical appliances do not materially interfere with the ordinary uses of the streets and public travel thereon. But the city has no power, under this or any other provision of its charter, to authorize such a use of the street, though for a public purpose, as will destroy its usefulness as a public thoroughfare. Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. 123 Mo. 86, 24 L. R. A. 516; Knapp, S. & Co. Company v. St. Louis Transfer R. Co. 126 Mo. 26, and cases cited. So it is well settled that the city of St. Louis has no power to authorize the appropriation of any parts of any of its streets for private purposes. The power to regulate the use of streets refers to legitimate public uses not inconsistent with the ordinary and paramount use for travel thereon, or with the private rights of abutting property owners. An ordinance having the effect of diverting the streets from a public to a private use, or of unreasonably appropriating them to a public use other than that of ordinary travel by pedestrians and vehicles is ultra vires and void. Knapp, S. & Co. Company v. St. Louis Transfer R. Co. supra; Dubach v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 89 Mo. 486; Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. v. St. Louis Grain Elevator Co. 82 Mo. 124; Schopp v. St. Louis, supra; Glaesmer v. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Assn. 100 Mo. 514.

It is true that these decisions and the principle declared were applied to grants authorizing the use of the surface of the streets. But the public use of streets, as has been said, is not confined to the surface, nor is the power of the city confined to that of regulating the use of streets and public grounds. To it are also delegated general police powers, and under them it is authorized to pass "all such ordinances as may be expedient in maintaining the peace, good government, health, and welfare of the city, its trade, commerce, and manufactures." In the exercise of the powers thus delegated, it has the undoubted right to regulate the public use of the streets, both above and beneath the surface. This it constantly does by allowing public sewers, water mains, and gas pipes to be laid beneath the surface, and regulating the manner in which the work shall be done. It is said in a recent case: "This power to regulate the use of streets is not confined to the regulation of travel thereon, but under it the city may allow gas, water, and sewer pipes to be laid therein, and may cause wells therein to be filled . . . and may permit the erection and maintenance of telegraph poles thereon. . . . All these uses are consistent with the uses for which the streets are acquired or dedicated." Schopp v. St. Louis, 117 Mo. 136, 20 L. R. A. 783. The dedication of the streets, then, to public uses includes as well the soil beneath them as the surface itself. The city authorities had the same power to regulate the use of the streets beneath as upon the surface thereof, and the power is in like manner limited to public uses. It has also been held that the general power to regulate the use of streets is not confined to public uses common and known at the time of the dedication, but extends to new uses as they spring into existence. St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co. supra. Under these well-settled principles, there can be no doubt that the municipal authorities of the city of St. Louis, vested as they are with such enlarged control over property devoted to public uses, have the power to authorize, and, if public safety and general welfare demand it, to require all electric wires, used for the benefit of the public, to be laid underground. This would be a proper and legitimate regulation of the public use of the streets. But the streets of a city are dedicated to public uses only, and are held by the municipality in trust for such uses. The trust is sacred, and the city has no authority, even under such enlarged powers as St. Louis possesses, to permanently divert any portion of it from these uses to such as are purely private. The question, then, is whether, under the ordinance granting to the National Subway Company of Missouri, its successors or assigns, the right to construct, maintain, and operate conduits, pipes, mains, conductors, manholes, and service and supply pipes in any of the streets, alleys, etc., of the city of St. Louis, during the term of fifty years, was for a public or private use. If for the latter, it must be held ultra vires and void.

While under the pleadings the issues were made by demurrer to the return, evidence was taken by the parties and filed, and the case was argued as well upon the evidence as upon the allegations of the pleadings, we consider the question as presented under the pleadings and the evidence. "If it is doubtful or questionable whether the use is public or not, testimony is admissible to determine the fact."

The purpose of the grant, as declared in the ordinance, is that of "distributing and maintaining a line or lines of electric, telegraph, telephone, and other wires . . . to be used for the transmission of electricity for any and all purposes." By § 5, as amended, it is declared that such corporation, its successors or assigns, shall be a common carrier, and shall have and enjoy such rights, privileges, and immunities as are usually had and enjoyed by such companies. These are the only purposes expressed in the ordinance. A clause of § 5 in the original ordinance, which was omitted from the amendment, provided that said corporation shall permit "any persons, company, or companies, to use said system of underground conduits," upon terms to be fixed as therein provided. There is nothing in the terms of the ordinance from which an inference can be drawn that the proposed conduit and wires should be used for the benefit of the public. The corporation was not at the time engaged in the business of transmitting messages by use of electric wires, or transmitting electricity for the purpose of producing light, and no inference can be drawn that the proposed transmission of electricity was for use of the public. After the amendment of § 5 of the original ordinance, no obligation was left on said corporation to serve the public in any capacity.

The corporation to which the franchises were granted was chartered, under the general laws of the state, for the purpose of constructing, owning, operating, and maintaining a line of underground magnetic telegraph in the city of St. Louis, but immediately on obtaining the franchises conferred by the ordinance it sold and assigned them to relator, into whose hands they are claimed to have passed by assignment. Relator was not even organized as a telegraph company. It was organized as a business corporation. Its purposes, as declared in its articles of association, are "to lay out and maintain, construct, and operate, lines of subway in this state for the purpose of carrying wires for the transmission of electricity and electric currents; also to lay out, construct, and maintain and operate, lines of pipes, mains, and conductors in this state for the purpose of distributing substances, either for fuel or illuminating purposes, or for both." So it appears that relator does not, under its charter, undertake to discharge a public duty by itself using the wires for telegraph or telephone purposes. Its purpose, so far as appears from the ordinance or charter, is to occupy the streets by subways and electric wires. It is placed under no obligations to use them, or cause them to be used, for the benefit of the public. Still, it claims the right to so occupy every street in the city for fifty years. No duty whatever is imposed upon it, no control over its works or business is retained by the city, except in the mere approval of the plans it may adopt for making the subways, and the manner of executing the work. The evidence shows that the object to be accomplished in granting these important franchises was to vest in one company the right to build suitable conduits, and to require all telegraph, telephone, and electric-light companies to lease and use the wires of the favored company, its successors or assigns.

We do not think it necessary to inquire whether a contract of this character, had the objects been expressed, could be upheld. Such purposes were not expressed; on the contrary, the provision in § 5 of the original ordinance, which did give "any person or persons, company or companies," the right to use the system of underground conduits, was studiously omitted from the amended ordinance. As the ordinance now stands, relator is under no obligation to permit any telegraph, telephone, or electric light company to use its wires, and it is thus given the power to control the use of the streets for its own private benefit. We think the extraordinary rights, powers, and franchises granted under the ordinance can only be construed to have been intended for the private use of said corporation, and that the city therefore had no power to grant them.

Much stress is laid upon the fact that the National Subway Company is declared, under the ordinance, to be a common carrier. But calling it a common carrier does not make it one. It has none of the characteristics of a common carrier. To ascertain how its franchises are to be used, we must look to the rights conferred and the duties imposed under its charter and the ordinance. Does it appear from these that relator invites employment from the public generally? Does it obligate itself to serve the public generally. Is it subject to regulation and control in respect to its dealings with the public? None of these essentials to a public business such as that of a carrier appear. On the contrary, it is clear, as has been shown, that a private business only is contemplated.

2. But it is insisted that inasmuch as relator and his assignors have gone to large expense, with the knowledge of the city, in constructing subways in some of the streets, and have paid to the city semiannually, in advance, the sum of $500 for the rights and franchises granted it, as required by § 5 of the amended ordinance, the city should now be estopped to deny the validity of the ordinance. There is no doubt that the doctrine of estoppel is, as a general rule, alike applicable to corporations and individuals. It cannot, however, be applied to validate a contract which the corporation had no power to make. The doctrine is thus declared: "When a municipal corporation enters into a contract which it has authority to make, the doctrine of estoppel applies to it with the same force as against individuals." Union Depot Co. v. St. Louis, 76 Mo. 393. The rule is thus given by Bigelow: "If the act undertaken was in and of itself ultra vires of the corporation no act of the body can have the effect to estop it to allege its want of power to do what was undertaken." Bigelow Estoppel, 5th ed. 466, 467. See also Scott v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 963; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 86, 25 L. ed. 953; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 118 U. S. 817, 30 L. ed. 94. In the case last cited it is said: "We know of no well-considered case where a corporation, which is party to a continuing contract which it had no power to make, seeks to retract, and refuses to proceed further, can be compelled to do so." As the city had no power to authorize the use of its streets for private purposes by ordinance, it certainly cannot do so by estoppel.

Peremptory writ denied.

Brace, Ch. J., and Robinson, J., concur. Barclay, J., concurs in the result.

An answer having been filed and further hearing having been had, Macfarlane, J., on February 18, 1896, delivered the following opinion:

This is an original proceeding by mandamus.

the purpose of which is to require respondent, Murphy, as street commissioner of the city of St. Louis, to grant relator a permit to construct conduits beneath the surface of Chestnut street, in pursuance of contract claimed to have been made with the city under ordinances. The case was heard on a demurrer to respondent's return, and the demurrer was overruled. Relator, under leave of court, has answered the return. Evidence was taken, and the questions in issue have been argued, and the case is now to be determined upon its merits. A full statement of the pleadings will be found to accompany the former opinion. Most of the evidence was also then on file, and was treated in the argument on the demurrer and in the opinion as forming a part of the record. The answer of relator is, in substance, a denial of the allegation of the return. The answer, by way of new matter, averred that its articles of association had been amended, whereby its purposes are more distinctly set out, as follows: "This company is organized for the purposes of laying out, constructing, maintaining, and operating conduits or subways, pipes, mains, conductors, manholes, and service pipes in the streets, alleys, or other public places in the cities of this state and elsewhere, to be used in distributing and maintaining a line or lines of electrical and other wires owned by this company or others, together with all necessary feeders and service wires and other electrical conductors, and, when used for the wires of others, upon reasonable and just compensation; and to acquire and hold all necessary or useful grants, to occupy and use the streets, avenues, alleys, and other public places for the purposes aforesaid; to acquire and hold such property, real and personal and incorporeal, as may be requisite and necessary in the premises; to make all necessary leases, contracts, and other agreements as may be required to carry out the purposes of the company, to make proper by-laws, and to do and perform all such matters and things as may be necessary and usual for the effectual consummation of the purposes for which the company is formed." The answer also, for the purpose of showing the intention of the parties in making the contracts and granting the franchises evidenced by the ordinances, stated at length the situation in the city of St. Louis in respect to the manner in which electricity was then carried, the inconvenience and danger of such methods, and the necessity of providing for placing electric wires under ground. It charges that electric wires, for all the uses to which they are applied, are for the benefit of the public, as well as for the private gain of the owners; and that its subways "are intended and designed for the use of all persons, upon reasonable rates and like conditions, who may desire to use the same by placing wires therein, or connecting with wires to be laid therein; and its property and employment are thereby affected with public use, and being so affected, whether its charter or the ordinances granting the right to construct and operate its works retains the reserved right to control and regulate the said conduits and the operation thereof or not. Such power, authority, and control exist to the extent of protecting the public against danger, unjust discrimination, extor-tionate charges, and injustice and oppression." The new evidence introduced bore upon the character of the uses to which electric wires are applied, for the purpose of showing that all such uses are public in their nature, the inconvenience and danger of overhead wires, and the necessity, convenience, and economy of placing them underground, and in one subway.

1. We are unable to perceive that the answer of relator, the amendment of its charter, and the supplementary evidence now before us have so changed the situation as to require a different conclusion from that reached upon the former hearing. On that hearing it was held that the city, under its charter rights, has the power to control and regulate the public use of its streets and public grounds, not only upon, but, if public safety requires it, above and beneath, its surface; and in the exercise of its general police powers it may require all electric wires whose use is of a public character to be placed under ground. But it was held further that the unconditional and uncontrolled grant contained in these ordinances was essentially for the private use of the grantee and its assigns, to which the city had no power to devote its streets. No claim was made on the first hearing, nor indeed can it be justly made now, that relator proposes to deal directly with the public. At most it only proposes for its own private gain to furnish others the instrumentalities by means of which they may subserve the public interest. Over the use, sale, assignment, or lease of these instrumentalities the city has expressly reserved no control or management. The business thus proposed can no more be denominated public than could that of manufacturing electric wires for the use of a telegraph company, or rails for use in the track of a railroad, or pipes for conducting water or gas through the streets. A single instrument, though a necessary part of a public work, is not a public instrumentality, for the manufacture of which the power of eminent domain could be exercised even by the state. The use to which it may be applied is not the test of its public character. The use to which the entire work, and not parts of it, are to be applied, is the proper test. The city of St. Louis made an unconditional lease of a portion of its public wharf to an elevator company to be used for erecting and maintaining a warehouse for the storing and handling of grain and other merchandise in connection with the use of its elevator. The power of the city to make the lease was questioned. This court held that, while the city had power to lease its unused wharf for the purposes specified in the lease, it had no right to authorize the erection of such buildings thereon without reserving a control over the buildings and the uses to which they should be applied. Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. v. St. Louis Grain Elevator Co. 82 Mo. 126. The court, in its opinion, says: "The owner of the building may open or close it at his pleasure, and discriminate between shippers and receivers of produce, and make his a strictly private business, as if a retail dry goods merchant were permitted to erect a building on the wharf to conduct his business in. There is no reservation by the city in the lease to defendant of any control whatever of the building or business." The court says further: "The city has no right, and can acquire none from the legislature, to make such a disposition of the property condemned for wharf purposes as will prevent her, in the event it becomes necessary to extend and pave the wharf, from doing its duty in that respect." The same may be said in respect to the property held in trust by the city for public streets. The city has no power to divert their uses from those to which they were dedicated. It had no right to grant their use to relator for subways, though its sole purpose may be that of leasing them to public wire-using corporations, without reserving the power of supervision and control, not only of the work of excavating in the streets, but of all matters incident to its location, construction, maintenance, and use. No such powers have been reserved under these ordinances.

2. It is now insisted that, inasmuch as all the uses to which electric wires are ordinarily applied are of a public character, and as the subways are to be used by corporations exercising public functions, they are for public, and not for private, use, and the power of regulation and control is reserved in the municipal authorities. In other words, that the uses to which the subways are to be applied, and not the ownership, determine their character; and, if the use is public, the streets may be devoted to their maintenance, and the power to regulate is reserved. It may be conceded that the use of electric wires for the transmission of messages by telegraph and telephone, and for the distribution of light throughout the city for the use of its inhabitants, is essentially public in its character, and to which the public streets may be properly devoted. Indeed, the correctness of this proposition has been frequently declared by this court, and is recognized by the legislation of this state. State, Laclede Gaslight Co. v. Murphy, 180 Mo. 10, 31 L. R. A. 798, and cases cited; Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 2721, 2792. It may also be conceded that, where the franchises granted by the government are for the purpose of subserving the public interests, power is reserved in the public to control the use for the common good, unless restricted in the grant. As has been said: "The rights of the public are never presumed to be surrendered to a corporation, unless the intention to surrender clearly appears in the law." Perrine v. Chesapeake & D. Canal Co. 50 U. S. 9 How. 172, 13 L. ed. 92. But it must be kept in mind that the city of St. Louis does not exercise original governmental functions, but only such measure thereof as the state has seen fit to delegate to it. Telegraph, telephone, and electric-light companies also receive their powers directly from the state. The reserved power to regulate them, unless within the delegated power of the city, rests in the state. These corporations are vested with power, under certain restrictions, to use the public streets of cities, and to place their wires and other fixtures under ground, on obtaining the consent of the municipal authorities thereof. Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 2721, 2793. It is evident that the city has no such reserved power over these wire-using corporations as is possessed by the state. It can only exercise such powers as are "granted in express words; those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to those expressly granted; those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 89; St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co. 96 Mo. 625, 2 L. R. A. 278. The express powers bearing upon the rights here claimed are confined to general police powers and the power to regulate legitimate public uses of the streets. But the public corporation to which the relator proposes to lease the use of the streets, and through which it proposes to serve the public, has express power from the state to place its wires and other fixtures under ground in the streets of cities provided it obtain the consent of the municipal authorities thereof. It is clear, therefore, that when a telegraph or other such corporation secures the right to lay its wires under ground in the streets of the city, no power of regulation is reserved by the city except such as is incident to the regulation of the use of the streets, and such as the safety and welfare of the public may demand. Any further rights must be secured by contract, as conditions of the lease. St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co. supra; St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 149 U. S. 469, 37 L. ed. 812.

3. But, conceding that the subways relator proposes to construct are, without other requirements or conditions, than those expressed in the ordinances, of such a public character and for such a public use as will authorize their construction in the public streets, and that the city has the power to confine their use to public purposes, we are still of the opinion that the ordinances are void, for the reason that the city thereby undertakes to delegate powers which it alone can exercise under its charter. The attempt is made under the ordinance to grant to the National Subway Company and its assigns the right to occupy space for its subway beneath the surface of every street in the city for the period of fifty years to the practical exclusion of all other public uses. It is given power to select its own patrons and dictate its own terms. It can elect upon which streets its works can be constructed. It can practically control the charges of all electric-wire using corporations. It has the practical control of the use of all public wires which may hereafter be required to go under ground. By the ordinances the city virtually surrenders to relator its power to regulate the underground use of its streets by wire-using companies and permits their use for such public purposes only as may appear most profitable to relator. The contract can only be characterized as an attempt on the part of the city to surrender and bargain away to relator its charter powers. This it could not do. "Powers are conferred upon municipal corporations for public purposes, and as their legislative powers cannot . . . be delegated, so they cannot without legislative authority, express or implied, be bargained or bartered away. Such corporations may make authorized contracts, but they have no power, as a party, to make contracts or pass by laws which shall cede away, control, or embarrass their legislative or governmental powers, or which shall disable them from performing their public duties." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 97; Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. v.

St. Louis Grain Elevator Co. supra; Matthews v. Alexandria, 68 Mo. 119, 30 Am. Rep. 776; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. p. 1045 and cases cited; Gosler v. Georgetown, 6 Wheat. 593, 5 L. ed. 339; Gale v. Kalamazoo, 23 Mich. 344, 9 Am. Rep. 80; Waterbury v. Laredo, 68 Tex. 565, 5 S. W. 81.

In the case last cited the city of Alexandria undertook to lease to Matthews its wharf, which the city had power to regulate and control. In passing upon the validity of the contract, the court says: "No authority was given by the charter of the city to lease the wharf, or farm out its revenues, or to empower anyone else to fix the rates of wharfage. All these things were attempted to be done by the contract under consideration, and, being wholly unauthorized, the contract was illegal and void. The legislative authority of the city could not be delegated, nor could the city abdicate its control over the public property held in trust by it for the benefit of the public."

The evidence here shows, and common knowledge advises us, that economy of space, convenience to the public, security, and proper adjustment of conflicting interests of the various competing companies make it desirable, if not necessary, that all electric wires should be laid in one subway; but the city cannot cede to another the power of supervision over them. That power only can be exercised by the city.

Daniel C. STANWOOD et al.

(166 Mass. 379.)

1. Partnership creditors may vote in the choice of assignees and on the matter of the discharge of a single insolvent partner, although the firm is not insolvent.
2. Firm debts can be proved against a single insolvent partner although the partnership is not insolvent or any proceedings taken against it.
3. One creditor of an insolvent is not aggrieved by the refusal of the insolvency court to permit other creditors to withdraw their assent to the discharge of the insolvent.
4. A release of an insolvent is not "a thing of value" within the meaning of Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 43, for obtaining which on credit and without intent to pay therefor he may be refused a discharge, and it does not constitute an asset in the debtor's estate.

A PPEAL by petitioner from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County sustaining demurrers to a bill to set aside a discharge in insolvency. Affirmed.

Daniel C. Stanwood, having become insolvent and not having sufficient cash to petition for his discharge, borrowed the sum of $40 for that purpose from a person who knew his insolvent condition and that the money was for the purpose of procuring an insolvency discharge. The proceeding was instituted and creditors of the firm of which the insolvent was a member were permitted to vote on the matter of discharge and the discharge was granted.

Further facts appear in the opinions.

Messrs. George Fred Williams and G. W. Anderson, for appellant:

If a legal bar (Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 81) to plaintiff's right to sue the insolvent has been interposed by illegal proceedings in the insolvency court, she must be a "party aggrieved," entitled in this forum to have that bar removed.

From the statutes and cases these general principles are a clear deduction:

1. Individual property must be applied to individual debts until they are paid in full; joint creditors have no rights against the separate estate until such payment.

2. Partnership property must be applied to partnership debts until they are paid in full; separate creditors have no rights until such payment.

3. Any surplus from either joint or separate estate, after the satisfaction of joint or separate debts, is to be applied to separate or joint debts.

solvency, and his private estate paid 55 per cent of his private debts, while neither the partnership estate nor the other partner's estate paid 50 per cent, the court ordered his discharge from his private debts, leaving him still liable as a partner.

Robson, Bankr. 780.

And this exception to the general rule is not admitted by our court.

Hove v. Lawrence, 9 Cush. 559, 57 Am. Dec. 68.

The partnership creditors could have no rights against the separate estate, even as against Stanwood, until they have brought the partnership properly into court and showed it insufficient to satisfy their claims.

Nor would joint claims be barred by the debtor's discharge under these proceedings.

Plaintiff is aggrieved by the court's refusal to allow withdrawals because such refusal resulted in the defendant's discharge and set up a bar to the plaintiff's claim.

This question cannot be determined on demurrer, unless the court should rule as a matter of law that the creditors had a right to withdraw their assents.

Merriam v. Richards, 8 Gray, 252; Beverly Bank v. Wilkinson, 2 Gray, 519.

Decisions sustaining the right to withdraw are:

Morse v. Lowell, 7 Met. 152; Safford v. Slade, 11 Cush. 29; Bemis v. Smith, 10 Met. 194.

The assent of the Everett Press Company, by its attorney, H. T. Richardson, was filed on May 10, 1894. No power of attorney to Richardson was then on file, or was placed on file until after September 23, the end of the six months. The right of the defendant to his discharge must be determined on the record at the end of the six months, and the record did not at that time show him entitled to a discharge. The Everett Press Company claim should not have been counted for his discharge.

Gifford v. Barker, 9 Gray, 364.

The claim of Arthur G. Stanwood, if a debt at all, was obtained for the purpose of influencing the proceedings in this cause, contrary to the provision in § 29 of the insolvency law.

Arthur Stanwood knew the insolvent was about to go into insolvency; that he had no assets to distribute, and was simply seeking a discharge from his debts. He passed him the $40 without any promise that the same should be repaid. There was therefore no express contract, and if there had been, it would have been a fraud on the insolvency law, and therefore void.

Mr. Anson M. Lyman, for appellees:

Under § 95, chap. 157, Pub. Stat. a creditor whose debt was proved or provable against an insolvency estate may, at any time within two years after the date thereof, apply to the court which granted it to annul the same, on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained.

By § 36 of this chapter, the assignee could have appealed to the superior court from the allowance of any of the claims objected to. These provisions of the statute give this plaintiff all the relief to which she is entitled.

Kempton v. Saunders, 132 Mass. 466; Freeland v. Mechanics' Bank, 16 Gray, 187.

A party aggrieved is one whose pecuniary interest is directly affected by the decree; one whose right of property may be established or divested by the decree.

The partnership creditors have no concern with the expunging of the claim of A. G. Stanwood, and the latter is not interested in the expunging of said partnership claims, nor in the question whether certain creditors shall be allowed to withdraw their assent to the debtor's discharge.

Gifford v. Barker, 9 Gray, 364; Gates v. Campbell, 8 Cush. 104.

The claims of the creditors of the copartnership of Bates, Stanwood, & Andrews were provable against the separate estate of Stanwood.

The petitions to withdraw the assent of the Notman Photograph Company, and of Messenger & Jones, were apparently drafted upon the theory, which is not law, that a creditor has an absolute right to withdraw his assent without assigning good reasons therefor.

Gifford v. Barker, 9 Gray, 364; Merriam v. Richards, 8 Gray, 252; Beverly Bank v. Wilkinson, 2 Gray, 519; Fenton v. Graham, 161 Mass. 556.

The plaintiff is entitled to no equitable relief in regard to the claim of Arthur G. Stanwood. Arthur G. Stanwood was certainly a creditor to the amount of $40 and as such was entitled to prove the claim. He could make all the allegations set forth in the statutory form of the proof of claim, and this furnishes a test of his right to prove.

Spurr v. Dean, 139 Mass. 84.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application to the supervisory jurisdiction of this court, under Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 15. There were demurrers by the two Stanwoods, which were sustained, and the bill dismissed, as to them with costs, and a decree pro confesso against the other defendants. It appears that the defendant Daniel C. Stanwood was adjudged insolvent on his own petition, and a warrant was duly issued against his estate. He was a member of the firm of Bates, Stanwood, & Andrews, which was never declared insolvent; and neither of the other partners was insolvent, or was declared to be so. No reference was made in the petition or warrant to the partnership. The schedule of creditors filed with the petition contained a list of firm and individual creditors. Firm creditors, as well as individual creditors, were allowed to and did prove, their claims, and vote for assignees and on the discharge. No assets came to the hands of the assignees. The plaintiff does not claim to be aggrieved by any action of the insolvency court respecting her own demand, but contends that she is a party aggrieved, because the partnership creditors were allowed, against her objection, to prove their claims, and to vote for assignees and on the discharge, and because of certain other rulings by the insolvency court in the course of the proceedings. For the purposes of this case, we assume without deciding, that the petitioner has a locus standi.

The principal question is whether the partnership creditors were rightly allowed to prove, and to vote in the choice of assignees, and on the matter of discharge. The plaintiff insists that they were not, and her contention is, in effect, that firm debts cannot be proved against a single insolvent partner, and he cannot be discharged from them by the insolvency court, unless the partnership is declared insolvent, and proceedings had accordingly. There are some cases which seem to favor the petitioner's view. Corey v. Perry, 67 Me. 140, 24 Am. Rep. 15; Poillon v. Lawrence, 77 N. Y. 207; Perkins v. Fisher, 80 Ky. 11; Re Noonan, 3 Biss. 491; Crompton v. Conkling, 15 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 417; Hudgins v. Lane, 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 463; Re Winkens, 2 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 349; Re Little, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 841. But we think that, on principle and authority, the better rule is the other way, and that it has been so held in this state, and is implied, by statute. It is elementary that each partner is liable in solido for the partnership debts. Davis v. Werden, 13 Gray, 805. His separate estate can be taken in satisfaction of them. Allen v. Wells, 22 Pick. 450, 33 Am. Dec. 757; Davis v. Werden, supra. He may be adjudicated bankrupt individually, because of his liability as partner; and his interest in the partnership, as well as his separate estate, passes to his assignee. Harrison v. Sterry, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 302, 3 L. ed. 104, 107; Robson, Bankr. 7th ed. 681; 2 Lindley, Partn. 2d Am. ed. *637. His estate continues liable in equity for partnership debts after his death, though the grounds of the liability do not seem to be very clearly settled. Kendall v. Hamilton, L.R. 4 App. Cas. 504; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 10th ed. § 676. His bankruptcy, like his death, dissolves the partnership. (Eustis v. Bolles, 146 Mass. 414) and the bankruptcy law is based largely on equitable principles. In view of these considerations, it seems to us that there is nothing in the nature of a partnership debt, per se, which should exclude it from proof against a single insolvent partner. Whether a partnership creditor is entitled to share in the distribution is another question. But the right to prove against an insolvent estate has never been made contingent, in this state, on the presence or absence of assets. If partnership debts are provable against a single insolvent partner, without regard to the insolvency of the firm or of the other partners, then it follows that a discharge will release the insolvent partner from the partnership debts, since it is expressly provided that a discharge shall release the debtor from all debts proved or provable against his estate. Pub. Stat. chap. 157, §§ 81, 83. Further, in the consideration of debts or demands which may be proved against the estate of an insolvent debtor, there is nothing which excludes joint or partnership claims or demands, or limits the proof to debts due to the creditor solely. Id. § 28. And it is plainly implied by Id. § 85, that an insolvent partner may be discharged from partnership debts on a warrant issued against him alone, and without the firm being adjudged insolvent as it is provided in §§ 120 et seq. that it may be. And we think that the cases are to the same effect. Barclay v. Phelps, 4 Met. 397, and Agawam Bank v. Morris, 4 Cush. 99, expressly hold that partnership debts may be proved against a single insolvent partner, but must be postponed in dividends to the claims of separate creditors. Lothrop v. Tilden, 8 Cush. 375, holds that a discharge granted to a single insolvent partner will bar partnership debts. In Buck v. Burlingame, 13 Gray, 307, a partnership creditor proved against an insolvent partner, and was allowed, as a preferred claim, the costs incurred in bringing suit against the firm, and attaching the separate estate of the insolvent partner. In Sigourney v. Williams, 1 Gray, 623, partnership creditors proved, and it was taken for granted that they had the right to do so; and the discharge was held to apply to their claims, as well as to the separate debts, though it is to be observed that the petition was by the debtor individually and as a member of the firm. In the present case the petition contained no reference to the partnership, but the schedule of debts filed with it included partnership debts as well as private ones; thus manifesting a desire on the part of the debtor if that is material, to be discharged from those. In Gates v. Mack, 5 Cush. 613, the right to prove a partnership debt against the estate of a single insolvent partner was expressly affirmed. The plaintiff further sought in that case to share with the several creditors in the distribution of the estate; and the assignees objected that the debt was a partnership debt; but the court held that by the discharge of the other partner the debt had become the sole and separate debt of the insolvent debtor, and that the proving creditor was entitled to share in the distribution. Barclay v. Phelps, supra, which may be regarded as the leading case, never has been denied, or it would seem, doubted, but has been cited several times with apparent approval. Burnside v. Merrick, 4 Met. 537, 545; Parker v. Phillips, 2 Cush. 175, 178; McDaniel v. King, 5 Cush. 469, 476; Gates v. Mack, Id. 613, 614; Catskill Bank v. Hooper, 5 Gray, 574, 583. See also Ex parte Yale, 3 P. Wms. 24, note A; Ex parte Taill, 16 Ves. Jr. 193, 195, note; Ex parte Hammond, L. R. 16 Eq. 614; Wilkins v.

Davis, 2 Low. Dec. 511; Re Freer, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 660; Re Abbe, 2 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 75; Re Stevens, 5 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 112; 1 Deven. Bankr. 3d ed. 657; Lindley, Partn. 2d Am. ed. *752; Robson, Bankr. 7th ed. 657.

The plaintiff relies upon Robb v. Mudge, 14 Gray, 534; Wild v. Dean, 8 Allen, 579, and Baker's Case, 8 Cush. 109, as, in effect, qualifying, if not overruling, Barclay v. Phelps, and Agawam Bank v. Morris, supra. We do not so regard them. The question in the first two of those cases was whether a certain debt was a partnership debt, or the private debt of one of the partners, and as such entitled to share in the separate estate,—not whether, if it was a partnership debt, it was entitled to proof. Baker's Case was a case of an insolvent partnership. The plaintiff also relies upon Parker v. Phillips, 2 Cush. 175; Thompson v. Thompson, 4 Cush. 127, and Pelletier v. Couture, 148 Mass. 269, 1 L. R. A. 863. But those cases only decide that after dissolution, as before, a partnership may be adjudged insolvent on the petition of one of the partners, and the joint and separate estates distributed accordingly. In this case no question arises as to the distribution of firm assets or the course to be pursued in the winding up of an insolvent partnership; though in the latter event it is to be noted that there is no such thing as a partnership discharge, but each partner is to be granted or refused a discharge as if the proceedings had been against him alone, and Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 124, implies that proceedings may be instituted against, or promoted by, a single partner.

If, then, partnership debts are provable against a single partner, in insolvency, and are released by his discharge, there would seem to be no good reason why partnership creditors should not vote on the matter of discharge, or in the choice of assignees. In the case of Re Purvis, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 163, it seems to have been held that, though partnership creditors were allowed to prove, they could not vote in the choice of assignees. The practice seems to have been otherwise in this state. As far back as 1859 the late Chief Justice Bigelow (then Justice Bigelow) sustained a ruling by Judge Richardson, of the insolvency court, allowing partnership creditors to prove against a single insolvent partner, and to vote in the choice of assignee. Seavey's Case, S. J. C. Middlesex; Cutler, Insolv. Laws, pp. 74, 214. And such a practice would seem to conform to our statute, which provides that the assignee shall be chosen by the creditors who have proved their debts. Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 40.

Perhaps the conclusions thus expressed may appear to lead to an inconsistency in dealing with partnership claims in the case of a single insolvent partner, and in the case of an insolvent firm. But the inconsistency is seeming only, and not real. In the latter case no more than in the former are partnership creditors permitted to compete with separate creditors in the distribution of the separate estates. In the case of a single insolvent partner there is no method in which the rights of partnership creditors to an ultimate share in the estate can be protected, unless they are entitled to prove. In the case of an insolvent firm, their rights in that regard, and in the choice of assignees and the matter of discharge, are fully protected and established by proof against the firm. And it certainly would be a hardship if a solvent firm, with solvent partners, had to be adjudicated insolvent, or had to liquidate, in order that an insolvent member might be discharged of the firm debts, though, if the statute required it, there would be no alternative but to do it. We think, therefore, that on the main question the ruling of the insolvency court was correct.

The remaining objections may be briefly disposed of. The release was not a "thing of value," within the meaning of Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 93. It did not constitute an asset in the debtor's estate. If it was obtained by fraud, as the plaintiff contends, it had no force or validity, and still less was a thing of value. Besides, the settlement and payment by notes operated as a release without anything more, and the plaintiff has retained and proved the notes. There is nothing in the statute which requires written evidence of authority to act on the part of an attorney who assents, in the name of his principal, to a discharge. The $40 was a debt due to the person advancing it, and, as a creditor, he had a right to prove his claim, and to vote on the question of discharge. We do not think that the plaintiff was a party aggrieved by the refusal of the judge of the insolvency court to permit certain creditors to withdraw their assent to the discharge. Freelund v. Mechanics' Bank, 16 Gray, 137; Kemp-ton v. Saunders, 132 Mass. 466. The result is that in the opinion of a majority of the court the decree should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Knowlton, J., dissenting:

The injustice that will be accomplished under the decision in this case is so flagrant, and the result reached so at variance with what I have long supposed to be the law of Massachusetts, and with the weight of authority in other jurisdictions, that I feel constrained to state my views. The record shows that one Stanwood owed to six different parties separate debts amounting in the aggregate to $2,090. He had no separate property. He was a member of a perfectly solvent firm, which owed some debts, but was not brought into the court of insolvency. He induced creditors of the firm, who had not the slightest interest in the insolvency proceedings, to prove their claims against him as an individual, and to sign their assent to his discharge, and thereby relieve him from all of his separate debts, against the will of his separate creditors, without his paying anything. Doubtless these partnership creditors then went to the other members of the firm, and received their pay in full from the partnership assets. There is some confusion in the earlier cases touching this subject. In Barclay v. Phelps, 4 Met. 397, it was held that the language of the statute, "two or more persons who are partners" (Stat. 1838, chap. 163, § 21; Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 120), did not apply literally to members of a partnership which had been dissolved before the commencement of proceedings in insolvency, and that such a partnership could not be brought into the insolvency court, and that therefore the creditors of it could prove against an individual partner. In Parker v. Phillips, 2 Cush. 175, it was intimated, and in Thompson v. Thompson, 4 Cush. 127, it was expressly decided, that this narrow construction of the statute was erroneous; and it has ever since been held that previously dissolved insolvent partnerships are to be brought into the court of insolvency, and settled there, as well as those existing at the commencement of insolvency proceedings. Pelletier v. Couture 148 Mass. 269, 1 L. R. A. 863. Although for nearly fifty years it has been settled that the reason given for the decision in Barclay v. Phelps has no foundation in law, the case was not expressly overruled; and in the early practice under the statute the decision was sometimes followed by magistrates, and their action passed without disapproval by this court. Under this practice, if an individual who was a member of a firm was in insolvency without bringing in the partnership, all of the partnership creditors were allowed to bring their claims into court, and, in a sense, to prove them against the separate estate, simply for the purpose of sharing in the surplus if there was anything left after paying the separate creditors. It never was adjudged that they could do anything to affect the rights of the separate creditors, and they never were allowed to receive anything from the separate estate unless the separate creditors were first paid in full. Agawam Bank v. Morris, 4 Cush. 99. See also Somerset Potters' Works v. Minot, 10 Cush. 592, 598-601; Catskill Bank v. Hooper, 5 Gray, 574-588. In Gates v. Mack, 5 Cush. 618, one who was formerly a partnership creditor was allowed to prove against one of the partners only, because there had been a severance by former proceedings in insolvency, in which the other partners had been discharged; leaving the debt from that time an individual debt, for which the insolvent only was liable. In Baker's Case, 8 Cush. 109, the statute received exposition in reference to discharges where there are both individual and partnership creditors, to the effect that the rule stated in Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 121, requiring the separate estates of the individual debtors to be administered by themselves, and the partnership estate to be administered by itself, and giving to creditors of either class no rights in the estate applicable to debts of the other class until all the creditors of that class are first paid in full, and then only a right to have the surplus assets transferred to the estate, and administered for creditors of their class, is applicable to discharges,—so that partnership creditors alone can sign their assent to a discharge from partnership debts, and separate creditors of each partner alone can sign their assent to a discharge from his individual debts, and a discharge may be granted from one's individual debts and not from his partnership debts, or from his partnership debts and not from his individual debts; the granting or refusal of the discharge from each class of debts depending upon their giving or withholding their assent to a discharge. Since that decision was announced, it has been the practice in the insolvency courts of most of the counties of the state, as I know,—and I believe it has in all of them,—to grant a discharge from individual debts, and to refuse it from partnership debts, or vice versa, if the amount of the dividend, or the assent of creditors, called for different results in the different estates, and to hold that a discharge from one class of debts has no effect upon debts of the other class. No later case has questioned this doctrine, and I must assume it to be the law of the state to-day. In Lothrop v. Tilden, 8 Cush. 875, the warrant issued upon a representation that the petitioner was indebted both personally and as a member of a firm. The only debts proved were partnership debts, and the certificate, in terms, purported to cover these debts. The next important adjudication bearing upon the question now before us was in Robb v. Mudge, 14 Gray, 584, which in my judgment fully covers the present case. It was a suit involving large amounts, and was argued by several of the ablest lawyers in the state. In that case, as in this, the insolvent debtor did not represent the partnership estate as insolvent, and the proceedings in the insolvency court had reference to his individual estate alone. A firm of which he was a member was dissolved a few months before the commencement of the insolvency proceedings, owing debts upon which he was liable as a partner at the time of their commencement. The claims were presented by the holders of them for proof in the insolvency court against his estate. It was held in an elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice Bigelow that they could not be received, and they were disallowed. There was no intimation that the claims could be given any kind of standing in that proceeding. Both the language of the opinion and the judgment were directly contrary to the decision in Barclay v. Phelps, and it seems to me that the result reached necessarily followed from the decision in Baker's Case, ubi supra, and from a careful consideration of our statutes.

It is to be noticed that our courts of insolvency have no jurisdiction except that which is expressly conferred upon them by the statute, and until the enactment of Stat. 1894, chap. 164, had no jurisdiction whatever in equity. The jurisdiction in regard to partnership estates is conferred by Pub. Stat. chap. 157, §§ 120 et seq., and it exists only "when two or more persons who are partners become insolvent." If the partnership is insolvent, its estate, as well as that of each of the individual partners, is brought into court; and it may be brought in upon the representation of either of the partners, or of the creditors of the firm. If the partnership estate is brought into court to be settled, the estates of the firm and of the individual members, although dealt with at the same time and in one proceeding, are settled separately, as if separate warrants had been issued against each. Baker's Case, ubi supra; Pub. Stat. chap. 157, §§ 121, 123, 124. Creditors can only prove against the estate which is indebted to them. The only way in which they can derive any benefit from an estate of another class is by having any surplus that remains after paying creditors of that class in full added to the assets of the estate against which they have proved. There is no provision in the statute for any kind of proof except a real proof that entitles one to his dividend with the others. If a debt is presented for proof, it is either proved and allowed, or it is disallowed. If it is proved it entitles the holder to all the rights of a creditor, among which are the rights to receive a dividend, and to assent or withhold assent to a discharge. I do not know where any warrant is found in the statute for giving a creditor an anomalous position, which is not that of a holder of a proved claim, but that of a holder of a claim which is recognized by the court for the purpose of sharing in a surplus, if there is any, after the estate is settled by paying in full all creditors whose claims are regularly proved, and who are entitled to dividends. The general provisions in regard to the proof of claims and the rights and liabilities of creditors seem to me inapplicable to claims presented for such a purpose only, and no special provision is made for such claims. I have searched the books in vain for a case under our statute in which the court, after administering an estate that paid individual debts in full, has attempted to administer the surplus by a distribution among partnership creditors, unless the partnership estate was first brought into court, under Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 120, by the insolvency of the several partners. If such an attempt is hereafter made, there being no jurisdiction of the partnership assets, or of the assets of the solvent members of the firm, it will be interesting to consider what scheme can be devised for the purpose.

If a partnership is insolvent, it must be brought into court, and its affairs are properly settled there. If the partnership is not insolvent, some of the partners being in a condition to pay all partnership debts as they are presented, there is no occasion for the partnership creditors to come into court, and the individual insolvent debtor has no occasion to obtain a discharge from the partnership debts. There is but a bare possibility that he will ever be called upon to pay any of them after getting his discharge from his individual debts, and, if he should be, he would have his remedy over against the solvent members of the firm. His copartners are fully protected, for his liability to contribute his share of any deficiency is an individual liability, which they may prove against his estate. Upon the doctrine laid down in Baker's Case and in Robb v. Mudge, ubi supra, the proceedings are simple, and the rights of everybody are fully protected. The rule laid down in Robb v. Mudge was reaffirmed with emphasis in Wild v. Dean, 3 Allen, 579, in which firm creditors attempted to prove their claims against the estate of an individual partner; the principal difference between this case and Robb v. Mudge being that in this the partnership, as well as the individual, was in insolvency. Since the decision in Robb v. Mudge there is nothing in our books, that I can find, which indicates that a partnership creditor can prove a claim against the individual estate of one of the partners, whether the partnership is adjudged insolvent or not. Nobody contends that he can prove for the purpose of sharing with the individual creditors, or of receiving anything unless they are first paid in full. But if an anomalous kind of proof is to be allowed, which is wholly subordinate to other rights in the separate estate, how can it be consistent with the nature and purpose of the proof to allow the firm creditors, by their assent, to discharge the insolvent from his individual debts? And how can such anomalous kind of proof, which does not entitle firm creditors to a dividend, bring them within the terms of the discharge, which includes only debts proved or provable against the estate? Clearly, it is not the kind of proof meant by the statute. Under the doctrine of the opinion, an injustice may be done to a debtor as great as that done to the separate creditors in the present case. A debtor who complies with all of the provisions of the statutes is entitled to a discharge if his estate pays a dividend of 50 per cent or more to the creditors among whom it is distributed. Suppose that a debtor's estate pays a dividend of 90 per cent to separate creditors, and suppose that one of these creditors desires to prevent the granting of the discharge, and induces partnership creditors of a solvent firm, of which the debtor was a member, to present claims, which are proved in this special way, to an amount greater than the whole amount of the separate debts. If these claims are reckoned with the claims of the separate creditors in determining whether a discharge shall be granted, the dividend of 90 per cent will not be enough to make a dividend of 50 per cent upon the aggregate of the debts of the two classes. If this method is adopted a debtor may be unable to obtain a discharge from his separate debts unless he pays them in full, even though there is partnership property in the possession of the solvent partners to an amount sufficient to pay all of the partnership debts. An important object of the law may thus be entirely defeated. All of the decisions in other states which have come to my attention tend to support my view, and nearly all of those in the Federal courts. Corey v. Perry, 67 Me. 140, 24 Am. Rep. 15; Poillon v. Lawrence, 77 N. Y. 207; Perkins v. Fisher, 80 Ky. 11; Re Little, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 341; Re Winkens, 2 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 349; Hudgins v. Lane, 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 462; Crompton v. Conklin, 15 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 417. See also as bearing upon the question, Rice's Case, 7 Allen, 112; Nutting v. Ashcroft, 101 Mass. 300; Stat. 1865, chap. 113 (Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 125); Bucklin v. Bucklin, 97 Mass. 256.

I think the petition to expunge the proof of the partnership debts should be granted.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Re ESTATE OF Nehemiah HULETT, Deceased.

John R. CAREY, Admr., etc., of Nehemiah Hulett, Deceased, et al., Appls.,

v.

Lucy A. HULETT, Resp't.

"1. The issue being whether the deceased executed an alleged written contract of marriage with the petitioner, conveyances executed by the deceased, subsequent to the marriage contract, in which he was described as a single man, were inadmissible in evidence against the petitioner.

3. A letter written by petitioner to her sister subsequent to the execution of the marriage contract, in which she referred to the deceased as "her husband" and "your brother," was handed by her to the deceased to read. He read it, enclosed it in an envelope addressed to the sister, and put it in his pocket with other letters, apparently for the purpose of posting it. Held, that this so connected the deceased with the letter that it was competent evidence in favor of the petitioner as his admissions.

3. It is mutual, present consent lawfully expressed, which makes marriage. All that is necessary to render competent parties husband and wife is that they agree in the present tense to be such, no time being contemplated to elapse before the assumption of the status. It is not necessary that such a contract be followed by holding themselves out to the public as husband and wife, or that it be acted on by their professedly living together in that relation. The distinction noted between the fact of marriage and the proof of it.

4. The fact that under our statutes a wife may inherit from her husband has not changed the common-law rule that the will of a man is not revoked by his subsequent marriage alone, without the birth of issue.

APPEAL by proponents from orders of the District Court for St. Louis County denying probate to a paper alleged to be the last will and testament of Nehemiah Hulett, deceased, and granting homestead rights to one claiming to be his widow. Reversed as to the first order; affirmed as to the second.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. L. Washburn, with Mr. James Spencer, for appellants:

The controlling fact in this case, and the one which should have been submitted to the jury, was the inquiry as to whether these parties were husband and wife.

Re Terry's Estate, 58 Minn. 268.

The verdict should be held null for its failure to determine the material and substantial question of fact involved.

*Headnotes by MITCHELL, J.

The deeds made by Hulett were receivable in evidence, and the recitals therein contained admissible under the rules of pedigree evidence. They were made by one who knew. They were made before the controversy had arisen. They were made by one deceased prior to the time of the trial and his death had fully appeared. Pedigree embraces birth, marriage, death and the date thereof.

The evidence was admissible as a written statement, entry, or declaration made by the deceased in the usual course of business, where there was no lis mota apparent.

In a controversy of this kind as characterizing the relations between a man and woman claimed to have been married they were admissible as a part of the res gesta.

When we have shown that this evidence is admissible under the doctrine that it is a part of the res gesta we have removed it from the field of secondary or hearsay evidence, and it becomes primary evidence of the facts.

Messrs. Henry S. Mahon, Pence & Carpenter, and Davis, Kellogg, & Severance for respondent.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Nehemiah Hulett, for many years a resident of St. Louis county, and generally supposed and reputed to be a bachelor, died July 25, 1892. Proceedings were duly had in the probate court of that county, whereby a will which he had executed in May, 1862, was proved, and admitted to probate on October 10, 1892, and John R. Carey appointed administrator with the will annexed. On February 18, 1893, the respondent, under the name of Lucy A. Hulett, presented her petition to the probate court, alleging that she was the widow of Hulett, that she was married to him on January 6, 1892, and praying that the homestead of the deceased be set apart to her, and that she be allowed to select certain personal property, pursuant to the statutes in such case made and provided. On September 18, 1893, she presented another petition to the probate court reiterating her marriage to the deceased, and praying that the probate of the will be vacated and set aside and declared not to be the last will and testament of the deceased. In this petition she alleged that she and the deceased were married by mutual consent, but without any formal solemnization, and that in evidence of such marriage a certain instrument in writing was executed by both parties at the time of the contract of marriage. Both petitions alleged, and it is an admitted fact, that Hulett died without issue, and that no issue was ever born of the alleged marriage between him and the petitioner. The only ground here material, on which it was asked that the probate of the will be vacated, was that it was revoked by the marriage of Hulett to the petitioner subsequent to its execution. The administrator, the devisees and legatees under the will, and the heirs at law of the deceased all opposed the granting of the petitions; their main contention being that the petitioner had never been married to the deceased. It appeared on the hearings before the probate court that the foundation of the petitioner's claim to be the widow of the deceased was the following instrument, alleged to have been executed by her and the deceased on January 7, but by mistake dated January 6, 1892:

Contract of Marriage between N. Hulett and Mrs. L. A. Pomeroy.

Believing a marriage by contract to be perfectly lawful, we do hereby agree to be husband and wife, and to hereafter live together as such. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands the day and year first above written.

[Signed]

N. Hulett.
L. A. Pomeroy

The probate court decided adversely to the petitioner, and denied both her petitions, whereupon she appealed to the district court in both cases. Inasmuch as the main, if not the only, issue in both appeals was whether there had been a valid common-law marriage between the petitioner and the deceased, both were tried together. When the appeals came on for trial, the district court ordered that the following question be submitted to a jury, viz.: "Was the paper purporting to have been made on January 6, 1892 [the marriage contract above set forth], in fact executed by the late Nehemiah Hulett?" All other issues of law and fact, if any, were reserved to be tried and determined by the court. Exception is taken by the appellants to the action of the court in submitting this question to a jury. But upon the record no such objection is open to the appellants, because it appears that this is one of the very questions, but better expressed, which they themselves asked to be thus submitted. The court, however, had a right to do this on its own motion. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5361. This practice is as old as courts of chancery themselves, and this is just the kind of a question which those courts were in the habit of sending out to a court of law to obtain the verdict of a jury. So far from trying the issues piecemeal, as counsel claim, this question was really decisive of the only issue of fact in the case, as we will hereafter show. The case proceeded to the trial before a jury of the question thus submitted to them. Of course, the contest was over the genuineness of Hulett's signature to the marriage contract. While evidence was introduced as to various collateral facts tending more or less directly to throw light on this question, the bulk of the evidence consisted of the testimony of experts, properly so called, and of persons acquainted with Hulett's handwriting, as to whether his purported signature to the marriage contract was genuine or a forgery. As is usual in such cases, the testimony of these witnesses was very conflicting; but the jury answered the question submitted to them in the affirmative, and it is not claimed, and could not be successfully, that the evidence did not justify the verdict. Hence, unless errors of law, duly excepted to, occurred during the trial of this issue, it must stand as a settled fact, with all its legal consequences, that Hulett and the respondent did execute the marriage contract on the 7th of January, 1892. This disposes of the first assignment of error.

2. Of the various assignments of error relating to the rulings of the court admitting or excluding evidence on the jury trial only three—the ninth, tenth, and fourteenth—are worthy of special notice. The appellants offered in evidence a mortgage on real estate executed by Hulett alone on the 31st of May, 1892, in the certificate of acknowledgment of which the notary described Hulett as a single man. This was excluded by the court. Counsel then offered to prove by other documents that Hulett, subsequent to the date of the alleged marriage contract, "continued to make conveyances of property and execute legal instruments in which he was designated as a single and an unmarried man in the same manner as prior to said date." This offer was likewise excluded. Counsel then offered in evidence a bill of sale executed by Hulett on May 31, 1892, in the certificate of acknowledgment of which the notary described Hulett as a single man. This offer was accompanied by a statement of counsel that this bill of sale was "simply an additional document on the same line." This offer was also excluded. In view of the specific offers which thus preceded and followed the general offer, we think the latter must be construed as meaning, not that Hulett described himself as a single man in the body of the instrument, but merely that he was so described in the certificate of the officers who took his acknowledgments. But, however that may be, and without considering the competency of such evidence had it been sought to prove a contract of marriage by "habit and repute," we are clearly of opinion that it was inadmissible upon the sole issue then being tried before the jury, to wit, whether Hulett executed the express written contract of marriage referred to. Any statements he might have made in these conveyances were certainly no part of the res gesta, to wit, the execution of the written contract of marriage. As respects that subject, it seems to us that such evidence would be merely the subsequent self-serving statements of one of the parties. The fourteenth assignment is that the court erred in admitting in evidence Exhibit 133, being a letter written July 24, 1892, by the respondent to her sister, in Ohio, containing references to her relations to Hulett; as, for example, where she speaks of him as "my husband" and "your brother Hulett." If Hulett had been in no way connected with this letter, so that it would have been the mere statement of the respondent herself, it would have been inadmissible. But the testimony of the respondent was that she wrote it in the presence of Hulett, and then handed it to him to read; that he read it, put it in an envelope, sealed it, and put it in his pocket. She further testified that she subsequently received it back from her sister, to whom it was written. This letter, according to respondent's testimony, was written the day before Hulett's death. The next morning he left home to take the cars to go to Duluth, but died suddenly at the station, while waiting for the train. After his death, a number of letters, addressed, and apparently intended to be mailed, were found in his pocket by the undertaker, who gave them to a nephew of the deceased, who put stamps on them, and posted them. As this letter reached the person to whom it was written, the fair inferences from the evidence are that this was one of the letters found in Hulett's pocket after his death, that the envelope in which it was inclosed was addressed, and that these letters were put in his pocket by Hulett for the purpose of posting them when he reached the city. These facts, if true, amounted to such a recognition of and assent to the statements contained in the letter as to make them, in effect, the joint declarations and statements of both Hulett and the respondent, and therefore competent as his admissions. It is urged very strenuously by counsel for the appellants that the testimony of the respondent, by which she was thus enabled to connect Hulett with the contents of her letter, impinges upon the statute that it shall not be competent for any party to an action or interested in the event thereof to give evidence therein of or concerning any conversation with or admission of a deceased person relative to any matter at issue between the parties. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5660. It was held in Chadwick v. Cornish, 26 Minn. 28, followed in subsequent decisions, that the language of the act refers only to spoken words. If it was a question of first impressions, it might admit of discussion whether the statute ought not to be construed in accordance with the views of the late Chief Justice Gilfillan, so as to include any admission of the party, whether by word or act. The peculiar facts of the present case illustrate the fact that admissions by act may often be as much within the mischief aimed at as admissions by spoken words. But, as the narrower construction placed upon the statute has been adhered to and followed for nearly eighteen years, during which the legislature has not seen fit to amend the law, it is now too late for us to reconsider the question.

None of the exceptions to the charge are well taken or of sufficient substance to require discussion. In fact, the charge was, in most respects a model one. Instead of merely stating general abstract principles of law (as is often the case), which the average lay juror is usually incapable of correctly applying to the facts of the particular case, the learned judge gave the jury the benefit of a very full, clear, and impartial analysis of the evidence, taking up each important branch of it, and explaining to them its bearing upon the issue which they were to decide. This disposes of all the assignments of error relating to the trial of the issue before the jury.

3. When the other issues came on for trial, by stipulation of the parties all the evidence introduced upon the trial before the jury was deemed as introduced, subject to the same objections and exceptions, in the trial by the court. A small amount of additional evidence having been introduced, both appeals were submitted to the court for its decision. The court thereupon made separate findings of fact and conclusions of law in each appeal. The second finding of fact in each case was to the effect that the deceased and the petitioner were husband and wife, the only difference being that in the one appeal the finding was that they were such on the 7th of January, 1892 (the date of the execution of the marriage contract), and on the 25th of July, 1892 (the date of Hulett's death), while in the other appeal the finding was that they became husband and wife on the 7th of January, 1892; the difference in the two findings being, in our opinion, immaterial. The court held, as conclusions of law, in the one appeal, that the petitioner was entitled, as widow, to an order setting apart to her the homestead of the deceased, etc.; and, in the other, that the will of Hulett, executed in 1862, was revoked by his subsequent marriage to the petitioner. It is to this second finding of fact and to this last conclusion of law that the appellants take exception, and this presents the two principal questions raised by these appeals. The respondent had been for a long time prior to the execution of the marriage contract in the employment of Hulett as housekeeper at his farm at Stoney Point, some miles out of the city of Duluth. Her testimony is that immediately after the execution of this contract she moved into his room, and that from henceforth until his death they occupied the same sleeping apartment, and cohabited together as husband and wife. But she admits that it was agreed between them that their marriage was to be kept secret until they could move into Duluth, and go to house-keeping in a house which Hulett owned in that city. While a feeble effort was made to prove that their marital relation had become known to one or two persons, yet we consider the evidence conclusive that their marriage contract was kept secret, that they never publicly assumed marital relations, or held themselves out to the public as husband and wife, but, on the contrary, so conducted themselves as to leave the public under the impression that their former relations of employer and house-keeper remained unchanged. Upon this state of facts the contention of the appellants is that there was no marriage, notwithstanding the execution by them of the written contract; that, in order to constitute a valid common-law marriage, the contract, although per verba de presenti, must be followed by habit or reputation of marriage,—that is, as we understand counsel, by the public assumption of marital relations. We do not so understand the law. The law views marriage as being merely a civil contract, not differing from any other contract, except that it is not revocable or dissoluble at the will of the parties. The essence of the contract of marriage is the consent of the parties, as in the case of any other contract; and, whenever there is a present, perfect consent to be husband and wife, the contract of marriage is completed. The authorities are practically unanimous to this effect. Marriage is a civil contract jure gentium, to the validity of which the consent of parties able to contract is all that is required by natural or public law. If the contract is made per verba de presenti, and remains without cohabitation, or if made per verba de futuro, and be followed by consummation, it amounts to a valid marriage, in the absence of any civil regulations to the contrary. 2 Kent, Com. p. 87; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 460; 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 218, 227-229. The maxim of the civil law was Consensus, non concubitus, facit matrimonium. The whole law on the subject is that, to render competent parties husband and wife, they must and need only agree in the present tense to be such, no time being contemplated to elapse before the assumption of the status. If cohabitation follows, it adds nothing in law, although it may be evidence of marriage. It is mutual, present consent, lawfully expressed, which makes the marriage. 1 Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 239, 313, 315, 317. See also the leading case of Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 3 Hagg. Constat. Rep. 54, which is the foundation of much of the law on the subject. An agreement to keep the marriage secret does not invalidate it, although the fact of secrecy might be evidence that no marriage ever took place. Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, supra. The only two cases which we have found in which anything to the contrary was actually decided are Reg. v. Mills, 10 Clark & F. 584, and Jewell v. Jewell, 42 U. S. 1 How. 219, 11 L. ed. 108, the court in each case being equally divided. But these cases have never been recognized as the law, either in England or in this country. Counsel for appellants contend, however, that the law is otherwise in this state, citing State v. Worthingham, 28 Minn. 528, in which this court used the following language: "Consent, freely given, is the essence of the contract. A mutual agreement, therefore, between competent parties, per verba de presenti, to take each other for husband and wife, deliberately made, and acted upon by living together professedly in that relation, is held by the great weight of American authority sufficient to constitute a valid marriage with all its legal incidents;" citing Hutchins v. Kimmell, 81 Mich. 126, 18 Am. Rep. 164. Similar expressions have been sometimes used by other courts, but upon examination it will be found that in none of them was it ever decided that, although the parties mutually agreed per verba de presenti to take each other for husband and wife, it was necessary, in order to constitute a valid marriage, that this agreement should have been subsequently acted upon by their living together professedly as husband and wife. In some cases where such expressions were used the court was merely stating a proved or admitted fact in that particular case, while in others the contract of marriage was sought to be proved by habit and repute, and the courts merely meant that the act of parties in holding themselves out as husband and wife is evidence of a marriage. In State v. Worthingham, supra, which was a prosecution for bastardy, the defendant offered as proof of his marriage to the mother of the child that during all the time they lived and cohabited together the woman held herself out to her friends generally as his wife, and that both of them represented to the world that they had been married. The point really decided by the court, and evidently the only one it had in mind, was that this was competent evidence of a marriage, and that no formal solemnization or ceremony was necessary to give it validity. The statement in the opinion already quoted is probably subject to the criticism that it does not accurately discriminate between the fact of marriage and the proof of it. The case of Hutchins v. Kimmell, supra, cited by this court, does contain such expressions as "followed by cohabitation," and "from that time lived together professedly in that relation;" but this language was evidently used simply as a recital of the actual facts in that particular case. There is nothing in the opinion indicating that the court intended to hold that a mutual, present consent to be husband and wife will not constitute a valid marriage unless followed by cohabitation of the parties, and a holding of themselves out as man and wife. Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, and Id. 79 Cal. 638, is not in point, for the reason that § 55 of the Civil Code of that state provides that "consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." In view of the increasing number of common-law widows laying claim (in many instances, doubtless fraudulently) to the estates of deceased men of wealth, it is a question for the legislature whether the common law should not be changed; but with that the courts have nothing to do.

4. This brings us to the last and most important question in the case, viz., Was the will of Hulett revoked by his marriage to the respondent? At common law the marriage of a woman absolutely revoked her will. The reason usually given was that, a married woman having no testamentary capacity, her will was no longer ambulatory. But the marriage of a man did not revoke his previous will in regard to either real or personal estate. This was not considered such a change of condition as would work a revocation by implication or inference of law. The reason usually given was that the law made for the wife a provision independently of the act of the husband by means of dower. But the marriage and the birth of issue conjointly revoked a man's will, whether of real or personal estate; these circumstances producing such a total change in the testator's condition as to lead to a presumption that he could not intend a disposition of property previously made to continue unchanged. The issue, the birth of which would revoke a will, must have been such as could have inherited the property which was the subject of the will, so that the effect of throwing open the property to the disposition of the law would have been to let in the after-born child or children, for whose benefit alone the implied revocation obtained. The chief reason why marriage and the birth of issue was deemed such a change of condition on part of the testator as would work a revocation of his will was that otherwise his issue, which was the natural object of his bounty, would be wholly unprovided for, differing in that respect from the widow, for whom the law had made provision by means of dower. Hence it seems to have been the rule that marriage and the birth of issue would not produce the revocation of a will where provision was made by the will itself for the children of the future marriage. At common law a married woman could not inherit from her husband. In case of her husband dying intestate, she was not entitled to anything out of his estate except her dower. While by our statutes dower eo nomine has been abolished, yet the law makes provision for the widow, independently of the act of the husband, much more liberal than the common law did. She is entitled—First, to a life estate in the homestead of her deceased husband, free from any testamentary devise or other disposition to which she shall not have assented in writing, and free from all debts or claims against his estate; second, to an undivided third in fee simple, or such inferior tenure as the deceased husband was at any time during coverture seised or possessed thereof, of one undivided third of all other lands of which the deceased was at any time during coverture seised or possessed, free from any testamentary or other disposition thereof to which she shall not have assented in writing, but subject in its just proportion with other real estate to the payment of such debts of the deceased as are not paid from the personal estate. Of the personal estate of which her husband dies possessed the widow is entitled to all his wearing apparel, his household furniture, not exceeding in value $500; other personal property to be selected by her, not exceeding in value $500; a reasonable allowance for her maintenance during administration, which, in case the estate is insolvent, is not to be for more than one year. Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 4470, 4471, 4477. Such is the provision which the law makes for the widow. The statute then provides that, where the husband dies intestate, the residue of his estate, real and personal, shall descend and be distributed as follows: First, to his children, and to the lawful issue of any deceased child by right of representation; second, if there be no child, and no lawful issue of any deceased child, then to the surviving wife. It is mainly on this last provision by which the wife may inherit from her husband that counsel for the respondent base their contention that in this state marriage alone will revoke by implication of law the prior will of the husband. Their argument may all be summed up in the proposition that, inasmuch as a widow may now inherit from her husband (which she could not do at common law), therefore marriage alone effects the same change in the condition or circumstances of the husband as was effected under the common law by his marriage, and the birth of issue who could inherit. The courts of two or three western states have taken substantially this position. See Tyler v. Tyler, 19 Ill. 151; Morgan v. Ireland, 1 Idaho, 786;

Brown v. Scherrer, 5 Colo. App. 255, approved and affirmed in 21 Colo. 481. In Tyler v. Tyler, supra, the question was not discussed at any great length, and the weight of that case as authority is somewhat impaired by the fact that in a subsequent case the court placed its refusal to reconsider the question mainly on the ground that the legislature had subsequently enacted that marriage alone, without the birth of issue, revoked a will, and hence that any decision which the court might make would be merely retroactive. The most able and forcible presentation of the arguments on that side of the question is to be found in the opinion of the Colorado court of appeals in Brown v. Scherrer, supra. But, after carefully considering all that has been said on that side, we are compelled to the conclusion that due weight has not been given to the fact that the main reason why, at common law, marriage and the birth of issue was deemed such a change in the condition or circumstances of the husband as would work an implied revocation of his prior will was that otherwise his issue would be wholly unprovided for,—a thing which was not to be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the testator; whereas, under our statutes, and, we assume, without special examination, under the statutes of those states in which the decisions cited were rendered, even if the will stands, very liberal provision has been made for the widow independently of any act of the husband. There is a prevailing sentiment, often expressed by both courts and text-writers, that marriage alone should be deemed such a change in condition and circumstances as will revoke a prior will. A statute to that effect was passed in England in 1837 (1 Vict. chap. 26), followed by the enactment of statutes to the same effect in many of the states of the Union. How far this sentiment may have unconsciously influenced the decisions referred to it is impossible to say, but no court has ever assumed to hold on this ground alone, and in the absence of legislation affecting the question, that the common-law rule was abrogated, or so far modified, that marriage alone would revoke a will. It is also suggested that the common-law rule had its origin in part in the ancient desire to build upon families and family estates a consideration which has no place in this country. It is undoubtedly true that many of the doctrines of the common law had their origin in social or political conditions which have in whole or in part ceased to exist. But this fact alone will not usually justify courts in holding that these doctrines, when once thoroughly established, have been abrogated, any more than it would justify them in holding that a statute had been abrogated because the reason for its enactment had ceased. Any such rule would leave the body of the common law very much emasculated; as, for example, that pertaining to real estate. While, undoubtedly, the common law consists of a body of principles applicable to new instances as they arise, and not of inflexible cast-iron rules, yet where the rules of the common law have become unsuited to changed conditions, political, social, or economic, it is the province of the legislature, and not of the courts, to modify them. While we do not wish to be understood as intimating that no condition of legislation upon the subject of the rights of married women in the estates of their husbands would effect by implication a change of the common-law rule, yet our conclusion is that, in view of the main reason upon which the common-law rule was based that marriage alone would not, but that marriage and the birth of issue conjointly would, revoke the prior will of a man, and in view of the very liberal provision made by statute for the widow independently of the act of her husband the mere fact that she may now, under the statute, in certain contingencies, inherit more from her husband, is not sufficient to warrant us in holding that the common-law rule has been so changed that marriage alone is such a change of condition or circumstances as will work an implied revocation of the prior will of the husband. We should have stated that our statute relating to the revocation of wills is substantially, if not literally, the same as that of 29 Car. II., which has been so generally adopted by the American states. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4430.

The conclusion at which we have arrived on this question renders it unnecessary to consider other questions discussed by counsel; as, for example, as to the power of the probate court to set aside the probate of a will. In the appeal from the judgment setting aside the petitioner the homestead of the deceased, and giving her an allowance out of his estate for her maintenance during administration, the judgment is affirmed.

In the other appeal the judgment setting aside the probate of the will and adjudging such will to be of no force or effect is reversed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

v.

J. Y. OLD et al., Appts.

(119 N. C. 1.)

1. A contract restricting persons from engaging in the milling business in the vicinity of a certain city after the completion of the agreement for the sale of their business, although it extends for their lives, is not illegal as in restraint of trade.

2. To take stock or help to organize or manage a corporation formed to carry on

NOTE.—As to the validity of contracts of sale in restraint of trade when there is no limitation of place fixed, see note to Gamewell Fire Alarm Teleg. Co. v. Crane (Mass.) 22 L. R. A. 673.

For local restraint of trade, see Leslie v. Lorillard (N. Y.) 1 L. R. A. 453, and note; Carroll v. Giles (S. 34 L. R. A.

C.) 4 L. R. A. 154, and note; Herreshoff v. Boutineau (R. I.) 8 L. R. A. 489, and note; National Benefit Co. v. Union Hospital Co. (Minn.) 11 L. R. A. 437, and note; also Oakdale Mfg. Co. v. Garst (R. I.) 23 L. R. A. 639.

a business after one has agreed, on the sale of such a business, not to continue it in that locality, is a breach of his contract.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Superior Court for Pasquotank County restraining them from violating their contract not to engage in the milling business in Elizabeth City. Modified and affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. W. J. Griffin, for appellants:

Contracts in restraint of trade are void unless partial, that is, restricted either in time or territory; and when so restricted they are void unless made upon an actual valuable consideration.

Holmes v. Martin, 10 Ga. 508; Chappel v. Brockway, 21 Wend. 157; Clark, Cont. 83.

All contracts in restraint of trade are presumed to be void, and the burden of showing their validity is upon the party setting them up.

Ross v. Sadgeer, 21 Wend. 166.

The fact that such contract is under seal does not import a consideration.

The sale of the goodwill of a business is not an undertaking to abstain from entering into that business.

2 Addison, Cont. 742, *1154.

Contracts in restraint of trade may be divided into two classes: those in which the parties to the contract are alone interested, those in which the public are interested directly as well. If the contract partakes of the latter nature it is absolutely void.

West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co. 22 W. Va. 600, 46 Am. Rep. 527.

If the contract is binding the Olds may lawfully be employed by the defendant company.

Baker v. Cordon, 86 N. C. 116, 41 Am. Rep. 448; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 947, note.

Contracts in restraint of trade partaking largely of bartering away a person's liberty should be strictly construed. The defendants only contracted to refrain from participating in the lumber business as individuals. Does it prohibit their taking stock in a milling company.

Mr. E. F. Aydlett, for appellees:

When the injunction relief is not merely auxiliary to the principal relief demanded in the action, but is the relief, the court will not dissolve the injunction upon a preliminary hearing.

Love v. Davidson County Comrs. 70 N. C. 532; Marshall v. Stanly County Comrs. 89 N. C. 106.

This contract is not in restraint of trade. Public policy requires that when a man has by skill or other means obtained something that he wants to sell he should be at liberty to sell it in the most advantageous way in the market, and in order to do this it is necessary that he should be able to preclude himself from entering into competition with the purchasers.

Being unlimited as to time is not objectionable. It is for seller's and buyer's life.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The courts in later years have disregarded the old rules by which it was sometimes attempted arbitrarily to fix by measurement the geographical area over which a contract in partial restraint of trade might be made to extend, and to prescribe a limit of time beyond which it could not be made to operate. The modern doctrine is founded upon the basic principles that one who by his skill and industry builds up a business acquires a property at least in the goodwill of his patrons, which is the product of his own efforts (Cowan v. Fairbrother, 118 N. C. 406, 32 L. R. A. 829), and has the fundamental right to dispose of the fruits of his own labor, subject only to such restrictions as are imposed for the protection of society, either by express enactments of law or by public policy (Hughes v. Hodges, 109 N. C. 239, Bruce v. Strickland, 81 N. C. 247). But the property which one thus creates by skill or talent and industry is not marketable unless the owner is at liberty to sell his right of competition to the full extent of the field from which he derives his profit, and for a reasonable length of time. Cowan v. Fairbrother, supra; 2 High, Inj. § 1174; Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsant, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 86; Roussillon v. Roussillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351; Clark, Cont. p. 451. To the extent that the assignor of this species of property is left at liberty to come into competition with the assignee, the market value of what is sold must fall below that of the untrammelled right to freedom from competition in the whole field from which the former derived the support of his business. The test of the reasonableness of the territorial limit covered by such contracts is involved in the question whether the area described in the contract is greater than it is necessary to make it in order to protect the purchaser from competition in his efforts to hold and get the full benefit of the business or right of competition bought by him. The three defendants who sold to the plaintiff retained the undisputed right to continue in the same business and operate at any point beyond Elizabeth City and the vicinity, and exercised it by operating their mills. But in our case it was not contended that the area of territory covered by the restrictive agreement was so unreasonably great as to vitiate the contract, but that the time for which the defendants covenanted to refrain from entering into the same business imposed an unnecessary restriction upon the rights of the three defendants, and was, therefore, contrary to public policy, and void. It must be conceded that, in so far as it is consistent with the power to sell the property which is the creation of one's own labor, physical or mental, society has the right to claim an open field for every man's labor, skill, and competition with others, both for the benefit of his family and the more direct benefits accruing to society from removing restrictions and encouraging competition in every kind of trade. The reason of the law leads to the adoption of any rule that is calculated to reconcile all conflicts between the proper exercise of the jus disponendi of the individual and the interests of society at large. The services of no one person are so valuable to the public, in any field to which his business may extend, as to demand that he shall receive a smaller price for his right of competition, because an arbitrary rule forbids him to extend the restriction in point of time to the term of his own life or that of the purchaser, or for their joint lives. The enlargement of the restrictive area by later adjudications is founded, therefore, upon a principle which it was reasonable to apply in determining what is the lawful limit of time. Where the contract is between individuals, or between private corporations, which do not belong to the quasi public class, there is no reason why the general rule that the seller should not be allowed to fix the time for the operation of the restriction so as to command the highest market price for the property he disposes of should apply. Diamond Match Co. v. Roeder, 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 464; Morgan v. Perhamus, 36 Ohio St. 517, 38 Am. Rep. 607; Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, 108 Mass. 73, 4 Am. Rep. 518.

The stipulation on the part of James Y. Old, W. P. Old, and W. N. Old, to quote the exact language of the contract, is "that they will not continue business of milling in the vicinity of Elizabeth City after the 1st day of September, 1891, and the full completion of this agreement." The contract having been in other respects performed, the agreement is now complete in the sense contemplated by the parties. The three defendants were, at most, restricted from engaging in the business for the lives of each and every one of them. Such a sale has been upheld, upon reason and authority, in other courts. The plaintiff bought their right to compete in their own persons in the business to which he succeeded as purchaser. It was not unreasonable that he should insist upon the stipulation that none of the three should interfere, while they lived, by competition at the particular place mentioned, either with him as purchaser, or his assignee in law or in fact. In the case of Morgan v. Perhamus, supra, the facts were that a milliner sold her stock and goodwill, and engaged "not to carry on the business at any time in future at the town of F. or at any place within such distance of said town as would interfere with such business, whether carried on by the purchasers, or their successors." The agreement was held to be binding by the supreme court, and the seller was enjoined from resuming business. There, as in our case, the time was not described, except as an inhibition on a particular person, with the implication that it should extend to her life. The law would have construed the contract as conferring the right to sell or transmit to a personal representative, as a part of the assets of his estate, the property bought, whenever the time was found to be co-extensive with the lives of the three defendants. Cowan v. Fair- brother, supra; Clark, Cont. pp. 454, 455, and note page 456; 2 High, Inj. § 1845; Lewis v. Langdon, 7 Sim. 422; Binsinger v. Clark, 60 Barb. 118. In McClurg's Appeal, 58 Pa. 51, the agreement, which was held not to be unreasonable, was that a physician, who had sold his business and goodwill to another physician, should "never thereafter establish himself as a physician within 12 miles [of his original place of business] without the consent of the purchaser." The contract there, like that under consideration, could be fairly construed in no other way than as operating for the term of the seller's life. These cases and others are cited with approval by text-writers, and seem as a rule, to have established the reasonable doctrine contended for by the plaintiff in the states as well as in England. 2 High, Inj. § 1180; 1 Beach, Inj. §§ 462-470; Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Beav. 383.

It is elementary learning that the single consideration of paying a specified sum of money by one party to a contract is sufficient to support several distinct stipulations by the other party to do or refrain from doing certain things, and it is unnecessary to repeat, in every paragraph of the contract, that such stipulations are entered into for the consideration once expressed. It is sufficient to set forth that A has paid or agreed to pay a certain sum, and that B has agreed to do or abstain from doing certain things, which may be stated seriatim in separate paragraphs. A case almost exactly in point, because it relates to a somewhat similar agreement, is that of Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, supra.

Though the contract is valid and binding, as between the parties, it in no way impairs the right of the defendants who were not parties to engage in any kind of business in Elizabeth City; but as a court of chancery we must declare that, where injunctive relief is asked, it is the duty of the court to restrain the contracting parties from violating the spirit as well as the letter of the agreement. Under a fair and just interpretation of its terms, the stipulation meant that the three defendants would not engage in business, so as to bring their skill, names, and influence to the aid of any competitor carrying on the same trade within the prohibited limits. It was, therefore, a violation of the contract on the part of the three mentioned, or either of them, to take stock in, help to organize or manage a corporation formed to compete with the plaintiff in his business. Jones v. Heavens, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 636. While the courts will not restrain a party bound by such a contract from selling or leasing his premises to others to engage in the business which he has agreed to abstain from carrying on, or from selling to them the machinery or supplies needed in embarking in it (Reeves v. Sprague, 114 N. C. 647), a different rule must prevail when it appears that the prohibited party attempts, not to sell outright to others, but to furnish the machinery or capital or a portion of either in lieu of stock, in a corporation organized with a view to competition with the person protected by his contract against such injury. The three contracting defendants have presumably received the full value of the business sold, and which is protected by their own agreement against their own competition, and equity will not allow them, with the price in their pockets, to evade their contract under the thin guise of becoming the chief stockholders in a company organized to do what they cannot lawfully do as individuals.

The judgment must be modified so as to restrain only the three defendants who were parties to the original contract from engaging in or from taking stock in or assisting in the organization of a corporation formed with the purpose of carrying on the business of milling in or in the vicinity of Elizabeth City. The order must be vacated as to the other defendants.

Modified and affirmed.

1. An order of county commissioners for the employment of a convict upon the public roads, made under Code, § 3448, and without any provision therefor in the sentence or any order of court, is not void on the ground that it is in the nature of an additional judgment against the convict.
2. The employment of a convict upon the public roads under supervision and control of a public agent by order of the county commissioners is not a "hiring out" of the convict which, by Code, § 3448, requires an order of court embodied in the sentence.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Union County remanding him to custody after hearing a petition for habeas corpus seeking to obtain his release from serving a sentence for assault and battery. Affirmed.

Defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for ninety days for assault and battery. The county commissioners placed him in the custody of James Howie, who required him to work on the public roads. Defendant applied for a habeas corpus on the ground that such action was illegal.

Further facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. A. Covington, for appellant:

The court had no authority, even during the same term, to change the sentence of the defendant from three months in the county jail to three months at hard labor on the public roads of the county, he having served a part of his term under the first sentence, before the imposition of the second sentence.

State v. Warren, 92 N. C. 825; State v. Orok, 115 N. C. 760, 29 L. R. A. 260.

N. C. Code, § 3448, does not authorize working the defendant upon the roads, because his case does not fall within the provisions of this statute, he not having been adjudged to pay any costs, and the court before whom he was tried not having so authorized.

Acts 1887, chap. 355, § 1, of the legislature of North Carolina does not cover defendant's case because the court did not sentence him to the roads in accordance with its provisions.

Acts 1889, chap. 419, amending Acts 1887, § 1, supra, does not avail, for this amendment applies only to persons sentenced to jail by a magistrate or those put in by the order of a court for the nonpayment of costs.

Upon a proper construction of these several statutes none of them authorize the county commissioners of the county of Union to put the defendant, sentenced to jail by the trial judge, for a trivial offense (assault and battery in striped clothes and chains (badges of dishonor), and work him upon the public roads by the side of common felons.

State v. Melton, Busbee, L. 49; N. C. Const. art. 11, § 1.

The words "farm out" as used in the latter clause of § 3448 of the Code, supra, does not apply to work upon the public roads.

State v. Sneed, 94 N. C. 806; State v. Williams, 97 N. C. 414.

No order was made by the county commissioners in session assembled, and the action of two of their number taken upon the street was functus officio and void.

Duke v. Markham, 105 N. C. 181.

Messrs. Shepherd & Busbee also for appellant.

Messrs. Frank I. Osborne, Attorney General, and Jerome & Williams for the State.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The boards of commissioners of the several counties have power to provide for employing on the public streets, public highways, or public works persons committed to jail by any magistrate or judge of a superior or criminal court having jurisdiction to try the accused, upon conviction of any crime or misdemeanor, or upon their failure to enter into bond to keep the peace or for good behavior, or to pay, or properly secure the payment of, costs or fines. That the authority to make the order complained of was granted by § 3448 of the Code, and was not withdrawn by any subsequent act, is settled in the well-considered opinion of Justice MacRae in Myers v. Stayford, 114 N. C. 284, 287. There is no force in the contention of the defendant that the order of the commissioners was in the nature of a sentence subsequently imposed, and was void because they had no judicial authority, and because, if they had been competent to try and sentence originally, a sentence had been already pronounced, and no additional sentence could be imposed after the term when it was entered. The principle upon which the defendant relies is a familiar and fundamental doctrine, which was not disputed by the prosecution. The working of the defendant on the public highway was not in pursuance of a judgment pronounced by the commissioners. It was an incident to the sentence proper imposed by the court, which the law had declared, before conviction and before the offense was committed, should follow. The order of the commissioners was therefore no more an additional judgment than is an order of the superintendent of the state prison that a pri-oner confined in a cell at the penitentiary shall be taken to one of the farms now cultivated under his direction. The commissioners were for this purpose only the ministerial agents provided by law for the purpose of managing economically the business of the counties, and protecting the people, as far as possible, against unnecessary cost in the punishment of criminals. A person who commits an assault and battery knows, or is presumed by law to know, the probable legal as well as the natural consequences of his own act. Knowing the law (as we must assume), he knows that the court has the power to imprison upon conviction, and that, as an incident, the commissioners of the county may, for the protection of the county, order him to be taken out and worked upon the public roads. The principle governing this case is in no sense analogous to that upon which the decision hinged in Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 168, 175, 21 L. ed. 872, 878. The order to work the defendant upon the public roads was in no proper sense a second sentence, imposed after a part of the punishment provided for by an original judgment had been inflicted, but was an incident to the punishment, in contemplation of which he committed the offense. It has been expressly held, also, that the provision of § 3448 of the Code, which forbids the hiring out of convicts, except under order of the court embodied in the sentence, applied only to farming out convicts to individuals or corporations, and did "not extend to labor employed upon public works, and under the supervision and control of public agents." State v. Sneed, 94 N. C. 806.

The answer of the respondent was sufficient to show that the prisoner was detained by lawful authority, and we are of opinion, therefore, that there was no error in the order remanding him to the custody of James Howie.

No error.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, Pff. in Err.,

Rudolph IHLENBERG.

(75 Fed. Rep. 872.)

1. A self-executing mandate is made by Const. § 193, providing that "knowledge, by any employee injured, of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances, shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby," with an exception as to conductors or engineers.
2. Whether or not a constitutional provision is self-executing is a question always of intention, to be determined by the language used and the surrounding circumstances.
3. A legislative adoption of the exact language of a constitutional provision, omitting only a clause as to the right of the legislature to make an extension of the provision, does not make a legislative construction of the article to the effect that it is not self-executing.
4. A Federal court in Tennessee will enforce the Mississippi Constitution precluding the defense to an action for an employee's injury that he knew of the defective or unsafe character of the machinery or appliances by which he was injured, when the injury was received in Mississippi, since this provision is simply a variation from and not repugnant to the law of Tennessee.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee.

see to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

Rudolph Ihlenberg, the plaintiff below and the defendant in error, was a locomotive fireman employed by the Illinois Central Railroad Company, the defendant below and the plaintiff in error here, in July, 1891. He had been employed as fireman for eighteen days before he was hurt, though actually engaged in work but ten days. He had never worked as a fireman before. While on duty, and while the engine was running from 15 to 20 miles an hour, he stepped upon the tender to get a drink of water from a keg placed upon the tool box. A sudden roll or jerk in the engine caused him to lose his balance, and he put his foot in the open space between the engine and the tender. This threw him off the engine onto the ground, and resulted in severe injuries to him. His claim in the action was that the engine was defective in not having an apron covering the space between the tender and the engine, so that his foot would not have caught in it. He had ridden on this particular engine but two days. The defenses set up by the defendant were—First, that it was not a defective engine, because many engines were without aprons, and the presence of the apron when used was not for safety, but merely to keep the dust from coming up in the engine cab; and, secondly, that the plaintiff had assumed the risk of danger from the defect, if it was a defect, by reason of the absence of the apron. The accident occurred between Canton, Mississippi, and Way's Bluff, Mississippi, on the line of the defendant's railway, on the 18th of July, 1891.

Section 198 of the Constitution of Mississippi, adopted November 1, 1890, is as follows: "Sec. 198. Every employee of any railroad corporation shall have the same right and remedies for any injuries suffered by him from the act or omission of said corporation or its employees as are allowed by law to other persons, not employees, where the injury results from the negligence of a superior agent or officer, or of a person having the right to control or direct the services of the party injured, and also when the injury results from the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in another department of labor from that of the party injured, or of a fellow servant on another train of cars or one engaged about a different piece of work. Knowledge by any employee injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances, shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to conductors or engineers in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars, or engines voluntarily operated by them. When death ensues from any injury to employees, the legal or personal representatives of the person injured shall have the same right and remedy as are allowed by law to such representatives or other persons. Any contract or agreement, express or implied, made by an employee to waive the benefit of this section, shall be null and void; and this section shall not be construed to deprive any employee of the corporation or his legal or personal representative of any right or remedy that he now has by the law of the land. The legislature may extend the remedies herein provided for to any other class of employees."

In November, 1892, after the accident occurred, the legislature of Mississippi enacted the following statute: "Sec. 3559. Fellow Servant Rule. Every employee of a railroad corporation shall have the same rights and remedies for an injury suffered by him from the act or omission of the corporation or its employees as are allowed by law to other persons not employees, where the injury results from the negligence of a superior agent or officer, or of a person having the right to control or direct the services of the party injured, and also when the injury results from the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in another department of labor from that of the party injured, or of a fellow servant on another train of cars, or one engaged about a different piece of work. Knowledge by an employee injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances shall not be a defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to conductors or engineers in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars or engines voluntarily operated by them. Where death ensues from an injury to an employee, the legal or personal representative of the person injured shall have the same rights and remedies as are allowed by law to such representatives of other persons. Any contract or agreement, express or implied, made by an employee to waive the benefit of this section shall be null and void; and this section shall not deprive an employee of a corporation or his legal or personal representative of any right or remedy that he now has by law."

A bill of exceptions embodying all the evidence was taken, and included in it was this statement of the charge of the court: "(1) The court, among other things not excepted to, charged the jury that under the law of Tennessee, or under the common law, the plaintiff, under the facts in this case, could not recover, but that the law of Mississippi, where the injury occurred, controlled in this case; and that § 198 of the Constitution of 1890 of Mississippi (which section reads as follows: 'Every employee of any railroad corporation shall have the same right and remedies for any injuries suffered by him from the act or omission of said corporation or its employees as are allowed by law to other persons, not employees, where the injury results from the negligence of a superior agent or officer, or of a person having the right to control or direct the services of the party injured, and also when the injury results from the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in another department of labor from that of the party injured, or of a fellow servant on another train of cars, or one engaged about a different piece of work. Knowledge by any employee injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to conductors or engineers in charge of unsafe cars, or engines voluntarily operated by them') was the law of that state at the time of the accident to plaintiff, and applied in this case. (2) And in this connection the court submitted the question to the jury, under instructions not excepted to, whether the engine and tender were equipped with the apron or lap described in the proof, and whether or not the injury was the result of any defect in that regard as a proximate cause thereof, and instructed them if they found such defect to exist, and that it was the cause of the injury, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, by reason of the constitutional provision found in the laws of Mississippi above quoted in the charge."

Messrs. Estes & Fentress, for plaintiff in error:

The apron and keg were no necessary or proper parts of the machinery. The neglect to fence or cover the ordinary machinery of a servant's employment does not make the master liable. The aperture and the keg were open and patent to ordinary observation.

The lack of the apron did not constitute a "defective or unsafe character or condition of machinery or appliances," even under the Mississippi statute.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The assignments of error seek to raise some questions of evidence, but the record is not in such a condition as to permit it. The court allowed the plaintiff, when on the stand, to answer certain questions put to him by his counsel in respect to the pain he suffered, and the knowledge which he had of locomotives before engaging in the service of the defendant. The questions were objected to; the objections were overruled; and no exception was taken to the rulings. The absence of exceptions prevents us from considering the correctness of the court's action on the objections.

The main point which this writ of error is intended to present is that the clause of the Constitution of Mississippi providing that knowledge by any employee injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, is not self-executing. It is very evident that this is the only question which the bill of exceptions was prepared to make. It is now, however, attempted to raise a different question upon the charge of the court. The charge is not given in full, and only enough appears to present clearly the point already alluded to. In the first of the two paragraphs, giving a summary of the charge, the court is represented as telling the jury that the clause of the Constitution of 1890 applied to this case, and introduced a different rule from that which would have been applied under the law of Tennessee or the common law; and, by the second paragraph, it appears that "in this connection"—that is, in connection with the operation of the clause of the Constitution of Mississippi upon the case—the court submitted the question to the jury, under instructions not excepted to, whether the engine and tender were equipped with the apron or lap described in the proof, and whether or not the injury was the result of any defect in that regard as a proximate cause thereof, and instructed them, if they found such defect to exist, and that it was the cause of the injury, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover by reason of the constitutional provision found in the laws of Mississippi above quoted in the charge. To this part of the charge of the court the defendant excepted. It is now contended that the effect of this charge was to take away the question from the jury, which was much mooted on the trial, whether the absence of the apron or lap in a locomotive was a defect in machinery. We are not able to say whether the court left this question to the jury or not, from the very summary way in which the charge of the court in this respect is described; but, if the court below did not leave the question to the jury, it is clear from the statement in the bill of exceptions that no exception was taken to that part of the charge, because it is expressly stated that the manner in which the court submitted to the jury the questions whether the engine and tender were equipped with the apron or lap, and whether or not the injury was the result of any defect in that regard as a proximate cause thereof, was not excepted to, and that the only part of the charge to which exception was directed was the operation of the constitutional provision of Mississippi upon the rights of the parties. It follows, therefore, that the only question we have before us in this case on the record is whether § 193 of the Constitution of Mississippi was self-executing, at least so far as the clause which provides that "knowledge by any employee injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to conductors or engineers in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars, or engines voluntarily operated by them," and whether, if self-executing, it should be enforced in a Federal court sitting in Tennessee in an action for an injury happening in Mississippi after the constitutional provision went into effect.

In Groves v. Slaughter, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 449, 10 L. ed. 800, the question was whether the language of the Constitution of Mississippi providing that the "introduction of slaves into that state, as merchandise, or for sale, should be prohibited, from and after the 1st day of May, 1838," was self-executing, or was directed to the legislature, and required legislative action before it should become operative upon contracts and persons. The question arose in the Supreme Court of the United States with reference to its effect upon contracts made in the state, and it was there determined by a divided court that the clause was not self-executing. Subsequently, the court of errors of Mississippi, in Green v. Robinson, 5 How. (Miss.) 80, in Glidewell v. Hite, Id. 110, and in Brien v. Williamson, 7 How. (Miss.) 14, refused to follow the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and held that the clause was self-executing. Thereafter another case involving the effect of the clause upon contracts made before the decision of the supreme court in Mississippi was considered in Rowan v. Runnels, 46 U. S. 5 How. 184, 12 L. ed. 85, and the Supreme Court of the United States refused to change its ruling with respect to these contracts entered into before the decisions of the supreme court of Mississippi. An examination of the case of Groves v. Slaughter and the reasoning of the court leaves no doubt that the question for consideration is one of the intention of the persons framing and adopting the Constitution. There is nothing in Groves v. Slaughter to justify the claim that a Constitution may not contain self-executing provisions. It may be conceded that it is usually a declaration of fundamental law, and that many of its provisions are only commands to the legislature to enact laws to carry out the purposes of the framers of the Constitution, and that many are mere restrictions upon the power of the legislature to pass laws; but that it is entirely within the power of those who confirm and adopt the Constitution to make any of its provisions self-executing is too clear for argument. Hence it is a question always of intention to be determined by the language used and the surrounding circumstances. Considering the constitutional clause in question in this light, we have no doubt that it was self-executing. In the first place, the language of the particular clause in question is prohibitory, and is in the exact form which the legislature, were it enacting such a provision into the law, would use in a command to the courts. Then the whole section is of that detailed character which characterizes legislation intended to operate on the courts. It is one of those general provisions directed to the legislature, which usually cover an entire subject-matter in a few words, and fix only limits of action and vest a wide discretion as to the manner in which the mandate of the Constitution shall be carried out. More than this, there is language in the section which is inconsistent with the view that it is not self-executing. Thus, near the end of the section occurs this clause: "That this section shall not deprive an employee of a corporation or his legal or personal representative of any right or remedy that he now has by the law of the land." If the latter clause were not self-executing, then this particular provision in it should read: "And legislation in accordance with this section shall not be construed to deprive any employee in a corporation or his legal or personal representatives of any right or remedy that he now has by the law of the land;" for, if the entire article were not self-executing, then it would not operate directly on any right or remedy previously existing, and the protection of the proviso would naturally be directed to the legislation executing the mandate, rather than to the mandate itself. Again, the final clause of the article excludes any other construction than that we have given. It is: "The legislature may extend the remedies herein provided for to any other class of employees." This certainly implies that so much of the article as precedes the clause actually provides remedies for those mentioned in it, and leaves to the legislature power to enlarge the benefits of the article by applying it to others than those named in the article. But it is said that the fact that the legislature of Mississippi in 1892 treated this as a mandate to the legislature to pass legislation giving the remedies therein described is a legislative construction of the article to the effect that it was not self-executing. We do not so regard it. On the contrary, when the legislature of Mississippi came to embody this in the statute, it adopted the exact language of the article of the Constitution, omitting only that clause of it which provided that the legislature might extend the remedy to other classes of employees. This shows that, in the opinion of the Mississippi legislature, the clause was sufficiently specific to operate upon the rights, 34 I. R. A.

The conclusion which we have reached is in accordance with the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi, and this settles the question for us. In Welsh v. Alabama & V. R. Co. 70 Miss. 80, it appeared that Welsh was a switchman in the employ of the Alabama & Vicksburg Railway Company, his duty being to ride upon the switch engine, and to open and close switches and couple cars. His usual station was on the footboard of the engine. He was injured by falling from the footboard, while engaged in the performance of his duties, and brought his action to recover damages, on the ground that the fastening of the footboard was insecure by reason of the negligence of the company. The court gave a peremptory instruction for the defendant, on the ground of contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The supreme court held that the view of the court below would have been correct before the enactment of § 198 of the present Constitution, but continued. "Section 193 of the present Constitution practically destroys the defense in cases where no wilful or reckless negligence can be predicated of the conduct of the injured and complaining employee. The change is radical, sweeping, unambiguous, and we must enforce it as written." This decision was rendered in October, 1892, before the legislature of Mississippi had embodied the constitutional clause in the statute. Therefore, the accident which was the subject of consideration there happened after the adoption of the Constitution, and before the passage of the act by the legislature. The clause of the Constitution we are considering was also enforced as self-executing in the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hunter, 70 Miss. 471, in respect to a personal injury happening in March, 1892. It is true that the question was not mooted in either of these cases, and they are not, therefore, so strong authority as they otherwise would be; but the reason why the question was not raised and decided is manifest from the course of decisions in that state with respect to the constitutional clause which was held not to be self-executing, in Groves v. Slaughter, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 449, 10 L. ed. 800, by the Supreme Court of the United States, but was subsequently held to be so by the supreme court of Mississippi, in Green v. Robinson, 5 How. (Miss.) 80, Glidenell v. Hite, Id. 110, and Brien v. Williamson, 7 How. (Miss.) 14. In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Brookhaven Mach. Co. 71 Miss. 663, it was held that § 171 of the Constitution of 1890, with reference to the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, was self-executing, and did not need legislation to carry it into effect. Our construction of the clause of the Constitution as self-executing is quite in accordance with the weight of the authorities. Willis v. Mabon, 48 Minn. 140, 16 L. R. A. 281; Johnson v. Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 402, 37 Am. Rep. 779; Washingtonian Home v. Chicago, 157 Ill. 414, 29 L. R. A. 798; People v. Hoge, 55 Cal. 612; State, Lincoln, v. Babcock, 19 Neb. 230; Pierce v. Com. 104 Pa. 150; Ex parte Snyder, 64 Mo. 58; People v. Bradley, 60 Ill. 390; Yerger v. Rains, 4 Humph. 259; Thompson v. Reno Sav. Bank, 19 Nev. 108.

The only remaining question for discussion is whether a Federal court in Tennessee will enforce the Mississippi Constitution with respect to the tort committed in that state. It is well settled by the decisions of the Federal courts that, "while it is true that the statutes of a state have in themselves no extraterritorial force, yet rights acquired under them are always enforced by comity in the state and national courts in other states, unless they are opposed to the public policy or laws of the forum." Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 L. ed. 958; Northern P. R. Co. v. Mase, 27 U. S. App. 238, 11 C. C. A. 63, and 63 Fed. Rep. 114; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771; The Antelope, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 66, 6 L. ed. 268; Smith v. Condry, 42 U. S. 1 How. 28, 11 L. ed. 35; The China v. Walsh ("The China"), 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 53, 64, 19 L. ed. 67, 71; Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593, 36 L. ed. 829; Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 670, 36 L. ed. 1123, 1128. The same view is taken by the courts of Tennessee. See Bank of Columbia v. Walker, 14 Lea, 306; Woods v. Wicks, 7 Lea, 47; Robinson v. Queen, 87 Tenn. 445, 3 L. R. A. 214. There is nothing in § 193 of the Mississippi Constitution, here under consideration, which is repugnant to the policy of the Tennessee law on the subject. In Tennessee the law applicable to such a case is not governed by statute, but, in accordance with the view taken by the courts of that state of the common law, knowledge by the employee of the defect of the machinery, whence his injury arose, is a defense to an action therefor against the master, unless the employee complains, and a promise to repair is made to him. Guthrie v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 11 Lea, 373, 47 Am. Rep. 286; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Duf- field, 12 Lea, 63; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kenley, 92 Tenn. 208. The provision of the Mississippi Constitution as construed by the courts is that the company is liable for an injury caused by a defect in the machinery, unless the injury was due to the recklessness or wantonness of the employee. This is a mere change in the law in respect to the implied contract between master and servant, and, in only affecting such contracts in Mississippi made after its enactment, it is simply a variation from the common law of Tennessee, and is not to be regarded as repugnant to the spirit of the law of the latter state. The legislature of Tennessee has not hesitated to pass statutes which modify the rules with respect to the effect of contributory negligence of plaintiffs in suits against railroad companies much more radically than the change thus effected in Mississippi. This may be seen by an examination of two cases in this court where such statutes were fully considered and construed in the light of the decisions of the supreme court of Tennessee. See Western & A. R. Co. v. Roberson, 22 U. S. App. 187-216, 9 C. C. A. 646, and 61 Fed. Rep. 592; Nason v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 22 U. S. App. 220-231 et seq., 9 C. C. A. 666, and 61 Fed. Rep. 606, 24 L. R. A. 693. So far as the record discloses, there was no request presented to the court to charge the jury that the constitutional clause was not a defense in case it should find that the injury resulted from the reckless negligence and wantonness of the plaintiff, and no exception seems to have been taken to the charge because of such an omission. Indeed, there was no evidence tending to show reckless negligence or wantonness on the part of the plaintiff.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed, with costs.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Re Charles MILLER.

(.....Mich.....)

A statute denying to convicts under sentence for a second offense the same reductions from their sentence for good behavior that are allowed to other convicts is not ex post facto as applied to the punishment of an offense subsequently committed, although the offender had been convicted of his first offense before the passage of the act.

a. In general.

The constitutional provision that "all penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense"

(November 17, 1896.)

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the release of petitioner from the custody of the warden of the state prison to which he had been committed under sentence for a term of three years. Petitioner remanded.

(Ill. Const. 1870, art. 2, § 11) is not violated by a statute imposing severer penalties upon one who is shown to have been previously convicted. Kelly v. People, 115 Ill. 583, 56 Am. Rep. 184.

A law imposing additional punishment for a second or subsequent conviction of the same offense is not unconstitutional. Hopkins v. Com. 3 Met. 480.

"The validity of that statute has heretofore been sanctioned by this court, and it is now needless to discuss it," says the court in Combs v. Com. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 245, in enforcing a statute providing for a life sentence of a person convicted the third time for a felony.

Such a statute is also said to be valid in People v. Bosworth, 64 Hun, 72.

The particular grounds of the constitutional objections are not stated in these cases, but are doubtless the same as those mentioned in the divisions following.

The discrimination against prisoners serving a second or third sentence by denying them a good-time allowance has been made in several cases prior to the main case of Re MILLER. Thus, Re Prisoners (Atty. Gen.'s Opinion) 3 Det. L. N. No. 24; and Re Canfield, 98 Mich. 644. The constitutionality of a statutory provision requiring such a discrimination is assumed in these cases without question.

"The party charged with the commission of a second offense is supposed to have known all the penalties denounced against it. If, therefore, the punishment denounced against the first offense proves to be insufficient to restrain his vicious propensities, it is but just and right that an increased punishment should be inflicted for a second or third offense; and he has no reasonable cause of complaint that his former transgressions under the same law are brought up in judgment against him. No constitutional objection exists to such regulation of punishment." Maguire v. State, 47 Md. 426.

"One convicted under such a statute cannot justly complain that his former transgressions have been brought up in judgment against him. He knew, or is presumed to have known, before the commission of the second offense, all the penalties denounced against it; and if, in some sense, the additional punishment may be said to be a consequence of the first offense (inasmuch as there could be no sentence for such punishment in the absence of proof of the first conviction), still it is not a necessary consequence, but one which could only arise on the conviction for the second offense, and one therefore which, being fully apprised of in advance, the offender was left free to brave or avoid." Rand v. Com. 9 Gratt. 738.

A statute is not the less a police regulation because it requires the court on conviction for a second offense to imprison the convict not less than a month nor more than a year, so that imprisonment is in a county jail or house of correction. State v. Hodgson, 86 Vt. 134.

The fact that the provisions of the Ohio habitual criminal act of May 4, 1885, are made a supplement to the statute regulating the management of convicts in the penitentiary rather than to that title of the Revised Statutes which relates to crimes and their punishment and to criminal procedure, is not sufficient to make the act invalid or ineffectual. It does not contemplate the creation of a new offense, but merely creates a class of convicts whose incorrigibility has been established by a series of convictions for felonies, and is therefore placed in its ap- 84 L. R. A.

propriate connection; but if it was not in the most appropriate connection it would be immaterial, if the legislative intent was apparent. Blackburn v. State, 50 Ohio St. 422.

An ordinance relating to places where intoxicating liquors are sold is not unreasonable or unlawful because it provides a fine for the first offense of not less than $50 nor more than $200, and for each subsequent offense not less than $200 nor more than $500. This was under Ohio Rev. Stat. § 18-2, providing that a fine for violation of an ordinance not exceeding $50, or double that sum for a repetition of the offense, should not be deemed unreasonable, but that where a greater fine is imposed the court might reduce it to such amount as it may deem reasonable. The court holds that this section does not mean that fines greater than those specified should in all cases be deemed unreasonable, but that the court has power to reduce it as its wisdom and justice may dictate. Alliance v. Joyce, 27 Ohio L. J. 175.

b. Ex post facto laws.

The other cases agree with Re MILLER in holding that the constitutional provision against ex post facto laws is not violated by a statute providing for increased punishment of an offense because of a prior conviction of a like offense, even if the prior conviction was had before the statute was passed. Rand v. Com. 9 Gratt. 738; Ex parte Gutierrez, 45 Cal. 429; Ross's Case, 2 Pick. 165; Riley's Case, 41 172; People v. Raymond, 36 N. Y. 36, Affirming 32 Hun, 123.

So, a statute designating one who is convicted of a felony after having been convicted of two others an habitual criminal, and subjecting him to long imprisonment as such, is not ex post facto, although by its terms it may be enforced against one whose former convictions occurred before its passage. Com. v. Graves, 155 Mass. 183, 16 L. R. A. 256; Sturtevant v. Com. 155 Mass. 596; Blackburn v. State, 50 Ohio St. 422.

See also other cases in I. a, supra.

But a statute would be ex post facto if the later offense which is to be punished was committed before the statute was passed. Ross's Case, and Riley's Case, supra.

And a statute imposing an additional punishment for a second or third offense cannot operate on convictions previously had to increase their effect as prior sentences for the purpose of making a subsequent offense punishable by imprisonment for life in case the prisoner has been twice before convicted of offenses punishable by imprisonment at hard labor for a term of years. Ex parte White, 14 Pick. 90.

A change in the statute providing additional punishment because of prior offenses, which merely changes the tribunal which shall impose punishment, does not constitute an ex post facto law. Com. v. Phillips, 11 Pick. 28.

Thus, an information to impose additional punishment on a convict because of prior convictions may be authorized by the legislature to be prosecuted in a county different from that in which the convictions were had and in which the crimes were committed. Ibid.

In answer to a contention that the penalty is made greater by an amending statute, inasmuch as it provides for doubling the penalty on a repetition of the offense, the court says, in State v. Wilbor, 1 R. I. 199, 36 Am. Dec. 245: "This is a possible contingency, but not an incident of the sentence. The respondent may again violate the law, but this de-

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas E. Barkworth for petitioner.

Mr. Fred A. Maynard, Attorney General, for respondent.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner is serving his second term in the state prison at Jackson. His first term expired April 19, 1893. His second term began pends wholly upon his own will. It is not a right of which the sentence will deprive him, nor any result which the court can anticipate or which it can take into consideration as a part of its sentence. It cannot consider the penalty by such possible contingency as increased. To do so would be to presume that the breach of law would be repeated, and to be solicitous, not for the preservation of the rights of the respondent, but to guarantee to him impunity in wrongdoing. This is not the proper business of the court."

c. Cruel and unusual punishment.

It is not cruel or unusual punishment to impose upon a convict a severer sentence for a second or subsequent offense than for a first offense. Moore v. Missouri, 159 U. S. 673, 40 L. ed. 301. Affirming State v. Moore, 121 Mo. 514; State v. Hodgson, 66 Vt. 184; People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 17 Am. Rep. 401.

d. Equal protection of the laws.

A person is not denied the equal protection of the laws by imposing upon him a severer punishment for a second offense than is imposed for the first offense. Moore v. Missouri, supra.

e. Second punishment or jeopardy for the same offense.

The constitutional provision against putting a person twice in jeopardy for the same offense is not violated by imposing greater penalties upon persons convicted of a crime if they had been previously convicted. Moore v. Missouri, 159 U. S. 673, 40 L. ed. 301. Affirming State v. Moore, 121 Mo. 514; Kelly v. People, 115 Ill. 583, 56 Am. Rep. 184; Ingalls v. State, 48 Wis. 647; People v. Lewis, 64 Cal. 401.

The increased severity of punishment for a second or subsequent offense is not a punishment for the same offense the second time. Moore v. Missouri, supra; People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 17 Am. Rep. 401; People v. Lewis, supra; People v. McCarthy, 45 How. Pr. 97; Ingalls v. State, supra; Maguire v. State, 47 Md. 485; Ex parte White, 14 Pick. 90; Ross's Case, 3 Pick. 165; Blackburn v. State, 50 Ohio St. 423; Chenoweth v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 561, 12 Crim. L. Mag. 234; Taylor v. Com. 3 Ky. L. Rep. 723; Boggs v. Com. (Ky.) 5 S. W. 307.

"The increased severity of the punishment for the subsequent offense is not a punishment of the person for the first offense a second time, but a severer punishment for the second offense, because the commission of the second offense is evidence of the incorrigible and dangerous character of the accused, which calls for and demands a severer punishment than should be inflicted upon the person guilty of the first crime." Ingalls v. State, supra.

It is said, in Ross's Case, supra, that the punishment for the last offense committed is rendered more severe in consequence of the situation into which the party had previously brought himself.

The prior conviction is regarded as giving a character of increased aggravation to the subsequent offense. Ex parte White, supra.

The law which imposes the increased punishment is presumed to be known to all persons, and is intended to deter those so inclined from the further commission of crime. State v. Moore, supra; Raud v. Com. 9 Gratt. 738; Maguire v. State, 47 Md. 485.

On the same ground, that the prior offense is merely matter of aggravation, it is also held that an information is not objectionable as charging two offenses merely because it alleges a prior conviction of a similar offense. People v. Boyle, 64 Cal. 153.

II. Construction and effect of statutes.

a. In general.

The construction of statutes with reference to the effect of offenses and convictions antedating the statutes has not been uniform.

The enhanced punishment for a subsequent offense, provided for by the Alabama act of December 5, 1892, fixing penalties for violating laws as to intoxicating liquors, is construed to apply only when the former as well as the later conviction has been had since the act took effect, and not to cover the case of a second conviction thereafter, if the former conviction had taken place before the act was passed. Carson v. State, 108 Ala. 85.

So, the Connecticut act of August 1, 1895, providing larger punishment for second and all subsequent convictions, is construed to be applicable only to successive convictions under the new law. The court had no occasion to inquire whether a statute would be ex post facto if it imposed larger punishment for an offense subsequently committed if the convict had been convicted before the passage of the act of a similar offense, but held that as a provision would certainly be ex post facto if it increased the penalty for an act already committed, the provision of the act in question enlarging punishment for a first offense could have only a prospective effect, and the provisions as to punishment for second and subsequent convictions were construed to relate to a prior conviction under the same law. State v. Sanford, 67 Conn. 236.

But the California Penal Code, prescribing additional punishment for a second offense, is construed to apply to the punishment of all offenses thereafter committed, whether the prior conviction was before or after the statute was passed. Ex parte Gutierrez, 45 Cal. 423.

So, the Virginia statute providing that a prior conviction of a similar offense shall aggravate the punishment, is held applicable to a conviction which was made before the act was passed, when the subsequent conviction is had after the statute was passed. Rand v. Com. 9 Gratt. 733.

The same is true of New York Penal Code, § 668. People v. Raymond, 96 N. Y. 33, Affirming 32 Hun. 123.

For an offense committed before the Massachusetts act of 1833 and while the act of 1827 was in force, a conviction had after the act of 1833 had repealed the act of 1833 may be punished with the additional punishment prescribed by the act of 1827, because of prior convictions. Com. v. Mott, 32 Pick. 422. See also Com. v. Getchell, infra, II. d.

Under Cal. Penal Code, § 266, subd. 2, one convicted of an offense which for a first commission thereof is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for any term less than five years is punishable for a subsequent conviction by imprisonment not exceeding ten years. People v. Douglass, 37 Cal. 281.

The provision of Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 29, art. 1, § 13, for the confinement in the penitentiary for life of a person convicted the third time for felony, is enforced in Combs v. Com. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 245, where it is said that on proof of two prior convictions of a felony such punishment is inevitable, and the court could do no less than so instruct; and the jury on February 10, 1894, and was for three years. Act No. 118, Laws 1893, took effect May 26, 1893. Section 83 of that act provides that convicts who shall have no infractions of the rules of the prison against them shall be entitled to a reduction from their sentences according to a certain scale, with a proviso that a convict who shall be serving a second term in said prison shall be entitled to a less favorable reduction. If the provisions of this act are applying the present offense a felony was bound to render the verdict in pursuance of the statute.

So, the imposition of the maximum penalty for the subsequent offense, under N. Y. Penal Code, § 698, if the convict has been previously convicted of a felony, is not a matter of discretion, but is imperative. People v. Raymond, 96 N. Y. 83, Affirming 32 Hun, 128.

And if a verdict of conviction for a third felony finds that two prior convictions of felony, with sentence and imprisonment therefor, as alleged in the indictment, had been imposed, the court, after passing sentence of imprisonment for a specific term, should, under the Ohio habitual criminal act of May 4, 1883, proceed to sentence the defendant to imprisonment for his natural life. Blackburn v. State, 50 Ohio St. 422.

A prisoner convicted of larceny upon an indictment after former conviction may be sentenced to transportation under 9 Geo. IV. chap. 84, § 21. Reg. v. Byrne, 4 Cox, C. C. 248.

The enhanced punishment is provided for a second conviction of uttering false money by 15 Geo. II. chap. 28, § 2, and also for committing such an offense twice on the same day or within ten days. King v. Tandy, 2 Leach, C. L. 833.

A prisoner convicted on a charge of false pretenses, and also of a previous conviction of felony duly charged in the indictment, cannot be sentenced to a less term of penal servitude than seven years, under 21 & 28 Vict. chap. 47, § 2, requiring such a sentence on conviction of an offense punishable with penal servitude after previous conviction of a felony. Queen v. Deane, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 305.

A previous conviction for felony cannot be charged in an indictment for obtaining money under false pretenses as in the case of simple larceny, under 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 93, § 118. Reg. v. Garland, 11 Cox, C. C. 224. The court says: "We are of opinion that the statute does not intend to allow a previous conviction for felony to be charged in an indictment for felony. That has been done here, and our powers do not extend to amending the indictment."

b. Third and subsequent offenses.

A life sentence for third conviction under Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 20, art. 1, § 12, is none the less to be imposed because three, and not merely two, prior convictions are alleged and proved. Taylor v. Com. 3 Ky. L. Rep. 733.

The imposition of an additional punishment for a second offense will not prevent imposing additional punishment for a third offense. Plumbly v. Com. 2 Met. 413.

The fact that on a prior conviction there was a sentence of the prisoner as a common and notorious thief does not prevent imposing upon him in case of a subsequent conviction an additional punishment because of the prior conviction. Ibid.

So, the fact that a conviction of an offense has been relied upon to aggravate a later offense does not prevent relying upon it again to aggravate a still later offense during the same year, under Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 207, § 27, providing that a male person guilty of drunkenness, if convicted of a like offense twice before within the next preceding twelve months, shall be subject to a greater penalty than for a first or second conviction. The first or second offense is a distinct offense, although relied on to aggravate the third, and it may be again relied on to aggravate a fourth or fifth offense committed within the year. Com. v. Hughes, 138 Mass. 406.

As to the effect of third and subsequent sentences to make one an habitual criminal, see also Blackburn v. State, Com. v. Graves, and Sturtevant v. Com. supra, I. b.

A sentence imposed as for a third offense under information manifestly filed with the intent of charging a third offense under How. Stat. (Mich.) § 9425, cannot be sustained under § 9441, as a sentence for a second offense, as it is not possible to say what penalty the court would have imposed for a second conviction. People v. Ellsworth, 68 Mich. 498.

c. Conditions as to prior conviction before commission of later offense.

The general doctrine on the subject is thus expressed by the supreme court of Texas: "All the states of the American Union that have adopted the penitentiary system make provision for the reformation of offenders by increasing the punishment for second and subsequent convictions. Many of the Codes of the different states declare in express terms that before the party can be visited with the increased penalty it must appear that the subsequent offense was committed after the conviction of the former offense. Though differing in language the same principle runs through them all, and we are not permitted to suppose that our legislature intended to introduce a principle entirely out of harmony with the general system by visiting the increased punishment upon an offender who has never had an opportunity of reformation from experiencing the beneficial discipline of the law." Long v. State, 38 Tex. 6.

"Where a statute makes a second offense felony or subject to a heavier punishment than the first, it is always implied that such second offense ought to be committed after a conviction for the first: . . . for the gentler method shall first be tried, which perhaps may prove effectual." This statement from 1 Hawkins, P. C. chap. 40, § 8, is quoted and adopted by the court in People v. Butler, 3 Cow. 347, construing the New York act of 1819, Sees. 42, chap. 245, § 4, to provide for enhanced penalty for a second offense of petit larceny only when such offense is committed after prior conviction. The court says the language of this statute has prevailed in various acts through a series of revisions and relations to different offenses. Some of them explicitly refer to persons a second time convicted, and the court concludes that the difference of phraseology is entirely accidental, that the legislature meant the same thing in each statute; that is, that a conviction should precede the second offense.

And in Kentucky the words "convicted a second time of felony" and "convicted a third time of felony," in Ky. Stat. § 1180, providing for increased punishment of persons thus convicted, must be restricted to felonies committed subsequent to the dates of the convictions relied on to effect the increased penalty, for otherwise no locus penitentiae would be afforded to the accused. The court says that the reformatory object of the statute, namely, to provide deterrent from future crime, would not be effected by a construction which gives to the offender no opportunity to reform. Brown v. Com. (Ky.) 37 S. W. 496.

So, in Virginia a subsequent offense must have been committed after a prior conviction in order plied to the petitioner, and he is treated as now serving his second term, his term will not expire until November 16 of this year, but, if he is treated as though serving his first term, he is now entitled to his release.

It is claimed that to regard the petitioner as to justify the increased punishment for a second offense under 1 Va. Rev. Code 1792, chap. 107, § 4-Com. v. Welsh, 2 Va. Cas. 57.

And again, the provision for additional punishment of one who "had been before sentenced in the United States to a like punishment," made in Va. Code 1849, chap. 199, § 25, is construed in accordance with the general policy of such statutes to be applicable only to cases in which the prior conviction preceded the commission of the offense for which the increased punishment is to be imposed. Rand v. Com. 9 Gratt. 738.

Likewise in Massachusetts to render a person liable to the additional and aggravated punishment prescribed for a second conviction by Mass. Stat. 1852, chap. 322, § 7, his subsequent offense must have been committed after a conviction for the prior offense. Com. v. Daley, 4 Gray, 209.

But for the purpose of considering a later conviction the third one two convictions at one and the same term of the same court for two distinct larcenies or other crimes, each of which is punishable by confinement to hard labor for a term of years, are two convictions within the meaning of the Massachusetts statute of 1857, as much as if they had been at different terms of different courts. Com. v. Phillips, 11 Pick. 28.

Under such a statute a person convicted on three counts of one indictment cannot be sentenced under the second and third as in case of second and third convictions, because the fact of prior conviction must be averred in the indictment and proved. Tuttle v. Com. 2 Gray, 505.

So, a sentence as for a second offense cannot be imposed on conviction of a second sale immediately after the conviction of a prior sale, where the indictment did not charge that it was a second offense. Rauch v. Com. 78 Pa. 490.

d. Conditions as to execution of or relief from prior sentence before commission of later offense.

According to the doctrine expressed in the preceding division (II. c), the statutes contemplate a trial of penal discipline as a means of reforming the criminal before rendering him liable to more severe punishment for the second offense. Therefore some statutes require that the end of such discipline must have been reached either by compliance with the sentence or by exercise of executive clemency before the commission of another offense will incur an enhanced penalty because of the prior conviction. But other statutes make a prior conviction the only condition. For some of these, see cases in last preceding division, although in them the present question was not raised.

But in Kansas it is expressly held that satisfaction of the sentence to pay a fine for a first offense by payment of fine or pardon is not necessary for the purpose of having the former conviction considered to increase the penalty for a subsequent offense. State v. Volmer, 6 Kan. 379.

One who had been twice convicted but discharged only once prior to Mass. Stat. 1832, chap. 78, which provided that additional punishment because of prior convictions should be given when the prisoner had been twice discharged from such a sentence previously, may after the repeal of that statute have additional punishment imposed upon him under Mass. Stat. 1837, chap. 118, which provided for additional punishment of one who had been twice convicted and sentenced, as this statute was merely suspended, and not repealed, by that of 1832. Com. v. Gutchell, 16 Pick. 452. See also Com. v. Mott, supra, II. a.

Under an information which alleges two prior convictions for the same offense but only one sentence, defendant cannot be sentenced as for a third offense, under How. Stat. (Mich.) § 9425, providing for heavier punishment of a convict twice before "sentenced" to imprisonment at hard labor for a certain period. People v. Ellsworth, 68 Mich. 496.

Either a pardon or discharge must be averred in the indictment for a second offense after prior conviction and discharge by pardon or otherwise, under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 584, 2d ed. § 2. Stevens v. People, 1 Hill, 251.

So, an averment not only of a conviction but of a discharge, either upon pardon or the expiration of the sentence, in an indictment under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 609, § 8, is declared necessary in Wood v. People, 53 N. Y. 511.

In Gibeon v. People, 5 Hun, 542, an averment of this was held sufficient although not in the exact words of the statute.

So, in Missouri it must appear that the defendant has complied with the former sentence, and also that he has been discharged therefrom. State v. Austin, 113 Mo. 538; State v. Loehr, 93 Mo. 103. (Both of these cases involved the sufficiency of the allegations of these facts.)

Mere lapse of time does not authorize the presumption that a person previously convicted has been imprisoned and discharged upon the expiration of the term for which he was sentenced so as to cast upon him on trial for a second offense the burden of proving that he was not discharged either by pardon or upon the expiration of his sentence. He may have escaped, or the judgment may have been arrested or reversed, or he may have been discharged upon habeas corpus; and as there are other means and processes by which he might be discharged or found at liberty, it is error for the court to assume, in the absence of evidence, that he was discharged upon the expiration of the term of imprisonment and therefore liable to conviction for the aggravated offense. Wood v. People, 53 N. Y. 511.

e. Effect of pardon of prior offense.

In a considerable number of states the statutes expressly provide for the enhanced punishment for a crime committed after conviction of a prior offense and a discharge therefrom by pardon or otherwise. See cases supra in division last preceding.

Where the statutes make no reference to a pardon of the prior offense there is room for doubt as to the effect of such pardon to prevent considering the prior offense for the purpose of more severely punishing a subsequent crime.

Such a doubt was suggested in a Pennsylvania case. There an application by the district attorney for the imposition of double the ordinary punishment because of prior conviction was withdrawn because of the fact that the governor had pardoned the defendant for his first offense, whereupon the court said: "Upon reflection I do not feel disposed to sentence the prisoner as for a second offense. It is at least questionable whether it could be done legally in view of the pardon. Without, however, deciding this point, it is sufficient to say that it would seem to be a harsh administration of the law to visit the prisoner with any of the consequences of an offense for which he has received a full and free pardon from the governor." Com. v. Morrow, 9 Phila. 553.

In Virginia it is expressly decided that pardon of the first offense takes away the right to inflict additional punishment for a second offense under Va.

now serving his second term is to apply ex post facto legislation to him, and subject him to additional punishment for a crime which he has fully expiated, under the laws existing at the time of its occurrence. Counsel cite Calder v. Bull, 3 U. S. 8 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648;

Code 1893, chap. 126, § 23, providing that a convict sentenced to the penitentiary shall have five years added to his term if it is proved that he has before been sentenced in the United States to a like punishment. Edwards v. Com. 78 Va. 30, 49 Am. Rep. 377. The court says pardon relieved the defendant not only "of the punishment annexed to the offense for which he had been convicted, but of all penalties and consequences except political disabilities growing out of his conviction and sentence. One of those consequences was the liability to which it subjected him to receive the additional punishment prescribed by the statute in case he should be afterwards sentenced to the penitentiary in this state. And that additional punishment has been imposed in this case, not by reason of the sentence for the second offense alone, but in consequence of that sentence and the sentence in the former case. Both causes must exist together to produce the effect contemplated by the statute; in the absence of either, no case is made for the imposition of the additional punishment the statute prescribes. But as the first offense was in legal contemplation blotted out, and its consequences removed by the pardon of the governor, it must be regarded for the purposes of this case as though it had never been committed."

But, on the other hand, it is decided in Kentucky that a pardon of a convict does not prevent his conviction from being considered to enhance the penalty of an offense subsequently committed, where the statute provides for increased punishment on a second conviction. Mount v. Com. 2 Dav. 94. The court says: "The pardon relieved the convict of the entire penalty incurred by the offense pardoned, and nothing else or more. It neither did nor could relieve from any penal consequences resulting from a different offense committed after the pardon and never pardoned. The increased punishment prescribed by statute for the subsequent offense was no part of the penal consequences of the first offense but applied exclusively to the last as aggravated by its repetition of the same crime. The legislature, as required by justice and policy, ought to have provided a severer punishment for repeated than for only one crime; and whether it had done so by duplicating for a second offense the punishment of the first, or by any other measure of augmentation, cannot be material. In any aspect the augmented punishment is for the last and not at all for the first offense; and, of course, a pardon of the first could in no way or degree operate as a pardon of the last offense or remission of any portion of the punishment denounced for perpetration of it."

It is plain that the reasoning of the Kentucky court is in harmony with all the decisions which sustain these statutes against constitutional objections, as they all proceed on the theory that the enhanced penalty is not in any sense a new punishment for the prior offense. If it were the statutes would violate the constitutional provisions considered at the beginning of this note. But if the statutes are to be upheld on the ground that the enhanced penalty is not a new or additional punishment of the prior offense, a pardon of that offense does not relieve from that penalty. The admirable statement of the matter by the Kentucky court, which is above quoted, seems to be conclusive.

In agreement with this doctrine, it is held in a New York case that a pardon by the governor of another state of a person there convicted of an offense will not prevent the effect of such former conviction from operating under the New York statute to make him liable to an increased punishment for a subsequent offense in New York. People v. Price, 53 Hun, 185.

f. Effect of appeal or writ of error to review prior conviction.

An adjudication that a judgment of conviction for a first offense was erroneous will make necessary the reversal of a judgment imposing an additional punishment on the same person in sentencing him for a second offense when writs of error have been taken from both judgments. Hopkins v. Com. 8 Met. 460; Hutchinson v. Com. 4 Met. 350.

A pending appeal from the former conviction suspends its effect as such for the purpose of increasing the punishment for the second offense. State v. Volmer, 6 Kan. 379.

So will a pending writ of error and supersedeas. White v. Com. 79 Va. 611.

g. Effect of prior conviction in other state or country.

A prior conviction in another state is not the ground of increased punishment for the offense of petit larceny under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 690, § 9, providing in general terms for such punishment of persons who have been convicted without in terms confining the first conviction to that state. People v. Caesar, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 645. This construction is supported by the fact that there is an express provision in regard to felonies as to the effect of prior conviction in any of the United States or in any district or territory thereof or in any foreign country.

So, a plea of guilty to an indictment which alleges a prior conviction in another state will not sustain a sentence as for a second offense, where the statute provides such punishment only for prior convictions in the state. People v. Caesar, supra.

But this question depends, of course, upon the statutory provisions. Some statutes, like that of Virginia construed in Edwards v. Com. 78 Va. 30, 49 Am. Rep. 377, and Rand v. Com. 9 Gratt. 733, apply to persons "before sentenced in the United States" to a like punishment.

So, the New York Penal Code, § 688, construed in People v. Price, 53 Hun, 185, Affirmed 119 N. Y. 650, mem. applies to persons "convicted under the laws of another state, government, or country."

So, Mass. Stat. 1827, chap. 436, upheld in Com. v. Graves, 155 Mass. 163, 16 L. R. A. 236, deems those habitual criminals who have been twice convicted and sentenced to prison for terms not less than three years each, providing that at least one such conviction and sentence shall have been in Massachusetts.

Other statutes contain similar provisions, but no attempt is made to collect them here except so far as they have been passed upon by the courts.

h. What prior sentence must have been.

A sentence as a common and notorious thief pursuant to Mass. Stat. 1804, chap. 143, § 3, although it may have been upon three simple larcenies, neither of which would separately be punishable by hard labor for more than one year, is a sentence for an offense punishable by confinement to hard labor for a term of years, within the meaning of Mass. Stat. 1827, chap. 118, §§ 19, 20, relating to additional punishment for successive convictions. Ex parte White, 14 Pick. 90.

"Any term of years" for which a person may have been sentenced within the meaning of Mass. Stat. 1817, chap. 176, §§ 5, 6, and 1827, chap. 118, §§ 19, 20, providing that on such sentence of a person

Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 87, 8 L. ed. 162; Cummings v. Missouri, 76 U. S. 4 Wall. 277, 18 L. ed. 356; Ex parte Garland,

71 U. S. 4 Wall. 333, 13 L. ed. 366; Re Walsh, 87 Mich. 466; Re Canfield, 98 Mich. 644. We do not think any of these cases sustain the claim Previously sentenced to a like punishment an additional penalty should be imposed, must be construed to mean a period of time not less than two years, and therefore inapplicable to a sentence for larceny without aggravation to an amount less than $100, which is punishable by imprisonment for not more than one year. Ex parte Seymour, 14 Pick. 40; Ex parte Stevens, Id. 94.

But it is sufficient that the crime for which the sentence is to be imposed is punishable by confinement to hard labor for a term of years, although the sentence for the former conviction must have been actually made for not less than two years. The words "sentenced to a like punishment" mean not only a sentence to confinement to hard labor but for a "term of years." Ex parte Dick, 14 Pick. 86.

Under the act of 1833 the provision is changed from "any term of years" to "more than one year." Ex parte Stevens, supra.

The word "prison," as used in Mass. Stat. 1887, chap. 436, § 1, relating to the effect of prior sentence and commitment to prison, is not limited in its meaning to the state prison, but includes all places of imprisonment for crime, and therefore the statute does not discriminate between the effect of prior sentences to state prison and those to jails or houses of correction. Sturtevant v. Com. 158 Mass. 598.

1. Similarity or identity of prior and subsequent offenses.

The prior and subsequent offenses need not be of the same character or grade under N. Y. Penal Code, § 683, to make one who has been convicted within the state of a felony liable on conviction of a subsequent crime to the maximum penalty that could be imposed for such crime as a first offense. Therefore, one who had previously committed the offense of forgery in the third degree must, on the subsequent conviction of forgery in the first degree, be sentenced to imprisonment for life, that being the maximum penalty for forgery in the first degree. People v. Raymond, 96 N. Y. 38, affirming 32 Hun, 123.

And the former conviction need not have been for the same crime as that for which the subsequent conviction is had in order to permit the imposition of the enhanced penalty because of prior conviction under the Illinois act of June 22, 1883, providing that one convicted of either of certain specified crimes may have the enhanced penalty imposed on subsequent conviction of any of said crimes. Kelly v. People, 115 Ill. 533, 56 Am. Rep. 184.

But previous convictions for felonies must be for offenses which were in themselves penitentiary offenses, and not made so merely because of repeated convictions and sentences for offenses which would otherwise be misdemeanors, in order to permit a life sentence under Va. Code 1887, §§ 3905, 3906, providing for such sentences of convicts twice previously sentenced to the penitentiary. Stover v. Com. 92 Va. 780.

A former conviction for selling liquors was held, in Scot v. Turner, 1 Root, 163, to be insufficient to justify an increased punishment on a subsequent conviction for selling victuals, hay, etc., without license, because this was a different offense.

A conviction of breaking and entering a building in the night-time and stealing therefrom is not such a conviction of larceny as will justify the sentence of a person subsequently convicted of larceny as a common and notorious thief under the Massachusetts statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 123, § 19). 24 L. R. A.

The gist of the prior offense in such case is the burglary. Kite v. Com. 11 Met. 581.

A sentence on conviction under an indictment charging burglary, and also larceny in a separate count, where the conviction is for the whole charge laid in the indictment, is presumed to be for the burglary, merging the larceny therein, so that it will not constitute a conviction for larceny within the meaning of the statute providing that on subsequent convictions for larceny a person may be sentenced as a common and notorious thief. Ibid.

A conviction on a combined charge of house breaking and larceny is not to be considered as for one of "three distinct larcenies" which will render a party liable to be adjudged a common and notorious thief, under Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 123, § 19. Com. v. Hope, 23 Pick. 1.

Under Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 215, § 3, providing that a sentence may be either to fine, or to imprisonment only if the prisoner shows that he has not been before convicted of a similar offense, a prior conviction of an offense against the same statute is none the less for a similar offense because at the time of its commission the penalty was different. The whole punishment to be imposed is for the later offense. Com. v. Marchand, 155 Mass. 8.

The effect of the ruling in this case is that the statute bears more heavily upon future offenses by previous offenders than upon first offenses, so far that no discretion is given to mitigate the statutory penalty in the former case as it is in the latter.

The provision of Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 127, § 17, for adjudging a person to be a common utterer of counterfeit coin if convicted three times at the same term of court for such offenses, or if convicted of such an offense committed after a previous conviction, does not apply where a person is twice convicted at the same term of uttering counterfeit coin, and also convicted of having such coin in his possession with intent to utter it as genuine. Murray v. Com. 18 Met. 514.

1. Procedure.

1. In general.

The fact of a previous conviction may be set forth in a prosecution by information as well as by indictment in order to have enhanced punishment imposed on account of the repetition of the offense under Cal. Penal Code, § 666. People v. Carlton, 57 Cal. 559.

The sufficiency of allegations in indictments or informations charging prior convictions is a matter not included in this note.

Under the English statute, 15 Geo. II., chap. 23, § 2, providing severer punishment for uttering false money if it is done twice on the same day or within ten days, the two facts of uttering twice in the time limited should be united in one count as a single charge. King v. Tandy, 2 Leach, C. L. 833.

Alternative proceedings are provided for by the Massachusetts statute either to aver a former conviction or convictions in an indictment and have the whole punishment awarded in a sentence thereon, or, in the absence of such an averment, to file a subsequent information to have the additional punishment imposed. Plumbly v. Com. 2 Met. 413.

But both these proceedings cannot be taken. Ibid.

The provision for solitary imprisonment, made by Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 120, § 8, in case a convict is sentenced to state prison, does not apply to additional sentences awarded upon information against those who have been previously convicted of counsel for the petitioner. It is held in 3 U. S. 8 Dall. supra, that the legislature may declare new crimes, and establish rules of conduct in future cases. In 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, supra, an ex post facto law was defined to be one which renders an act punishable in a manner and sentenced. The latter is only the completion or filling up of the former sentence. Bump v. Com. 8 Met. 583.

After sentence for a third offense under an indictment reciting two former convictions which are found by the verdict, it must be assumed that the additional punishment because of the prior conviction was embraced in the sentence awarded, and no information will afterward lie to award any additional punishment because of them. Com. v. Phillips, 11 Pick. 28.

Where an indictment for a third offense recites two former convictions and sentences to a state prison, and this is supported by proof, the additional punishment prescribed by the Massachusetts statute ought to be included in the sentence then passed upon the convict, and cannot legally be awarded on a subsequent information against him. Plumbly v. Com. supra.

An information for additional punishment on account of a prior conviction cannot be filed under the Massachusetts statutes after the prisoner's term of punishment has expired. Com. v. Keniston, 5 Pick. 420.

2. Pleas and admissions.

A confession of guilt and of the fact of a former conviction is held in State v. Zimmerman, 83 Iowa, 118, to cure defects in the allegation of a prior conviction if it was defective.

The identity of a defendant with the person convicted in a prior case when a prior conviction is alleged to enhance the punishment may be established by the defendant's own admission without other proof. Kane v. Com. 100 Pa. 541.

But an admission by a prisoner that he had been twice convicted of felony, once for stealing a shotgun and another time for stealing cattle, without any record evidence of his former convictions, although it is sufficient to identify him, is not sufficient proof of such convictions, under Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 26, art. 1, § 12, requiring the jury to find the fact of such convictions from "record and other competent evidence." Rector v. Com. 80 Ky. 468.

Although in Kane v. Com. supra, in answer to an objection to an allegation and evidence of prior conviction the court said "in this manner alone can the provisions of the statute be carried into effect." The language just quoted is regarded in Com. v. Hagan, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 22, as a dictum so far as the use of the word "alone" is concerned, and it is held, therefore, that the fact of previous convictions as a basis for a double sentence may properly be brought before the court by suggestion filed by the district attorney, and that when such suggestion is made and the defendant admits his identity with the person previously convicted, the double sentence may be imposed.

A voluntary confession of the prior convictions alleged in an information is sufficient to permit their consideration in passing sentence, as provided by Cal. Penal Code, § 667, where defendant is convicted on a plea of not guilty to the offense charged in the information. Ex parte Young Ah Gow, 73 Cal. 438. The court in this case carefully reviews the prior cases of People v. King, 64 Cal. 338; People v. Lewis, 1d. 401; and People v. Brooks, 65 Cal. 236,—holding that they are not inconsistent although some of the language in People v. King must be held obiter.

In People v. King, supra, defendant pleaded not guilty of the specific offense charged, but when asked by the court whether or not he had suffered the previous conviction admitted that he had. This was held to be an improper question, and his answer therefore incompetent as evidence against him to prove such prior conviction. It was the illegality of the arraignment for which the conviction was reversed.

In People v. Lewis, supra, it was held that defendant's admission of a previous conviction, made after a plea of "not guilty of the offense charged in the indictment," is not sufficient to permit an increased punishment because of it, since the repeal of §§ 969, 1025, of Cal. Penal Code. Having regularly pleaded not guilty of the offense charged, the court is not bound afterwards on the trial to accept his plea of guilty of the previous conviction.

But it was held in People v. Brooks, supra, that when defendant was properly arraigned by simply asking him the question "guilty or not guilty?"—on which he pleaded not guilty of the offense charged, but further said that he "confesses and admits" the prior conviction, the voluntary confession was legal and sufficient to authorize the jury to find the fact of a prior conviction.

On a plea of guilty to an indictment or information charging a prior conviction no trial by jury is necessary, although on a plea of not guilty the issue of previous conviction must be tried by the jury. People v. Carlton, 57 Cal. 559.

A plea of "guilty of the offense as charged in the indictment" confesses the previous conviction as well as the other allegations of the indictment, where previous conviction is alleged. People v. Delany, 49 Cal. 394.

But it is held in Virginia that the plea of not guilty does not put in issue the allegation of a previous conviction and sentence. Thomas v. Com. 22 Gratt. 912.

3. Order of trial; separating issues.

As to the proper practice in respect to bringing a prior conviction into the case, the court, in Com. v. Morrow, 9 Phila. 568, points out that an allegation thereof in the indictment is damaging to the defendant's character, and will go far to secure his conviction; while, on the other hand, proof thereof after the verdict might raise an embarrassing question of identity which should be settled by the verdict of the jury, and that it is a question whether a jury is not the constitutional right of the defendant in such case.

The practice adopted is by no means uniform. In England the statute regulates it.

Thus, the prisoner must first be arraigned "upon so much only of the indictment as charges the subsequent offense," under 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 96, § 116, and if the jury find him guilty, or if on arraignment he plead guilty, "he shall then, and not before, be asked whether he has been previously convicted as alleged in the indictment," and a finding of the jury on the previous conviction is then provided for. Reg. v. Fox, 10 Cox, C. C. 502, 15 Week. Rep. 106. The above provisions are held material and a conviction quashed for want of observance of them.

The arraignment of a prisoner and his trial for the subsequent offense only in the first instance is expressly required by § 37 of 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 96, respecting offenses relating to the Crown by one who has been previously convicted of such an offense, and the question of his previous conviction under this section can be inquired into only after he is found guilty. Queen v. Martin, L. R. 1 C. C. 214, 21 L. T. N. S. 469, 18 Week. Rep. 72.

But under 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 19, § 9, the proper mode of proceeding on trial of an indictment charging previous conviction was to arraign the in which it was not punishable when it was committed. The act of 1898 was in force before the second conviction of the petitioner occurred. He is presumed to have known its provision when he committed the offense for which he is now serving time. He served the prisoner on the whole indictment, but to charge the jury with the subsequent offense only in the first instance, and after conviction of that offense then to charge them with the previous conviction. Reg. v. Key, 5 Cox, C. C. 369, 2 Den. C. C. 347, 3 Car. & K. 371; Reg. v. Shuttleworth, 5 Cox, C. C. 371, 3 Car. & K. 375, Temp. & M. 626, 2 Den. C. C. 351, 21 L. J. M. C. N. S. 36, 15 Jur. 1066.

Prior to the statutes just referred to the English practice was somewhat unsettled.

Thus, in Rex v. Jones, 6 Car. & P. 391 (1834), where the prisoner was charged with a previous conviction, Park, J., is reported as using the following language in summing up: "I used never to allow the jury to know anything of the previous conviction till they had given their opinion on the charge upon which the prisoner was to be tried; because I thought that if the jury were aware of the previous conviction it was (to use a common expression) like trying a man with a rope about his neck. However, the judges have had a meeting on the subject at which thirteen of them were present, and they held that my practice and that of another learned judge was wrong; and the opinion of the judges is that the previous conviction must be proved before the prisoner is called on for his defense."

Under La. Rev. Stat. § 774, the judge has power to sentence any person who may be convicted for a second or third offense to double and triple the penalty imposed by law, and for a fourth offense to perpetual imprisonment. But it is held that the convict should have the opportunity to show cause why the increased punishment should not be inflicted. State v. Hudson, 32 La. Ann. 1052.

In this case the prior convictions were noticed judicially, being of record in the same court.

So, in a South Carolina case the court says: "It is only necessary to decide upon the existence or nonexistence of the record when the court is called on to pronounce the sentence of the law. If there be but one conviction, then, of course, the law imposes only the punishment for the first offense. If there be two convictions then the punishment for the second offense follows, and for this purpose it is certainly immaterial whether the first conviction is or is not recited in the record of the second, and this is in conformity with the practice here and every where else." State v. Smith, 8 Rich. L. 460.

But in most jurisdictions in this country the prior conviction is proved on the trial of the main issue, as will appear from the cases immediately following and others deciding questions of evidence in the division next below this.

For the court to tell the jury that no proof of a former conviction which is alleged in the indictment is necessary, and to accept a verdict of "guilty," and then for the court itself to hear evidence as to whether or not the offense was a second one and on such evidence to impose punishment as for a second offense, is erroneous. Hines v. State, 26 Ga. 514.

The question whether the offense was a second one or not is a question for the jury, involving the question of identity as well as other matters. Id.; State v. Lashus, 79 Me. 504; State v. Robinson, 39 Me. 150.

Proof of a prior conviction should be made before verdict in order to impose the enhanced penalty therefor, under Vt. Rev. Laws, § 3848, providing that the prior conviction shall be alleged, § 3804, providing for proof thereof upon the trial, and § 3850, providing a special verdict where it is necessary to enable the court to pass the proper sentence. State v. Spaulding, 61 Vt. 505.

The court holds that these statutory provisions by which the original act of 1852 for increased penalty on account of a prior conviction had been amended changed the rule of the prior decisions made in State v. Freeman, 27 Vt. 523, and State v. Haynes, 35 Vt. 570.

It had been said in State v. Freeman, supra, that "if any question bona fide arises" in regard to the identity of the person charged with a prior conviction for a similar offense, the "county court or this court might order an issue upon the point to be submitted to a jury in the proper tribunal."

So, in State v. Haynes, supra, it was held to be unnecessary to show the former convictions on the trial before the jury, but they may be shown to the court after conviction for the purpose of affecting the sentence, although if an issue of fact is made as to the identity of the offender or as to any other fact he may have a jury to try it.

To obtain the benefit of the Michigan statute providing that a person convicted for the first time of receiving stolen property may by restitution thereof avoid imprisonment in the state prison, it is his duty to show the facts to the court before sentence, and he cannot set them up after sentence. People v. Smith, 94 Mich. 644; People v. Hubbard, 86 Mich. 440.

The right of the defendant to make peremptory challenges of jurors on an issue as to his identity with the person formerly convicted is denied in Brooks v. Com., 2 Rob. (Va.) 845, on the ground that such challenges are not allowed on the trial of collateral issues.

So, in England, the right to challenge jurors cannot be claimed by a prisoner when they are sworn afresh to try the issue of a former conviction. Reg. v. Key, 5 Cox, C. C. 369, 2 Den. C. C. 347, 3 Car. & K. 371; but it is expressly held in the companion case of Reg. v. Shuttleworth, 5 Cox, C. C. 371, 3 Car. & K. 375, Temp. & M. 626, 2 Den. C. C. 351, 21 L. J. M. C. N. S. 36, 15 Jur. 1066, that the jury need not be resworn to try the issue of former conviction.

4. Proof.

Putting the record of a prior conviction in evidence to prove the fact of such conviction under a statute providing for increased punishment in such cases is not subject to the objection that it is proof of defendant's bad character before he has put his character in issue, as the object is not merely to prove bad character. Johnson v. People, 65 Barb. 342, Affirmed 55 N. Y. 512.

To prove a previous conviction many may be alleged, and if one should be proved that will be sufficient. Reg. v. Clark, 6 Cox, C. C. 210, 22 L. J. M. C. N. S. 126, 17 Jur. 582, Dears. C. C. 198, 3 Car. & K. 367.

On a joint prosecution for an offense under an indictment alleging previous convictions the proof need not be of joint convictions, but it is sufficient to show that the defendants had been severally convicted. State v. Dolan, 69 Me. 873.

Oral evidence of a previous conviction is competent if not objected to. State v. Rockett, 37 Mo. 686.

The record of a previous conviction may properly be set forth in an indictment and offered in evidence on the trial in order to have double punishment imposed, under Pa. act March 31, 1860, § 182, for a second conviction of manslaughter. Kane v. Com. 109 Pa. 541.

Evidence of a prior conviction of felony, not alleged in the indictment and not proved by any record or certificate of the conviction, is not sufficient to justify the imposition of seven years penal serv-penalty of his first conviction, and, if he had not again violated the criminal law, he would not now be an inmate of prison. The penalty he is now serving is imposed for the offense committed by the prisoner after the act of 1893 took effect. Under such circumstances, the itude, under 27 & 28 Vict. chap. 47, § 2, on account of the prior conviction of a felony. Queen v. Summers, L. R. 1 Q. C. 182, 38 L. J. M. C. N. S. 62, 17 Week. Rep. 384, 11 Cox, C. C. 248.

Placing before the jury the record of a prior conviction of a person whose identity with the present prisoner is not proved or admitted will require a new trial where he was convicted under an indictment alleging a former conviction. Com. v. Briggs, 7 Pick. 177, 5 Pick. 429.

Proof of the identity of the offender with the person named in the record of prior conviction is necessary, although the statutes provide that the conviction must be proved by certified copy. Reg. v. Leng, 1 Fost. & F. 77.

See also supra, II., as to admissions.

Evidence from which a jury may draw the conclusion that defendant is the same person named in a certificate of conviction is sufficient, although no witness saw him convicted at his trial. Thus, it was held sufficient where the evidence showed that the prisoner was committed under a warrant which corresponded with the certificate of conviction in respect to offense, date, etc. Ibid.

The fact that the term for which a person was sentenced on a previous conviction has expired is sufficient evidence to go to the jury as to his being discharged of that conviction. Johnson v. People, 65 Barb. 342.

The sufficiency of the authentication of a record of a prior conviction to permit its use in evidence is not considered in this note.

An indictment charging a prior conviction in another state, found without any evidence before the grand jury of the identity of the defendant, was quashed in People v. Price, 6 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 144.

5. Attacking validity of prior conviction.

A former conviction which is merely erroneous but not a nullity, and which could be set up in bar of another indictment for the same offense, is sufficient to sustain the imposition of an enhanced penalty on subsequent conviction, under the Illinois statute, of a second offense. Kelly v. People, 115 Ill. 583, 56 Am. Rep. 184.

To similar effect, it is held in Massachusetts that the regularity of former judgments of conviction cannot be inquired into on the trial of an information for additional punishment for a subsequent offense. Hopkins v. Com. 3 Met. 460; Wilde v. Com. 2 Met. 408.

A sentence to additional punishment on an information setting forth three previous convictions and sentences is not invalid because one of those sentences was erroneous and has been reversed, if the other two were valid, where the statute requires only two previous convictions as the basis of the enhanced punishment. Newton v. Com. 8 Met. 585.

But a conviction of a second offense was held wrong in Rex v. Allen, Russ. & H. C. C. 513, where the counsel for the prisoner objected; first, that the indictment did not state that the prisoner was duly convicted; second, that he was not duly convicted because the conviction was not in the proper county; and third, that there was a fatal variance because it stated a conviction of the defendant whereas it was a conviction of four persons. It does not appear which of these objections was held fatal, except by a footnote in which it is stated that it was probably the second one.

6. Verdict and judgment.

Failure to prove a prior conviction alleged in the indictment is not fatal, but the defendant may be found guilty of the offense charged as a first offense. Palmer v. People, 5 Hill, 427.

Although not involved in the questions presented on the appeal, it is said in Maguire v. State, 47 Md. 486, that it may not be improper for the court to notice "that as the verdict appears to have been guilty generally without anything more the judgment to be entered on it can only be as for a first offense."

The imposition of a sentence greater than can be imposed for a first offense is erroneous, where the record does not show whether the present offense is the first one or not. Walters v. State, 5 Iowa, 507.

A verdict of "guilty" simply does not sufficiently find that the defendant had also been previously convicted as alleged in the indictment. Thomas v. Com. 22 Gratt. 912.

A general finding of guilty and fixing punishment at confinement for life, which could only be done in case of former convictions, is not sufficient without finding the fact of the former convictions, where the statute provides that the increased penalty shall not be given "unless the jury shall find from record and other competent evidence the fact of former convictions. Rector v. Com. 80 Ky. 468.

A verdict that defendant was guilty of uttering counterfeit coin, but finding against the fact of a former conviction, will not sustain a conviction of the misdemeanor of uttering where the prisoner was indicted under 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 90, § 12, for the felony of uttering counterfeit coin after previous conviction for a like offense. The court says the offense is a compound one, and the previous conviction is a part of and a necessary ingredient in it. Queen v. Thomas, L. R. 3 Q. C. 141, 13 Cox, C. C. 62.

A consolidated judgment against a defendant as a common and notorious thief is required by Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 120, § 19, when a person is convicted of three distinct larcenies at the same term of court. Separate judgments on the separate convictions in such case are erroneous. Haggett v. Com. 3 Met. 457.

On overruling a demurrer to an information for additional punishment of a convict because of a prior conviction judgments in chief may be rendered without a respondet oster. Evans v. Com. 8 Met. 453.

A nolle prosequi as to the matter in aggravation of an offense by reason of a former conviction is held to be properly entered after a conviction on the whole indictment. Com. v. Briggs, 7 Pick. 177, 5 Pick. 429.

The omission of additional punishment from a sentence does not render the judgment erroneous, although the prior convictions were alleged and proved. Phillips v. Com. 8 Met. 588.

But the imposition of the maximum penalty is imperative, and not discretionary with the court, under N. Y. Penal Code, § 683. People v. Raymond, 96 N. Y. 88, Affirming 22 Hun, 123.

So is the life sentence, under Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 29, art. 1, § 12, for a third conviction. Combs v. Com. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 244, as to which, see further, supra, II. a.

The double penalty for second conviction under that statute, is the minimum, but the jury may make it more than double. Chenoweth v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 561, 12 Crim. L. Mag. 234.

The prisoner cannot complain that the jury does not take into consideration his previous conviction if proved under an indictment charging such prior conviction. Vincent v. People, 5 Park. Crim. Rep. 88.

A sentence which is right as for a second conviction act cannot be regarded as ex post facto. It was stated in Re Canfield, 98 Mich. 648, that "this is not a case where the law has authorized the imposition of an increased penalty for a second offense, but one where a certain class of offenders are denied the benefits of a certain rule, made for the maintenance of good order in the prison." We think it competent for the legislature to establish such a rule, and that it is not ex post facto legislation. See Cooley, tion which is proved will not be reversed because the court may have supposed the statutes regarded it as for a third conviction. Ex parte Stevens, 14 Pick. 94.

7. Appeal or writ of error.

Proof of a prior conviction to enhance the punishment cannot be received for the first time in the supreme court on appeal. State v. Haynes, 35 Vt. 570.

From a judgment of conviction under an information filed to have additional punishment imposed because of a prior conviction a writ of error will lie. Wilde v. Com. 2 Met. 408.

The remedy to reverse a judgment rendered on an information to impose additional punishment because of a prior conviction is by writ of error and not by certiorari, since the proceeding upon the information is according to the course of the common law. Re Cooke, 15 Pick. 234.

A defendant punishable because of the three convictions by imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding twenty years, is entitled to appeal under a provision allowing an appeal from such a sentence for a term exceeding five years, although there would be no right of appeal from a conviction for a single offense. Com. v. Tuck, 20 Pick. 356.

Failure to prove on the trial that the prisoner had been discharged from a previous conviction, or pardoned, although necessary under the statute, is not available as an objection if the question is raised for the first time on appeal. Johnson v. People, 55 N. Y. 512.

A defendant cannot on appeal object that there was no proof of his identity with the person convicted in a prior case, where the exceptions do not show whether there was or was not such proof on the trial, or that any such objection was then made. State v. Regan, 68 Me. 127. B. A. R.

1. The power to designate the local authority who shall appoint local officers, conferred on the legislature by Const. art. 10, § 2, if the election or appointment of such officers is not provided for by that Constitution, does not authorize the enactment of Laws 1896, chap. 427, providing that the police board of the city of Albany shall consist of four commissioners, of whom two shall belong to the political party having the highest representation in the common council, and the other two to the party having the next highest representation therein, and that each member of the council shall be entitled to vote for only two of such officers, since the minority which is thus given power to appoint two of the commissioners is not a city authority within the meaning of the Constitution.

2. The right of local self-government is violated by Laws 1896, chap. 427, which prevents majority rule in the selection of local officers by providing that each member of the common council shall vote for but two of the four police commissioners to be chosen, and that no person shall be eligible to the office who does not belong to the political party having the highest or next highest representation in the council, and that in case the board cannot agree in continuing in office the present force before a certain date the police force shall cease to exist, except a certain person who was senior captain on a specified day, who shall be chief of police until the board shall agree. [Per Gray and O'Brien, JJ.]

3. The unconstitutionality of a provision that each member of a common council may vote for but two of the four commissioners to be chosen, and that only members of the highest and the next highest political party represented in the council shall be eligible, is so essential a part of the scheme of Laws 1896, chap. 427, the main purpose of which was to secure a bipartisan police board, that the whole act must fall.

4. A statute making any person ineligible to appointment as police commissioner who did not belong to the party having the highest or next highest representation in the common council, which must appoint two from each of those parties, is in violation of Const. art. 1, § 1, declaring that no member of the state shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers, and art. 13, § 1, prohibiting any oath, declaration, or test as a qualification for office. (October 27, 1896.)

APPEAL by certain of the defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Albany County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enjoin defendants from proceeding to elect police commissioners in accordance with a state statute which was alleged to be unconstitutional. Affirmed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

This action was brought to obtain a judgment which should perpetually restrain the common council of the city of Albany from electing police commissioners in pursuance of the provisions of chapter 427 of the Laws of 1896. The ground of the action is the unconstitutionality of the act, which was passed to amend chapter 77 of the Laws of 1870 and other acts relating to the police department of that city. The 1st section of the present act amends § 8 of the previous act, so as to make it read as follows: "The police board of the city of Albany shall consist of four police commissioners, not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party or organization, and who shall be chosen and hold office as hereinafter provided. On the 1st Monday after the passage of this act, the common council shall meet at 8 o'clock in the evening in the common council chamber and shall proceed to elect four persons, residents and freeholders in the city, as such police commissioners, and for the purpose of such meeting the members attending shall constitute a quorum. Each member of the common council shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of such persons, and the four persons receiving the highest number of votes shall be such police commissioners. The common council shall not transact any other business until the said four police commissioners are elected. The commissioners so appointed shall hold office as such until the 1st day of February, 1898. During the month of January, 1898, and in each and every second year thereafter, the common council shall meet and proceed in like manner to elect four police commissioners, who shall hold office for two years from the 1st day of February following. If a vacancy shall occur in said board of police commissioners, otherwise than by expiration of term, it shall be filled by appointment by the mayor upon the written recommendation of a majority of the members of the common council belonging to the same political party or organization as the police commissioner whose office shall become vacant. No person is eligible to the office of police commissioner unless, at the time of his election, he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest or the next highest representation in the common council. The commissioners shall receive no compensation for any services performed by them under the provisions of this act." The supreme court, at special term and in the appellate division, has upheld the plaintiffs in their demand for an injunction, and certain of the defendants have appealed to this court.

Messrs. Arthur L. Andrews and J. Newton Fiero, for appellants:

The judiciary has no power or authority to substitute its views of the wisdom or policy of the statute for that of the legislature, and its functions are confined to the interpretation of the organic law as it stands, and they can consider only its actual provisions and the reasonable implications and inferences to be drawn therefrom.

Messrs. E. Countryman and Hale, Bulkeley, & Tennant, for respondents:

The provisions of the amendatory act contravene the Constitution of the state in so far as they render ineligible and disfranchise all citizens who are not "members of the political party or organization having the highest or the next highest representation in the common council."

The essential purpose of the amendatory act is the reorganization of the police force upon the basis of a commission created and organized to perpetuate partizanship and prevent home rule.

Where the court can judicially see that the legislature only intended the statute to be enforced in its entirety, and that by rejecting part the general purpose of the statute would be defeated, the court, if compelled to defeat the main purpose of the statute, will not strive to save any part.

Since the Constitution has made no provision for the election or appointment of police commissioners and other officers of the Albany police department whose offices were existent at the time of its adoption, such officers can only be chosen or appointed by the "authorities" of the city of Albany.

The common council of the city of Albany is a body composed of nineteen aldermen elected by the people in the several wards of the city, and can act only as a body at a meeting regularly called or appointed and by a majority of its quorum.

Wherever the Constitution has unqualifiedly conferred the power of appointment to office upon any tribunal, body, or authority, or has authorized the legislature to confer such power without qualification, on any tribunal, body, or authority, any attempt by the legislature (1) to authorize the exercise of such power by a part only of the members composing such tribunal, body, or authority, or (2) to control, limit, embarrass, or trammel such tribunal, body, or authority in the exercise of such power, is unconstitutional and void.

The provision in this statute appointing in a certain contingency the person who was senior captain on January 1, 1896, to the office of acting chief of police, and giving him power to appoint or assign to duty the entire police force of the city of Albany, is clearly unconstitutional and void.

The main object of the statute in question being unconstitutional, and the other provisions being connected therewith, all parts of a single scheme, permeating the entire act, the whole fails, and it cannot be adjudged good in part and void in part. It must stand or fall together.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned justices who, at the special term and in the appellate division, have expressed their views of the unconstitutionality of this act, have done so with such thoroughness as to leave but little to be added to this very important discussion. Mr. Justice Parker, at special term, rested his determination of the question upon the ground that the act violates § 1 of art. 1 and § 1 of art. 18 of the state Constitution; the former of which declares that "no member of this state shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers;" and the second of which declares that "no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification for any office of public trust" than the oath or affirmation prescribed in the Constitution to be taken. Mr. Justice Herriek, in the appellate division, while expressing his assent to the views which Mr. Justice Parker has so well presented, has devoted the greater part of his opinion to pointing out the respects in which the act is in conflict with § 2 of art. 10 of the Constitution of the state, which requires that "all city, town, and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or by some division thereof, or be appointed by such authorities thereof, as the legislature shall designate for that purpose." In this view the majority of the learned justices of the appellate division have been able to concur. The discussion of the question exhibits a critical examination of many authorities, and its statement of the general principles which underlie our popular form of government and which recognize the existence of a right in the people of the various political subdivisions of the state to self-government, without hindrance from the state government as to the right of choosing or appointing local officers, should command our acquiescence. Without denying force to the objection that such legislation violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the constitutional inhibition against the requirement of any other test than is prescribed, I think the main and the insuperable objection consists in the plain attempt to limit or to control the exercise of a power of appointment which the Constitution has unqualifiedly conferred upon the local authority to be designated. If that be true, there is no occasion to consider other objectionable features, for the question then presented becomes one of surpassing importance to the citizens of the state. The constitutional provision, I repeat, is that "all city, town, and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall . . . be appointed by such authorities thereof, as the legislature shall designate for that purpose." It is, of course, evident that the provision authorizes the legislature to confer the power of appointment upon any local authority; but that the power, which is to be thus conferred, may be qualified, or hampered in its exercise, by the legislature, is not only not evident, but such a proposition, in my opinion, threatens what we are bound to regard as a cardinal principle of our form of government. I refer to the right of local self-government; a right which inheres in a republican government, and with reference to which our Constitution was framed. The habit of local self-government is something which we took over, or rather continued from, the English system of government, and, as Judge Cooley has remarked with reference to the Constitutions of the states, "if not expressly recognized, it is still to be understood that all these instruments are framed with its present existence and anticipated continuance in view." Const. Lim. *35. The principle is one which it takes but little reflection to convince the mind of being fundamental in our governmental system, and as contributing strength to the national life, in its educational and formative effect upon the citizen. It means that in the local or political subdivisions of the state the people of the locality shall administer their own local affairs, to the extent that that right is not restricted by some constitutional provision. I do not think it can be seriously disputed that the conception of the state is free from the element that it belongs to it to control purely local affairs, and that state interference finds justification only when state policy or local abuses demand it. I think that no inference is warranted that other powers have been conferred by the people upon their legislative body than those which are mentioned in the Constitution, or which are necessary to carry into effect those which are expressly given.

In this clause of the Constitution under consideration we find the express reservation of the right of local self-government. The legislature is expressly authorized to designate the local authority, who shall appoint the local officers, and it is impliedly prohibited from doing more than that, or from placing limitations upon this power of appointment. As it was said in People, Wood, v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 544: "Every positive direction contains an implication against anything contrary to it, or which would frustrate or disappoint the purpose of that provision." When, therefore, we read in the act under consideration that "no person is eligible to the office of police commissioner unless, at the time of his election, he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest, or the next highest, representation in the common council," we must perceive a very clear violation of the Constitution. A right which is an accompaniment of our political institutions, which is expressly recognized as such by the Constitution, and the permanency of which is guaranteed therein, is deliberately trenching upon by the legislative body. What becomes of the right of the majority of the people in a locality to manage their own affairs, and to appoint their local officers, when that majority can have no advantage in the Constitution of the board by numbers, or when the choice is limited to the members of a designated class? Is it not clear that the legislature has assumed to add to the power to designate the appointing authorities of the municipality the further power to designate the particular persons from whom the appointments must be made, and, still further, to place the minority upon an equality with the majority? This is too evident an excess of power to be explained away, or to be excused upon the ground of a political expediency. It is not too much to say of it that it is an attack upon one of those fundamental forms of personal liberty against which the constitutional provision was intended to act as a safeguard. I think it to be as opposed to a safe state policy as to the very letter of the Constitution.

It ought not to require much of argument to show the importance of this clause in our Constitution, or what its presence means for our political institutions. Its very presence in the Constitution of the state since 1846 evidences the importance which the people attach to the preservation of this right in the management of their local affairs. It means the right to choose their local officers, in all its reality, or it means nothing. If it does not mean that the people have reserved the right of administering existing local offices by officers of their own choosing, whether it be done directly, through an election, or indirectly, through the method of an appointment by some of their local authorities, I am at a loss to understand its significance or in what consists its peculiar value. This clause was inserted in the Constitution of 1846, and it has been, not infrequently, considered by this court. In People, Williamson, v. McKinney, 52 N. Y. 374, the present chief judge of this court then said of it: "The obvious purpose of the provision of the Constitution which has been quoted was to secure to the people of the cities, towns, or villages of the state the right to have their local offices administered by officers selected by themselves." Later, in People, Bolton, v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50, Judge Allen spoke to the same effect, and used the following language: "Faithfully observed, and effect given to it in its spirit as well as in its letter, it effectually secures to each of the governmental divisions of the state the right of choosing or appointing its own local officers, without let or hindrance from the state government, and none can be deprived of the rights and franchises thus guaranteed to all. The theory of the Constitution is that the several counties, cities, towns, and villages are, of right, entitled to choose whom they will have to rule over them; and that this right cannot be taken from them, and the electors and inhabitants disfranchised, by any act of the legislature, or of any or all the departments of the state government combined. This right of self government lies at the foundation of our institutions, and cannot be disturbed or inter-ferred with, even in respect to the smallest of the divisions into which the state is divided for governmental purposes, without weakening the entire foundation; and hence it is a right not only to be carefully guarded by every department of the government, but every infraction or evasion of it to be promptly met and condemned; especially by the courts, when such acts become the subject of judicial investigation." This is strong and significant language. Read in its light, the provision of the act under consideration appears as legislation hostile to that freedom of action which the people of Albany have the right to claim, under the Constitution, in the management of their own affairs. It cannot be denied that legislation of this character has an inimical tendency, and, unless the check of the Constitution is strictly enforced by the courts, it may develop a germ of menace to local self-government, to the presence of which we should not suffer ourselves to be blinded by any partisan considerations; or until it becomes too late to extirpate it. I believe the principle to be too useful and too healthful a part of our governmental system to be denied its full effect, and, while it is recognized in the fundamental law of the state, the court should not be reluctant to enforce it whenever a case fairly involving its efficacy is presented. The judicial power was intended to stand as a bulwark against all legislation which impairs any of the constitutional guaranties. The legislative power of the state is vested in the legislature, and it is plenary with respect to the state at large, or to any portion thereof, in matters of government, except as restricted by the Constitution. But the people not only have not consented that the legislative power shall include the power to control their selection of local officers; but, fearing to trust the discretion of the legislature not to assume such a power, they have inserted in their Constitution an express restriction. We must not forget that a Constitution is the measure of the rights delegated by the people to their governmental agents, and not of the rights of the people. It apportions the powers of government, with such limitations as are appropriate to keep their exercise clearly defined. The judicial power can and should pronounce null all laws which contravene its provisions,—a feature of our governmental system which De Tocqueville declared to be "one of the strongest barriers ever devised against the tyrannies of political assemblies." Vol. 1, p. 129. The remarks of Judge Denio, in People, Wood, v. Draper, 15 N. Y. at page 537, where § 2 of art. 10 was under consideration, may be quoted in connection with our application of this section: "We must keep in mind that the Constitution was not framed for a people entering into a political society for the first time, but for a community already organized and furnished with legal and political institutions adapted to all or nearly all the purposes of civil government; and that it was not intended to abolish these institutions, except so far as they were repugnant to the Constitution then framed."

Having in mind this principle of local self-government, as an inherited and pronounced feature in the general governmental system, let us turn to the statute in question, and, more particularly, consider the provisions of the 1st section. What was it intended to do, and what will it do, if allowed effect? What are its spirit and its purpose? for we must consider them in determining whether the legislative intent may be effectuated. It was passed as an amendatory act, affecting chapter 77 of the Laws of 1870, and the acts supplemental thereto, which related to the police department of the city of Albany. At the time of its passage the board of police commissioners consisted of five persons, vis., of the mayor ex officio and of four persons whom he might appoint. The present statute provided for a board of only four commissioners, "not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party," who shall be chosen or elected at a prescribed meeting of the common council, and "for the purpose of such meeting the members attending shall constitute a quorum." Each member of the council is restricted in his vote to two persons, and "no person is eligible to the office . . . unless, at the time of his election he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest or the next highest representation in the common council." If a vacancy occur in the board, "it shall be filled by appointment by the mayor upon the written recommendation of a majority of the members of the common council, belonging to the same political party or organization as the police commissioner whose office shall become vacant." These provisions are very radical and peculiar in their character. Whereas, under existing statutes, the mayor was designated as the appointing authority, unfettered in his choice of men, and in the board which would result, a majority could always act, the legislature, by this act, has undertaken to designate an appointing authority whose appointees should only be taken from, and equally divided between, the two political parties dominant in the common council upon a certain date, and provision is made that that order of things should not be disturbed in the filling of any vacancy which might arise later. Then, again, instead of leaving the designated local authority to act in its regular or chartered way, provision is made for its action in ways unsanctioned by custom, or by other law than the act itself provides. The purpose of the act was to change the personnel of the board, and taking the appointments from the executive power of the city, to place them with its legislative power, under such restrictions as to choice as to compose a body of four commissioners, equally divided among two sufficiently well-defined political organizations. The spirit of the legislative act is manifested by the attempt to secure the appointment of such a board at the time fixed therein, by constituting an arbitrary quorum of the body out of any number of members attending. It may also be remarked, as illustrating the spirit of an act which provides for a board whose action may be blocked by a division of the members, that in § 4 provision is made for the discharge upon a certain date of every member of the force from office, "with the exception of the person who was senior captain on January 1, 1896," and, in the event of a failure of the board to appoint a chief of police, "the said senior captain . . . shall act as such," and in case of its failure to appoint the captains and sergeants, "then it shall be the duty of the chief or acting chief to assign members of the force to perform such duties until the board shall make such appointments." Thus "the person who was senior captain on January 1, 1896," is not only protected and kept in office by this act, but, in the very possible contingency of a tie in the board of commissioners blocking any action, he is invested with extraordinary powers of control. I do not need to comment upon the wisdom or the prudence of the legislative act, for the court is not concerned with that. Its concern ceases when it determines that the legislature has not transcended the limits of its powers, as they are defined in the Constitution of the state. If it has the right to interfere, to the extent that the act proposes, with the local government and concerns of the city of Albany, then we have only to affirm the constitutionality of its proceeding. If it has exceeded its legislative power, we are bound to say so, and to declare its act null, because unconstitutional.

That this statute violates the Constitution in its letter, as in its spirit, seems to me an indisputable proposition. It goes beyond the power to designate the local authority who, under the new system, shall appoint police commissioners. It designates the class of persons from whom the selection must be made and excludes all others, and it precludes the majority in the common council from naming the majority of the board. Nor does it confine the designation of an authority to what would be, in fact, such under the charter of the city of Albany; for it attempts to create an appointing body in violation of the provisions of the city charter. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1894 the local authorities of the city of Albany, under its charter, were the mayor as the executive power, and the common council as the legislative power. Laws 1888, chap. 298. The reference, therefore, of the constitutional provision in question was to local authorities as they were constituted by force of existing public laws, for the legal presumption must be that the revisers used those words not only intelligently, but with knowledge of the forms of municipal government and of the rules which guide executive and administrative action. The legislature was, consequently, clearly restricted, in its designation of an appointing authority, to what was a local authority within the meaning of the public laws; and in determining upon the common council it could not go further and reform or reconstitute its powers as a municipal agent or authority, by this indirect method. Power was not vested in any one member of the common council, but in the aggregate of the members who compose the body, and its action is the action of the body as a whole. United States v. Balkin, 144 U. S. 1, 86 L. ed. 821. To act validly, the vote of a majority of the members was required, both at common law and under the charter. Ex parte Wilcocks, 7 Cow. 402, 17 Am. Dec. 525; Laws 1888, chap. 298, title 8. One alderman, or member of the common council, or a group of members, or anything short of what is required by the charter to constitute a valid meeting of the board, would not be a local authority, competent to perform an act of municipal government. The legislative power is vested only in the common council, acting by a majority of the body. The minority was not empowered to bind the city, and the legislature cannot give it that power. The provision, therefore, for a quorum, to consist of any number of attending members, is clearly in conflict with the Constitution. In passing upon the validity of an act, we are to consider what is possible and what may be done under its authority, and the vice of the one before us is that it affects the common council's power to act, as designed and created by law to act,—that is to say, through the majority of its members; and it authorizes, in a certain contingency, something less or other than that local authority to act. The legislature could not, constitutionally, deprive the municipal authority, selected for the purpose, of the power to exercise its functions as prescribed by the law of its being,—an indisputable proposition with respect to a law which purports not to amend a municipal charter, but to confer some new power upon a municipal authority. We are not confronted here with any question of "minority representation." That is not the purpose of the act. It places the political minority in the legislative body upon an equality with the political majority, and in that feature consists the violation of that fundamental principle of our popular form of government, which demands that the majority shall govern. The principle of minority representation recognizes the right in the majority to control. It must be the majority who shall appoint the officers of government, and this extends more clearly to the governmental officers of localities, perhaps, than to the affairs of the state government. Mr. Justice Herrick refers to the only instance of the surrender by the people of the power of the majority to select their officers as being found in the constitutional provision for the passage of a law securing equal representation among the election officers of the two political parties which at the next preceding general election cast the highest and the next highest number of votes (§ 6, art. 2), and he appropriately observes that "the provision for such equal representation in the one case, by implication excludes it in all others." He reinforced his observation by a reference to the constitutional debates, which resulted in the defeat of propositions authorizing the legislature to provide for minority representation in city governments.

I will refer to two cases which are deemed to bear upon the discussion of this case. In Rogers v. Buffalo, 128 N. Y. 178, 9 L. R. A. 579, the law provided, as to a board of three civil service commissioners there in question, that "not more than two of whom shall be adherents of the same political party." It was held that "nothing in this statute compels the appointment of even one member of any political party. It simply prevents the appointment of more than two from such party." Commenting upon the case of Atty. Gen. v. Detroit, 58 Mich. 218, 55 Am. Rep. 675, where the provision was for the appointment of two election inspectors from each of the two leading political parties, Peckham, J., said: "The law recognized but two political parties, and made it a necessity for the appointments to be made from and confined to members of those parties. An individual not a member of either was not eligible to appointment. In the case before us there is not a citizen in the state, otherwise capable, who would not be eligible in the first instance to one of these appointments. . . . There is no provision making it necessary to appoint two from the same party, or making it necessary to appoint someone who has been known up to that time as a member of any particular party." Again he says: "The purpose of the statute . . . is not to arbitrarily exclude any citizen of the state, but to provide that there shall be more than one party or interest represented." The opinion in the Rogers Case seems very strongly to support the view that the act in question now violates the Constitution. The case of People, Woods, v. Crissey, 91 N. Y. 616, cannot be deemed to confuse the present discussion. The act confined the vote of each alderman for police commissioners to one of the two to be chosen, so that the minority would be sure to elect one. The common council had already acted upon the appointments and the court refused to pass upon the restriction in the act. Finch, J., observed, in that connection: "If we assume this provision to be unconstitutional, it was a nullity. . . . They [the common council] are presumed to have known the law, and had an official legal adviser. . . . They must be held then to have voted without restraint." In the case at bar, however, the appointments remain to be made, and the answers either admit that the defendants intended to comply with the provisions of the act or are silent as to the allegations of the complaint with respect to what is proposed to be done in obedience to the provisions of the act.

I perceive no force in the argument that there has been a practical construction of the Constitution given by the legislature, and acquiesced in and acted upon by the executive and administrative departments of the government. The question here is purely one of law: Is the constitutional provision referred to violated by this statute? Is the passage of such a law authorized by the Constitution? Practical construction of a law is usually accorded force when it relates to the business conducted by the departments of the state government, and when the legislation depended upon to establish it has been clear and uniform in character for a long period of years. But, to use Judge Cooley's language, "acquiescence for no length of time can legalize a clear usurpation of power where the people have plainly expressed their will in the Constitution, and appointed judicial tribunals to enforce it." The question before us is not one of legislative policy in relation to the business of state government. It is whether the legislature has the power to interfere with the local concerns of a municipality, and by arbitrary methods to prevent majority rule in the selection of local officers. In the presence of the constitutional provision, is it not an assumption of a power, neither expressly granted nor to be implied? The question is no less than this: Having a written Constitution, shall we, and may we, disregard one of its commands, and, though the court is set as the people's bulwark against legislation which contravenes constitutional provisions, shall it aid the legislature when overstepping the limits assigned to its action? We cannot dispose of the question as one of legislative discretion; for, if we construe away such an express provision, upon however so plausible a theory, we open the door to future attacks upon the fundamental law, which underlies the structure of the state.

It is argued, however, that the objectionable clauses can be stricken out as null and void, and that the statute may remain valid to the extent of conferring power on the common council to appoint police commissioners. I do not see how that may be done, within any correct or salutary application of a rule which is frequently resorted to to uphold the acts of the legislative department of government. It is only applicable where not only that which is vicious in the law is so distinct as to permit of being severed from the rest, but where, the severance being made, enough remains to effectuate the object which the legislature had in view. It will not do, to save legislative enactments from annulment, to strike out provisions which so clearly express the intention of the legislature as to characterize the purpose of the act, and make their presence essential to the existence of the statute. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (*178), has so well expressed himself on this point that I will repeat his words: "If its purpose is to accomplish a single object only, and some of its provisions are void, the whole must fail, unless sufficient remains to effect the object without the aid of the invalid portion. And, if they are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant the belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and, if all could not be carried into effect the legislature would not pass the residue independently, then, if some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional, or connected must fall with them." This case falls within the class of cases thus referred to. This is not a new scheme for the creation of a municipal body of police commissioners. This statute was intended to amend the existing law upon the subject of a police commission, and it is perfectly plain, upon its reading, that what was aimed at was to remove from office the present four commissioners and all of their subordinates, except "the person who was senior captain on January 1, 1896," and to compel the substitution, as commissioners, of four persons, who would be representatives of two certain political organizations. If we eliminate the prescribed methods for the accomplishment of this purpose, we emasculate the legislative act, and it cannot seriously be contended that then there would remain any such law as was intended to be enacted by the legislature. In the performance of the duty of endeavoring to uphold the validity of a legislative act the court may not carve out from its provisions such as would make a law, to which the judicial approval might be given, unless the law then be such as can be deemed to have been within the contemplation of the legislature. In other words, the court is not to make a law for the people, but to uphold one which its representatives have enacted; and its duty in that direction, where provisions are found which are antagonistic to any of the constitutional guaranties, is to see if by their excision the main object of the enactment can be preserved. If that object constitutes an evident interference with constitutional rights, if it can only be effectuated through unconstitutional provisions, then the court can do nothing, and must pronounce its condemnation of the statute as a whole. The recent case of Re New York & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 540, furnishes an illustration. There the act was in amendment of various acts, the original of which provided for a single scheme to construct a bridge over the East river. The act, however, contained many provisions of an extraordinary nature, and foreign to that single purpose, which empowered the construction of indefinite extensions by way of approaches, connections with railroad companies, and consolidations with other corporations. It was held that these were void provisions, and, under the rule, separable from those which were lawful, and that what remained was capable of being executed as complete in itself. Here, however, one scheme runs through the act, and towards its accomplishment provisions have been enacted which are interdependent, and without which the scheme falls. The very language of the 1st section makes the birth of a new commission to depend upon a definite and prescribed action being taken, and it is not reasonably conceivable that the legislature would ever have passed this statute without its particular mechanism for the formation of a new police commission from the certain political materials allowed to be used. I quote the language of the present chief judge in Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y., at page 241, 7 L. R. A. 134: "Where the court can judicially see that the legislature only intended the statute to be enforced in its entirety, and that by rejecting part the general purpose of the statute would be defeated, the court, if compelled to defeat the main purpose of the statute, will not strive to save any part." The main purpose of this statute was to bring about the appointment of a new police commission in such a way as that its body will be equally composed from two certain political elements dominated for the time in the common council. We cannot assume that the legislature would have passed this act except as a whole, and therefore it is our duty, for the reasons assigned, to declare it to be unconstitutional and void.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

O'Brien, J., concurring:

This action was brought by the plaintiffs, who are residents and taxpayers of the city of Albany, to enjoin the common council of that city from proceeding to execute and carry out a statute passed during the last session of the legislature, which, in effect, removes the present police force from office and provides for the organization of a new one. The act is chapter 427 of the Laws of 1896, and by its title and provisions amends chapter 77 of the Laws of 1870, and also amends or repeals various other statutes relating to the municipal government of that city and to the organization and government of the police force therein.

It is alleged in the complaint that this act is in conflict with the Constitution of the state, and therefore void, and that proceedings on the part of the common council in execution of its various provisions would be illegal official acts, within the meaning of the statute, which should be enjoined by the courts.

On a trial of the issues at special term the action was sustained, and the judgment there pronounced has been affirmed by the appellate division of the same court. The controversy involves important principles concerning the right of local self government in cities and the individual and political rights of the citizen. These questions always open a very wide field of discussion, the materials for which are to be found in abundance in historical and judicial records. The provisions of our Constitution on these subjects, which it is claimed have been violated in the passage of this act, are, as is well known, but the expression in brief and comprehensive language of general principles of remote origin, the development and recognition of which required centuries of discussion and civil strife before they were adopted here as the fundamental law. Hence, when questions arise for determination concerning their true meaning and interpretation, the nature of the case permits a very wide range of discussion based upon historical facts by means of which principles are traced to their source and origin, and their progress and application marked, from time to time, until finally embodied, as they have been, in our written Constitution.

The particular questions presented by this appeal have been illustrated, both at the bar and in the opinion of the court below, by ample materials drawn from this source. We can add little of any value to what has been said upon this feature of the argument in the decision now under review, and we can safely and properly leave that branch of the discussion where it was placed by the learned judge who spoke for the majority in the court below. Assuming, without further argument, that the leading and fundamental principles there stated with respect to individual rights and local self-government are correct,—and there is very little, if any, dispute in this respect between counsel,—it remains to apply them to the provisions of this bill. What has been frequently called the "political tendency of the Constitution" is not always to be found expressed in words, but is to be derived from acknowledged principles of government that existed long before its adoption, and are to be implied from the general language and evident purpose and scope of particular provisions.

The principal objections to the bill are founded upon the provisions of the 1st section, which amends § 3 of the act of 1870, and reads as follows: "Sec. 3. The police board of the city of Albany shall consist of four police commissioners, not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party or organization, and who shall be chosen and hold office as hereinafter provided. On the 1st Monday after the passage of this act, the common council will meet at 8 o'clock in the evening in the common council chamber and shall proceed to elect four persons, residents and freeholders in the city as such police commissioners, and for the purpose of such meeting the members attending shall constitute a quorum. Each member of the common council shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of such persons, and the four persons receiving the highest number of votes shall be such police commissioners. The common council shall not transact any other business until the said four police commissioners are elected. The commissioners so appointed shall hold office as such until the 1st day of February, 1898. During the month of January, 1898, and in each and every second year thereafter, the common council shall meet and proceed in like manner to elect four police commissioners, who shall hold office for two years from the 1st day of February following. If a vacancy shall occur in said board of police commissioners otherwise than by expiration of term, it shall be filled by appointment by the mayor upon the written recommendation of a majority of the members of the common council belonging to the same political party or organization as the police commissioner whose office shall become vacant. No person is eligible to the office of police commissioner unless at the time of his election he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest or the next highest representation in the common council." There are some other provisions of the act which will be referred to hereafter, but this section is the basis of nearly all the constitutional objections which have been urged against the bill. At the date of its passage, on the 30th of April, 1896, and at the time of the adoption of the present Constitution, and for a long time before, the common council was the regularly organized legislative and governing body of the city, composed of nineteen aldermen, elected from the different wards by the electors. There was then, and had been for many years, a board of police commissioners, composed of the mayor and four citizens, nominated by him and confirmed by the common council, and upon this board the government of the police force devolved. It is clear that it was the purpose of the act in question to abolish this board, and to substitute another in its place, and, as will be seen hereafter, to disband the whole police force, and to create a new one. We are not concerned so much with the justice or wisdom of this legislation as we are with the methods through which it was to be carried into execution. The purpose of the legislature was to be attained through a board of police commissioners to be created under the act, and composed of two members from each of the political parties having the highest and the next highest representation in the common council, and the last clause of the section declares in terms that no citizen outside these two political organizations is eligible to the office.

The first objection urged against the validity of the act is that it violates § 1 of art. 1 of the Constitution, which declares that "no member of this state shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers;" and also § 1 of art. 13, prescribing the oath to be taken by all officers, and providing that "no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification for any office of public trust." At the expiration of the term of office of the commissioners created by the act, their places are to be filled by the same process, and, in case of a temporary vacancy, it must be filled by the mayor, upon the written recommendation of a majority of the common council belonging to the same political party or organization as the police commissioner whose office shall become vacant. It is plain that the legislature has taken every possible precaution to exclude for all time to come any person from holding the office, either for a full term or to fill a temporary vacancy, who is not a member of one of the political parties designated in the act. When the validity of such legislation is brought in question, it is not necessary to show that it falls appropriately within some express written prohibition contained in the Constitution. The implied restraints of the Constitution upon legislative power may be as effectual for its condemnation as the written words, and such restraints may be found either in the language employed or in the evident purpose which was in view and the circumstances and historical events which led to the enactment of the particular provision as a part of the organic law. A written Constitution must be interpreted as the paramount law of the land according to its spirit and the intent of its framers, as indicated by its terms. In this sense it is just as obligatory upon the legislature as upon other departments of the government or upon individual citizens. People, Bolton, v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50.

When the two sections of the Constitution above referred to are read together, and all are read in the light of the historical events and notorious abuses of power which led to their insertion in the Constitution, it cannot, I think, be doubted that they are broad enough in their terms, and that they were in fact intended, to prevent the enactment of laws proscribing any class of citizens as ineligible to hold office by reason of political opinions or party affiliations. The section of the Constitution last cited comprehends more than a mere prohibition of test oaths, such as are familiar to the student of English history. It deprives the legislature not only of all power to exact any other oath, but also any other declaration or test as a qualification for office. That the statute under consideration does prescribe a political test as a qualification, and makes party adhesion a condition, of holding office, cannot well be denied. It not only, in effect, requires the four commissioners to be divided equally between the two political parties, but in terms brands every other citizen, except those who are members of the two parties, as ineligible to hold the office. The courts of this state have not passed upon the validity of a statute containing a disqualifying clause like the one in question, but principles have been established which plainly lead to the conclusion that such enactments are destructive of local self-government and individual rights. That is plainly the result of the discussion in the case of Barker v. People, 3 Cow. 686, 15 Am. Dec. 822, in which the principles embodied in these clauses of the Constitution were stated and explained.

In other states, with constitutional restrictions identical in scope and purpose, statutes containing similar provisions to these now un-

that direction, where provisions are found which are antagonistic to any of the constitutional guaranties, is to see if by their excision the main object of the enactment can be preserved. If that object constitutes an evident interference with constitutional rights, if it can only be effectuated through unconstitutional provisions, then the court can do nothing, and must pronounce its condemnation of the statute as a whole. The recent case of Re New York & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 540, furnishes an illustration. There the act was in amendment of various acts, the original of which provided for a single scheme to construct a bridge over the East river. The act, however, contained many provisions of an extraordinary nature, and foreign to that single purpose, which empowered the construction of indefinite extensions by way of approaches, connections with railroad companies, and consolidations with other corporations. It was held that these were void provisions, and, under the rule, separable from those which were lawful, and that what remained was capable of being executed as complete in itself. Here, however, one scheme runs through the act, and towards its accomplishment provisions have been enacted which are interdependent, and without which the scheme fails. The very language of the 1st section makes the birth of a new commission to depend upon a definite and prescribed action being taken, and it is not reasonably conceivable that the legislature would ever have passed this statute without its particular mechanism for the formation of a new police commission from the certain political materials allowed to be used. I quote the language of the present chief judge in Lorton v. Steele, 119 N. Y., at page 241, 7 L. R. A. 134: "Where the court can judicially see that the legislature only intended the statute to be enforced in its entirety, and that by rejecting part the general purpose of the statute would be defeated, the court, if compelled to defeat the main purpose of the statute, will not strive to save any part." The main purpose of this statute was to bring about the appointment of a new police commission in such a way as that its body will be equally composed from two certain political elements dominated for the time in the common council. The courts of this state have not passed upon the validity of a statute containing a disqualifying clause like the one in question, but principles have been established which plainly lead to the conclusion that such enactments are destructive of local self-government and individual rights. That is plainly the result of the discussion in the case of Barker v. People, 3 Cow. 686, 15 Am. Dec. 822, in which the principles embodied in these clauses of the Constitution were stated and explained.

In other states, with constitutional restrictions identical in scope and purpose, statutes containing similar provisions to these now under consideration were held to be void or inoperative. In the case of Baltimore v. State, Board of Police, 15 Md. 379, 74 Am. Dec. 572, the court had under consideration a provision of the city charter relating to the police board, which provided "that no Black Republican or indorser or supporter of the Helper Book shall be appointed to any office under said board." The reasoning of the court in that case sustains the conclusion that the judicial department will not give effect to such disqualifications when interposed by the legislature against the right of any citizen to hold office if conferred upon him by the appointing power. The supreme court of Michigan held that a statute providing that the members of a board should be selected in equal numbers from the two political parties represented in the common council was in conflict with a similar provision of the Constitution of that state in that it disqualified all other citizens from holding the office, and prescribed party adhesion or attachment to certain political opinions as a test for holding office in addition to the constitutional oath. People, Le Roy, v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103; Atty. Gen. v. Detroit, 58 Mich. 218, 55 Am. Rep. 675. The same result was declared by the supreme court of Indiana when considering a statute which required positions in the police and fire departments in cities to be filled by selection from the two leading political parties in these cities. Evansville v. State, Blend, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93. The vice which the courts found in all these statutes was that they prescribed a test based upon political opinions for appointees to office, and disqualified all whose political views did not conform to such test. In these cases it was fairly shown that legislation of this character is in conflict with the letter and spirit of the constitutional provisions referred to, and with the fundamental principles of free government. They can be safely followed in disposing of the same features in this case.

The legislature of this state has no power to enact a law which proscribes any class of citizens as ineligible to hold public office on account of political belief or party affiliations, and consequently, the last clause of the section of the bill in question violates the provisions of the Constitution referred to, and is void. The learned counsel for the defense contends that this provision, if held to be invalid, may be eliminated from the act, and the remainder permitted to stand; but, when that provision is excised, nothing would remain in the bill to require the appointment of adherents of either of the parties named. There would, indeed, be a prohibition against appointing more than two persons from any political party, but nothing whatever to require the appointees to belong to any party. The common council would then be at liberty to make the selections from that class of independent citizens who were not adherents of any party. This, however, would defeat one of the main purposes of the bill. When the several provisions are carefully read together, it is quite manifest that it was the intention to divide the power of the police department and the police force itself equally between the two political parties designated, and the exclusion of all other persons as ineligible to be members of the board was a necessary means to the accomplishment of that end. The principle of a division of the board and the whole police force equally between the two parties is so firmly imbedded in the act, and so inseparably connected with all of its provisions, that it cannot be omitted without frustrating the fundamental purpose which was in view. When the statute is so reduced as to permit the common council to constitute the board from independent citizens, not members of either party, it would not only fail to embody the main purpose of its enactment, but it could not reasonably be asserted that the legislature would have passed it at all in that form. The purpose of the legislature to constitute a board of police commissioners and a police force equally divided between two political parties is so closely interwoven with all the provisions of the bill that the disqualifying words at the close of the first section cannot be eliminated without essentially changing the scope and operation of the law, and reducing it to a form in which it could not be said that it would have been originally passed. But the essential and operative provisions of this statute are open to still other constitutional objections, which will now be considered without reference to the clause referred to. If these objections are valid, as we think they are, then, obviously, there would remain no basis whatever for the contention that any material part of the act could be saved.

It is admitted that police commissioners are city officers within the meaning of art. 10 of § 2 of the Constitution, which reads as follows: "All city, town, and village officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the legislature shall designate for that purpose." The true interpretation, scope, and meaning of this section of the Constitution have been frequently passed upon by this court, and it has been uniformly held that its obvious purpose was to secure to the people of the cities, towns, and villages of the state the right to have the local offices administered by officers selected by themselves. It was designed to protect and give force and effect to the principle of local self-government, which has always been regarded as fundamental in our political institutions, and to be the very essence of every republican form of government. The local government, even in the smallest division of the state, is the preparatory school in which the citizen acquires the rudiments of self-government, and hence these institutions have been justly regarded as the nurseries of civil liberty. People, Williamson, v. McKinney, 53 N. Y. 374; People, Bolton, v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50; People, Townsend, v. Porter, 90 N. Y. 68; People, Crooks, v. Crooks, 53 N. Y. 648; People, Fowler, v. Bull, 48 N. Y. 57, 7 Am. Rep. 302; People, Le Roy, v. Foley, 148 N. Y. 683.

In the case of People, Bolton, v. Albertson, supra, the meaning of this provision of the Constitution was stated in the following comprehensive language: "The purpose and object of § 2 of art. 10 of the Constitution, as is very obvious, was to secure to the several recognized civil and political divisions of the state the right of local self-government, by requiring that all county, city, town, and village officers, whose election or appointment was not provided for by the Constitution, save those whose offices might thereafter be created by law, should be elected by the electors of the respective municipalities, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the legislature should designate. As to offices known and in existence at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, this provision is absolute in its prohibition of an appointment by the central government or its authority, or by anybody other than the local electors, or some local authority designated by law. Faithfully observed, and effect given to it in its spirit as well as in its letter, it effectually secures to each of the governmental divisions of the state the right of choosing or appointing its own local officers without let or hindrance from the state government, and none can be deprived of the rights and franchises thus guaranteed to all. The theory of the Constitution is that the several counties, cities, towns, and villages are, of right, entitled to choose whom they will have to rule over them; and that this right cannot be taken from them, and the electors and inhabitants disfranchised, by any act of the legislature, or of any or all the departments of the state government combined. This right of self-government lies at the foundation of our institutions, and cannot be disturbed or interfered with, even in respect to the smallest of the divisions into which the state is divided for governmental purposes, without weakening the entire foundation; and hence it is a right not only to be carefully guarded by every department of the government, but every infraction or evasion of it to be promptly met and condemned, especially by the courts, when such acts become the subject of judicial investigation." There can be no doubt that this provision of the Constitution secured to the people of the city of Albany the right of choosing or appointing their own local officers without let or hindrance from the state government. The only power that the legislature had with reference to a board of police commissioners in that city was to provide either for their election by the electors or their appointment by such agencies or authority as the people had selected to administer their local affairs. If the statute now before us, either in form or substance, violates these principles, it cannot and ought not to be upheld. It is conceded that the legislature had no power to appoint the police commissioners, and what it cannot do directly it cannot do indirectly. It cannot extend the term of office of a local officer who has been already elected, for the plain reason that for the extended period of time it is virtually an appointment. A constitutional provision cannot be evaded under color of exercising some other general power which the legislature may possess. In the case at bar the common council was designated as the authority to make the appointment of police commissioners, and so far the legislature acted within its powers. But in making the designation it had no power to so bind and restrict its action as to make that body a mere instrument of its own will. The right of the people to select their local officers cannot be evaded or disregarded by conferring the power of appointment upon some agency of their own selection, coupled with such conditions and restrictions as to make the choice virtually that of the legislature, and not of the people. It needs no argument to show that the Constitution may, in that way, be as effectually violated as if the officers to be appointed had been named in the bill; and therein lies the vicious principle which, as it seems to me, pervades the act in question. The common council of a city, like every other legislative body composed of individual members, acts in its official capacity as a unit through the vote of the majority. While the power to elect or appoint the four police commissioners under the act in question is nominally conferred upon this body or authority, yet the members are, in terms, prohibited from voting for more than two. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the whole body from voting for the first two candidates presented, but, having so voted, their powers are exhausted, and, acting in the ordinary way, only two members of the board could be elected. But the bill was evidently framed with reference to a known political situation, and for the purpose of producing a particular result. It was known that the members of the common council were divided between the two political parties, a majority belonging to one and a minority to the other. How overwhelming in point of numbers the majority may have been, or how insignificant the minority, we cannot know from the record, nor are we concerned with that question. What is more important is the fact, which plainly appears upon the face of the bill, that the minority, however feeble in point of numbers, are given the power to elect half the commissioners while the majority are given the right to elect the other half, and this division and distribution of power is carefully perpetuated for all future time, by other provisions of the bill. Of course, if such a system can be introduced into all the cities, towns, and villages of the state, local self-government must disappear, and government by the majority in the legislature will be substituted in its place. It would be difficult to suggest a contrivance better calculated to undermine and destroy the spirit of civic freedom than a statute enacted by the central authority conferring powers upon a minority equal to those which can be exercised by the majority.

The question is whether the legislature, while professing to confer power upon the common council to appoint four persons to compose a board of police commissioners, can at the same time and in the same breath empower a minority of the body, whether it be composed of one person or more, to appoint half of them. It would seem to be clear that any attempt on the part of the legislature to divide the appointing power into groups or fragments, each acting independent of the other in such a way as to enable a minority to exercise the same power as the majority, and thus, indirectly, to bring about the same result as the legislature itself would desire if it could act directly, is a violation of the spirit and purpose, if not the letter, proval. We do not decide or intimate anything against the validity of the laws under which such boards exist. When their particular provisions are questioned, or brought regularly before us, it will then be pertinent to inquire whether there is not sufficient warrant within the pale of the Constitution for their organization and existence.

The construction placed by the legislature upon limitations on its powers expressed in the Constitution, while entitled to respectful consideration, can never, of course, be conclusive. The interpretation of the Constitution is confided to the judicial, and not the legislative, department. But the argument in this case in favor of legislative construction loses much of its force by the circumstance that the recent convention to revise the Constitution framed and inserted in that instrument an entirely new provision for constituting election boards on the bipartisan plan. If the argument now made is sound, this provision was unnecessary. But it can scarcely be supposed that such an able and intelligent body, embracing as it did many of the most eminent members of the bar, introduced, debated, and passed an entirely new provision intended to confer upon the legislature a power which it already possessed. It does not follow, however, that laws which merely require the local appointing power to so constitute boards as to be nonpartisan or bipartisan are in conflict with the Constitution. So long as the people have the benefit of the judgment and discretion of the local authority in making the selection from the citizens, it may not be a fatal objection that they are restricted from selecting all the appointees from the same party. So long as the appointment is in fact as well as in form made by the mayor or common council, as the case may be, and the appointing authority is left free to act in its integrity, the mere fact that they may be prohibited from making the choice from one particular class or political party may not invalidate the statute. There is, we think, a distinction between such a statute and that now under consideration, where the local authority is so divided that its action cannot be said to represent the popular will, but rather the choice of the central authority. In any case where the selections have been made, and the persons selected have qualified and assumed the duties of the office, it may be that their official acts would not be void merely because the power under which they were appointed obeyed a statute open to some constitutional objection, in making the selection of the appointees. It is unnecessary, however, to consider or decide such questions until they are properly before us. All we mean to say is that the condemnation of this statute does not necessarily vacate the places or invalidate the official acts of city officers holding under statutes to which attention has been called, and which it is claimed are identical with that now under consideration. Curtin v. Barton, 189 N. Y. 505. We are dealing now with the provisions of the bill before us, and with nothing else. Confining the discussion and examination to that alone, we are compelled to hold that, in the particulars pointed out, it is in conflict with the Constitution.

579, which tends to sustain the provisions of this bill. That case involved no question which is really pertinent here. The question there was with respect to the power of the legislature to create the state civil service board. Since it was not claimed that they were in any sense city or local officers, the meaning of that provision of the Constitution which secures local self-government to cities was not involved. It was held that the legislature had the power to provide that not more than two of the members should belong to the same political party, but that is not the question here. The law did not require that any of them should be a member of any party, or profess any particular political faith. It proscribed no one and disfranchised no one on account of his political opinions. It simply provided that a state board, the object and purpose of which was to remove the civil service from the conflicts of politics, should not itself be or become a political machine. The bill now under consideration is framed upon widely different principles. It carefully provides that no one but a partisan shall be appointed, or can under any circumstances hold the office. In a board composed of four persons two political parties are each represented by two adherents, and in case of a disagreement, practically certain to occur, the legislature has designated a person to discharge its functions until such time as the members may be able to agree. We think that the plaintiffs were entitled to maintain the action, and that it was not prematurely brought. Williams v. Boynton, 147 N. Y. 426; Flood v. Van Wormer, Id. 284. The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Andrews, Ch. J., and Vann, J., concur in that result on the grounds:

1. That a minority of the common council is not a city authority, within the meaning of § 2 of art. 10 of the Constitution.

2. That the clause prescribing the qualification of the police commissioners is so connected with the purpose of the act and the object in view that it cannot be said that it was not an essential part of the scheme of the act, and may therefore be rejected, leaving the remainder of the act to stand.

Bartlett, J., dissenting:

This appeal presents the question whether chapter 427 of the Laws of 1896, amending existing statutes and repealing others for the purpose of reorganizing the police board and the police force of the city of Albany, is constitutional. The plaintiffs are taxpayers of the city of Albany, who secured a judgment at special term perpetually enjoining the common council of that city from electing or appointing police commissioners under the act in question, upon the ground that it is unconstitutional. The appellate division, third department, having affirmed the judgment, this appeal is taken.

The questions involved were exhaustively discussed by the courts below, and in the appellate division many general legal propositions were debated at great length, and fortified by citations of authority, concerning which there can be no real difference of opinion. It goes without saying that under our form of government the majority are to rule, and that the principle of local self-government is recognized and protected in the Constitution and statutes of the state. If the act now under review subverts either of these great principles of popular government, it must be declared unconstitutional and void. I shall refrain from discussing the propositions pressed upon the attention of the court involving general principles, and consider only the specific grounds upon which the act is attacked.

Section 1 of the act amends § 8 of chap. 77, Laws of 1870. Among other new provisions are the following: "The police board of the city of Albany shall consist of four police commissioners, not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party or organization, and who shall be chosen and hold office as hereinafter provided. . . . No person is eligible to the office of police commissioner unless, at the time of his election, he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest or next highest representation in the common council." The first quoted sentence, in so far as it limits eligibility, is not in violation of the Constitution, as this court approved similar phraseology in Rogers v. Buffalo, 128 N. Y. 173, 9 L. R. A. 579. The second quoted sentence, which practically confines eligibility to members of the two great political parties, cannot, I think, be sustained as a constitutional provision. If this latter sentence can be eliminated from the section where it is found, and still leave the act complete in itself, and capable of enforcement, it disposes of one of the principal objections relied upon by the plaintiffs, and greatly simplifies this discussion. With this unconstitutional provision stricken out, the section would provide that the number of police commissioners should be four, not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party. In the Rogers Case, 128 N. Y. 173, 9 L. R. A. 579, the civil service act was attacked on the ground that the limitation placed upon the governor in appointing commissioners, to the effect that not more than two of the three commissioners should "be adherents of the same party," rendered the act unconstitutional and void, as violating that provision of the Constitution which declares that "no member of this state shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land or judgment of his peers." Art. 1, § 1. It was also claimed to violate that part of § 6 of art. 1 which declares that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Still another ground was urged that the act was in conflict with art. 13 of § 1, as exacting an unlawful test of eligibility for public office. Judge Peckham, in delivering the opinion of the court, refers to the fact that provisions of a similar nature are contained in numerous statutes, the latest being the state railroad commission and the state board of arbitration. While no conclusive argument can be based upon such legislation, it is proper to refer to it as showing the practical construction of the Constitution which has been acquiesced in for many years. A few sentences from Judge Peckham's opinion disclose the precise ground on which this court rested its decision. The opinion, after calling attention to the fact that the legislation under review was an effort to do away with the "semi barbarous maxim" that "to the victors belong the spoils," and replace it by a system of appointment based solely upon merit, administered by a commission that could not be made up exclusively of the adherents of any one political party, goes on to say: "The appellant bases his argument upon the proposition that every citizen has a right, which is protected by the Constitution, to be regarded as eligible to hold any office, unless the Constitution has itself prescribed certain qualifications for such holding. He then asserts that the statute in question violates this constitutional right." The court, after stating that it was not necessary to pass upon the correctness of this general claim, said: "We think his right to be regarded as eligible to hold office under this statute is fully recognized when he stands on an equal footing with others of his class, all of whom are eligible.

. . . It must be remembered that there is nothing in this statute which compels the appointment of even one member of any political party. It simply prevents the appointment of more than two from such party. . . . The purpose of the provision is, of course, plain. It seeks to secure the appointment of persons who are not all of the same political views, and thus to provide for a representation in the body so appointed, of different and probably conflicting interests in the state. We cannot believe that the section in question does or was intended to operate so as to prevent the execution of such a purpose so carried out." This reasoning applies with equal force to the case at bar, and must be deemed conclusive. The fact that we are dealing now with the police commissioners of a city, and that the Rogers Case treats of a state commission, does not affect the situation. The question of the authority conferred upon the common council and its legality is not here considered, but will be dealt with later.

I come, then, to the provision that no person is eligible to the office of police commissioner unless at the time of his election he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest or next highest representation in the common council. The effect of this provision is to exclude from eligibility all persons who do not belong to one or the other of the great political parties of the country. This is the practical disfranchisement of a numerous class of citizens, and violates the Constitution (art. 1, § 1). I do not refer to legislative limitations requiring skilled knowledge in the appointee when the duties of the position call for it, as that situation would present a very different question, even if the Constitution was silent as to the qualifications of the officer. The case at bar presents an instance of the arbitrary and unexplained exclusion of a considerable number of the citizens of Albany from the class eligible to fill the office of police commissioner. No sufficient reason has been suggested for such legislation. In Barker v. People, 3 Cow. 686, 15 Am. Dec. 322, the court of errors, in construing the penal provisions of an act to suppress dueling, had occasion to discuss this question of arbitrary exclusion from eligibility to office, and uses this language (p. 708): "Eligibility, to office, therefore, belongs not exclusively or especially to electors enjoying the right of suffrage. It belongs equally to all persons whomsoever, not excluded by the Constitution. I therefore conceive it to be entirely clear that the legislature cannot establish arbitrary exclusions from office, or any general regulation requiring qualifications which the Constitution has not required."

It is further urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that this provision we are considering prescribes a political test, in violation of art. 13 of § 1 of the Constitution. As the provision is void for reasons already stated, it is unnecessary to consider this point in detail, but I am of opinion it is well taken.

We come, then, to the question whether, if this provision is eliminated from the section where it stands, the act will remain complete in itself, and be capable of enforcement. It cannot be assumed that the main object of the amendatory statute was to provide that the police commissioners should belong to one or the other of the great political parties. It is rather to be inferred that the legislature was seeking to remove the board from partisan control, and the general legal presumption is that it intended to enact a constitutional measure. So far as providing for eligibility is concerned, § 1 of the act would be complete and constitutional if permitted to stand with the sole provision that not more than two of the four commissioners should belong to the same political party or organization. The general scope and object of the act would not be in any way impaired by this change. This court has recently reaffirmed the well-settled principle that, where the void provisions of an act are separable from those that are lawful, and that which remains is capable of being executed, it may be treated as constitutional. Re New York & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 540, 554. The application of this principle to the case at bar leads to the elimination of the unconstitutional provision, and permits the act to be carried into effect without it.

The next ground of attack upon the act is that certain provisions of § 1 are violative of art. 10 of § 2 of the Constitution, which provides that "all city, town, and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people or appointed, as the legislature may direct." Section 1 of the act provides: "On the 1st Monday after the passage of this act the common council shall meet at 8 o'clock in the evening in the common council chamber, and shall proceed to elect four persons, residents and freeholders in the city, as such police commissioners, and for the purpose of such meeting the members attending shall constitute a quorum. Each member of the common council shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of such persons, and the four persons receiving the highest number of votes shall be such police commissioners." It was undoubtedly the intention of the legislature to designate the common council as a body, to appoint the police commissioners under this act in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution just quoted. While it does not seem to be seriously questioned that the common council is a city authority under the Constitution, it is insisted that the legislature had no power to direct or restrict its action in the appointment of police commissioners. As the Constitution authorizes the legislature to impose this new duty of appointing the police commissioners upon the common council, it seems reasonable that it should prescribe the details of procedure, provided it does not deprive the appointing authority of the power to act in the premises. Has the common council, in any proper legal sense, been deprived of the power conferred upon it by the act in question? The plaintiffs insist that it has, in several important particulars.

The first point made is that the common council, in this one instance, is deprived of the power to act as a collective official body in the usual manner. This point refers to the provision of § 1, already quoted, requiring the common council to meet at a time and place designated; and further enacts that "for the purposes of such meeting the members attending shall constitute a quorum." The very obvious reason for this provision as to quorum was to secure prompt action, and prevent obstructive tactics on the part of those aldermen who might be opposed to carrying this act into effect. Full notice of this meeting appears on the face of the act, and every alderman was at liberty to take part in the action of the common council, if he saw fit to attend. It was competent for the legislature, "for the purposes of such meeting," to provide for a special quorum in order to compel full attendance and speedy action. It rested wholly with the aldermen to preserve the old quorum. The same line of reasoning justifies the provision that the common council should transact no other business until the police commissioners were elected.

The next point taken against the act is based on the provision of § 1, that each member of the common council shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of the four police commissioners. The argument against the validity of this provision loses much of its force by dropping out of § 1 the unconstitutional provision which limits eligibility to the members of the two great political bodies. We then have an act which provides, with the sanction of this court speaking in the Rogers Case, 123 N. Y. 173, 9 L. R. A. 579, that only two of the four police commissioners shall belong to the same political party. If this salutary principle, approved by this court, is to be carried out by appropriate legislation, why may not a member of the common council be restricted in his vote to two of the candidates, in order to secure that result, precisely as the governor was limited to naming but two adherents of any one political party in making his appointment of civil service commissioners with the approval of this court in the Rogers Case? If the effort to constitute public boards to some extent nonpartisan or bipartisan by legislation that makes it impossible for all the members to belong to one political party or organization is commendable, and approved by this court as constitutional, why are not minor provisions in an act calculated to accomplish the desired result not only necessary, but legal? With what propriety or logic can it be said in the case at bar that the common council of the city of Albany, and every member thereof is vested with the indefeasible legal right to vote for all four of the police commissioners, thereby defeating the will of the legislature as constitutionally expressed, and rendering impossible the creation of a nonpartisan board? The legislature has not invaded the right of its constitutional agent to appoint this board. With the act stripped of the provision confining eligibility to members of the two great political parties, the common council is free to select its board of police commissioners from the entire body of freeholders in the city of Albany, subject only to the constitutional restraints imposed by the act in order to secure a nonpartisan board. The appellants have urged the argument of practical construction with great earnestness, and insist that years of legislative interpretation of the Constitution and the practical construction given to a statute by the public officers of the state, and acted upon by the people thereof, are decisive in case of doubt. People, Williams, v. Dayton, 55 N. Y. 387, 377; People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 337; People, Einfeld, v. Murray, 149 N. Y. 387, 83 L. R. A. 344.

I am not able, within the reasonable limits of this dissenting opinion, to examine the numerous statutes and precedents to which we have been referred, although I do not fail to recognize their persuasive force; but, for reasons already stated, I think it was competent for the legislature to provide that each member of the common council should be entitled to vote for not more than two of the police commissioners, and in so doing it did not violate the principle of local self-government, but carried out the bipartisan policy approved by this court.

I will only state my conclusions as to some of the remaining points argued at the bar.

Objection is made to the provision that, if a vacancy shall occur in the board of police commissioners, otherwise than by expiration of term, it shall be filled by appointment by the mayor upon the written recommendation of a majority of the members of the common council belonging to the same political party or organization as the police commissioner whose office shall become vacant. Unless some mode of procedure is provided to maintain the nonpartisan character of the board in filling vacancies, the purpose of the act in this regard might easily be defeated. Having that end in view, I see no objection to the provision under consideration.

Attack is made on the provision in § 4 of the act that, in case of a failure of the board to appoint a chief of police, then the senior captain of police, on January 1, 1896, shall act as such, and possess all the powers and perform all the duties of the chief of police, and receive the salary of chief of police, until the board shall make an appointment. In case of the failure of the board to appoint the captains or sergeants provided for by this act, then it is the duty of the chief or the acting chief, "to assign members of the police force to perform such duties until the board shall make such appointment." The plaintiffs claim that when the senior captain is given the power of chief of police he is given new powers and invested with the duties and emoluments of a distinctively new office, in direct hostility to the command of the organic law. This is not the effect of the provision as to the senior captain's duties in case the board failed to appoint a chief of police. No new office is created. The duties of the chief of police are devolved upon the senior captain in a certain emergency, which might arise in a board consisting of four members, if tied, as to the appointment of a chief of police. The senior captain was to act only during an interregnum, if at all, in order to preserve the efficiency of the force in case the police board failed to act promptly for any reason. A provision like this, seeking to guard against a mere possible danger, is in no legal sense an appointment to public office by the legislature. It is no more, in legal effect, than saying that, when a regular officer is disqualified to act in a given case, some other official may discharge his duties on that occasion. Re Hathaway's Will, 71 N. Y. 288.

The point is made that the provision that no person shall be eligible to appointment on the police force who is over forty years of age is in violation of the civil service provisions of the Constitution. It is a common practice in military and police organizations not to receive new members who are over a certain specified age. This is supposed to conduce to the efficiency of the force, and any reasonable legislation in this direction is valid.

The other points raised on the briefs have been considered, but will not be discussed. I am clearly of opinion that the act under consideration is constitutional and valid, except as to the clause limiting eligibility to the office of police commissioner to membership in the two great political parties, which should be eliminated therefrom. The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and judgment ordered for defendants in conformity with this opinion.

Martin, J., dissenting:

The only question involved in this case is the constitutionality of chapter 437 of the Laws of 1896. The principal question relates to the validity of § 1 of that act, which amends § 3 of title 12 of chap. 77 of the Laws of 1870. Whether this act was politic or impolitic, wise or unwise, is not to be considered by this court, as the authority to determine those questions is vested in the legislature alone. The power of the legislature to pass such laws as it may, in its discretion, deem proper, and for the best interests of the state, or any division thereof, or of the whole or any portion of its inhabitants, has been conferred upon the senate and assembly, and is absolute and unlimited, unless in conflict with some provision of the Federal or state Constitution. Const. art. 3, § 1. While the people of the state are sovereign and originally possessed the sole power of legislation, yet they have delegated that power to the senate and assembly, except as they are restricted by constitutional limits.

longs not exclusively or especially to electors enjoying the right of suffrage. It belongs equally to all persons whomsoever, not excluded by the Constitution. I therefore conceive it to be entirely clear that the legislature cannot establish arbitrary exclusions from office, or any general regulation requiring qualifications which the Constitution has not required."

It is further urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that this provision we are considering prescribes a political test, in violation of art. 13 of § 1 of the Constitution. As the provision is void for reasons already stated, it is unnecessary to consider this point in detail, but I am of opinion it is well taken.

We come, then, to the question whether, if this provision is eliminated from the section where it stands, the act will remain complete in itself, and be capable of enforcement. It cannot be assumed that the main object of the amendatory statute was to provide that the police commissioners should belong to one or the other of the great political parties. It is rather to be inferred that the legislature was seeking to remove the board from partisan control, and the general legal presumption is that it intended to enact a constitutional measure. So far as providing for eligibility is concerned, § 1 of the act would be complete and constitutional if permitted to stand with the sole provision that not more than two of the four commissioners should belong to the same political party or organization. The general scope and object of the act would not be in any way impaired by this change. This court has recently reaffirmed the well-settled principle that, where the void provisions of an act are separable from those that are lawful, and that which remains is capable of being executed, it may be treated as constitutional. Re New York & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 540, 554. The application of this principle to the case at bar leads to the elimination of the unconstitutional provision, and permits the act to be carried into effect without it.

The next ground of attack upon the act is that certain provisions of § 1 are violative of art. 10 of § 2 of the Constitution, which provides that "all city, town, and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people or appointed, as the legislature may direct." Section 1 of the act provides: "On the 1st Monday after the passage of this act the common council shall meet at 8 o'clock in the evening in the common council chamber, and shall proceed to elect four persons, residents and freeholders in the city, as such police commissioners, and for the purpose of such meeting the members attending shall constitute a quorum. Each member of the common council shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of such persons, and the four persons receiving the highest number of votes shall be such police commissioners." It was undoubtedly the intention of the legislature to designate the common council as a body, to appoint the police commissioners under this act in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution just quoted. While it does not seem to be seriously questioned that the common council is a city authority under the Constitution, it is insisted that the legislature had no power to direct or restrict its action in the appointment of police commissioners. As the Constitution authorizes the legislature to impose this new duty of appointing the police commissioners upon the common council, it seems reasonable that it should prescribe the details of procedure, provided it does not deprive the appointing authority of the power to act in the premises. Has the common council, in any proper legal sense, been deprived of the power conferred upon it by the act in question? The plaintiff's insist that it has, in several important particulars.

The first point made is that the common council, in this one instance, is deprived of the power to act as a collective official body in the usual manner. This point refers to the provision of § 1, already quoted, requiring the common council to meet at a time and place designated; and further enacts that "for the purposes of such meeting the members attending shall constitute a quorum." The very obvious reason for this provision as to quorum was to secure prompt action, and prevent obstructive tactics on the part of those aldermen who might be opposed to carrying this act into effect. Full notice of this meeting appears on the face of the act, and every alderman was at liberty to take part in the action of the common council, if he saw fit to attend. It was competent for the legislature, "for the purposes of such meeting," to provide for a special quorum in order to compel full attendance and speedy action. It rested wholly with the aldermen to preserve the old quorum. The same line of reasoning justifies the provision that the common council should transact no other business until the police commissioners were elected.

The next point taken against the act is based on the provision of § 1, that each member of the common council shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of the four police commissioners. The argument against the validity of this provision loses much of its force by dropping out of § 1 the unconstitutional provision which limits eligibility to the members of the two great political bodies. We then have an act which provides, with the sanction of this court speaking in the Rogers Case, 123 N. Y. 178, 9 L. R. A. 579, that only two of the four police commissioners shall belong to the same political party. If this salutary principle, approved by this court, is to be carried out by appropriate legislation, why may not a member of the common council be restricted in his vote to two of the candidates, in order to secure that result, precisely as the governor was limited to naming but two adherents of any one political party in making his appointment of civil service commissioners with the approval of this court in the Rogers Case? If the effort to constitute public boards to some extent nonpartisan or bipartisan by legislation that makes it impossible for all the members to belong to one political party or organization is two persons for such office. Chapter 515 of the Laws of 1874 related to the election of aldermen in the city of New York, and provided that three should be elected for each ward except the eighth, but that no voter should vote for more than two. The same principle has existed in statutes relating to the appointment of election officers since the organization of our state government, although not protected by any constitutional provision before the amendment of 1894, the obvious purpose of which was to forbid any change in these time-honored laws. The statutes already referred to sufficiently show the course of legislation in this state upon the subject, and render the examination of other statutes quite unnecessary.

If all the various statutes of the state relating to the government of cities which contain provisions involving the principle contained in the statute under consideration are to be held void, it must result in a general derangement of the affairs of all the cities in the state, and lead to boundless confusion in matters relating to their government. "An unconstitutional act is as if it had never been passed by the legislature. It can confer no rights and afford no protection." Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige, 88 N. Y. 178, 190, 38 Am. Rep. 407; Cooley, Const. Lim. 188, Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 358. Relying upon the validity of this principle, commissions for the police, fire, and other departments of the various cities have been organized under statutes containing the identical principle contained in this, which must be regarded and treated as invalid if this statute is held void for that reason. If the various statutes under which such commissions have been appointed are invalid, it must necessarily follow that all the appointments made by such commissions are also invalid, and, consequently, all the members of the police force, fire and other departments of such cities, and all officers appointed by these various commissions, are without title to their office, are entitled to no compensation, and may be held liable for many acts they have performed in reliance upon the integrity of the provisions of these various statutes. It is to be presumed that this court will adhere to the principle of the decision in this case, and it must apply to every such city in the state, and be regarded as condemning all such provisions in the various statutes under which they were incorporated or by which they are governed. Hence the question of their validity is a far-reaching one, and is of great importance, involving, as it does, the governmental affairs of nearly every city in the state. Therefore it should not be hastily or inconsiderately held invalid, whatever may have been the purpose which induced the passage of this particular act. Its purpose must be presumed to have been proper, especially in view of the fact that the police and fire commissioners for that city were elected nearly thirty years since, under a statute which included the principle contained in this. Not only is every intendment in favor of the validity of statutes, but no motive, purpose, or intent can be imputed to the legislature in the enactment of a law other than such as are apparent upon the face of and gathered from the law itself. People, Bolton, v. Albert- son, 55 N. Y. 54. Moreover, if the purpose which induced its passage was improper, still the responsibility is not ours, but rests elsewhere. Unless these provisions of the statute are plainly and clearly in substantial conflict with some particular provision of the Constitution, this court should not declare them void. There should be no reasonable doubt of the unconstitutionality of a statute before it should be annulled by judicial action, and all doubtful questions should be resolved in favor of the validity of the act, or, as was said by Allen, J., in People, Bolton, v. Albertson, supra: "A law which has received the sanction of the legislature and the approval of the executive should only be held void, as repugnant to the Constitution, when the repugnancy is clearly demonstrated."

From 1867 to 1896 the legislature has almost yearly passed statutes involving in some form the general principle contained in the statute under consideration, which have been approved by the executive and acted upon by the different municipalities without dissent or question. As early as 1867 that principle was applied to the election of fire commissioners in the city of Albany, and in 1873 was applied to the election of police commissioners for that city. Thus for nearly thirty years, notwithstanding the frequent changes of officers in the different municipalities, a practical construction has been given to the Constitution, so far as it affects laws containing this principle, to the effect that they are valid, and controlling as to the matters to which they relate. The practical construction given by the legislature to constitutional provisions, for many years acquiesced in and acted upon, unquestioned by the executive and administrative branches of the government, is entitled to controlling weight in its interpretation, and has almost the force of a judicial exposition. People, Williams, v. Dayton, 55 N. Y. 367, 378; People v. Home Ins. Co 92 N. Y. 328, 337; Re Washington, S. A. & P. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 443, 447; People, Knafeld, v. Murray, 149 N. Y. 367, 376, 33 L. R. A. 344. As was said by Ruger, Ch. J., in the Home Ins. Co. Case, supra: "It would now seem too late to raise a question of such importance and fraught with such dangerous consequences to those engaged in the enforcement of the laws." I think, as was in effect said by Andrews, Ch. J., in the Murray Case, supra, this legislative policy which has prevailed for so long a period, sanctioned by numerous statutes, never questioned in the courts, and acquiesced in by all departments of the state and municipal governments, is a practical construction of the provision now in question; and this construction ought not now to be disturbed. I had supposed the foregoing to be a well established rule of law, to be applied with the same certainty and uniformity as any other, and not a mere rule of convenience. If this supposition is correct, then I cannot understand why it should have been applied to sustain the excise law, and the various other statutes under consideration in the cases cited, and not in this. If there was ever a case where the principle of practical construction should be applied, manifestly this is one. Every correct principle and proper consideration require it. The confusion, derange-tions. Therefore, before a law can be declared invalid, it must be found to be in conflict with some provision of the organic law. People v. Smith, v. Fisher, 24 Wend. 215, 230; Cochran v. Van Surday, 20 Wend. 865, 882, 32 Am. Dec. 570; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 378, 480; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 202, 204; Bank of Chenango v. Brown, 26 N. Y. 467, 469; People v. Cannon, 139 N. Y. 82, 42; People, McLean, v. Flagg, 46 N. Y. 401, 404; Rogers v. Buffalo, 128 N. Y. 173, 181, 9 L. R. A. 579. The act under consideration, like every other statute, must be upheld, unless it is in plain and substantial conflict with some particular provision or provisions of the Constitution. People, Rochester v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 553, 558; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 889, 897; People, Kemmler, v. Durston, 119 N. Y. 569, 577, 7 L. R. A. 715; People, Carter, v. Rice, 135 N. Y. 484, 16 L. R. A. 886.

The respondents contend that the provisions of this statute which declare that not more than two of the police commissioners shall belong to the same party or organization, that each member of the common council shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of such persons, and that no person is eligible to the office, unless, at the time of his election, he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest or next highest representation in the common council, are in contravention of the Constitution of this state, and consequently void. The general principle contained in these provisions is by no means new. For more than a quarter of a century the current of public opinion and of Federal and state legislation has been in the direction of establishing nonpartisan boards or commissions for the administration of Federal, state, and municipal affairs. Without particularly referring to the various statutes creating boards of commissions for the administration of the affairs of the Federal or state government, but confining our examination to a portion of the cities of the state, we find that in some form or other this principle exists in the statutes regulating the municipal affairs of a majority of them. Thus, in the city of Yonkers, four commissioners of police are appointed by the common council by ballot, and each member present can vote for only two. Laws 1873, chap. 163. In the city of Utica the mayor appoints the police and fire commissioners, two of whom are appointed from each of the two principal political parties of the state. Laws 1874, chap. 314. In the city of Elmira such commissioners are appointed by the common council, and such appointments are required to be so made that the two principal political parties represented in the council shall be equally represented. Laws 1875, chap. 370, title 8, § 103, subd. 2, as amended. The charter of the city of Binghamton requires the mayor to appoint four men commissioners, two from each of the two principal political parties of the state; and when a vacancy occurs that the common council shall appoint a successor in the same manner. Laws 1881, chap. 6, § 1. An act to establish a board of fire commissioners for the city of Rome provides that the mayor shall appoint four commissioners, two of whom shall be selected from each of the two principal political parties of the state, and at the expiration of the terms of any such commissioner, his successor shall be appointed from the political party to which the former belonged. Laws 1881, chap. 517, §§ 2, 4. The charter of the city of Lockport provides for the appointment of four police commissioners, two of whom shall be members of each of the two principal political parties. Laws 1882, chap. 48. An act to establish a police department of the city of Buffalo provides that the mayor shall appoint two citizens as commissioners of police, one from each of the two principal parties, and that in all appointments thereafter made the nonpartisan character of the board shall be preserved and maintained. Laws 1883, chap. 359, § 2. An act to increase and reorganize the police force in the city of Troy provides that the common council shall appoint two police commissioners of opposite politics, and at the expiration of their term the successor of the two whose terms of office shall expire shall be elected by ballot by the common council, but that no member of the council shall vote for more than one of such commissioners. Laws 1885, chap. 54, § 1. Chapter 79 of the Laws of 1877 provided for the reorganization of the fire department of the city of Syracuse, that such commissioners should be elected, but that no ballot should contain more than one name, and the two persons receiving the highest number of votes should be elected. Chapter 17 of the Laws of 1869 provided for the election of four police commissioners in that city, but declared that no ballot should contain more than two names. Laws 1874, chap. 542. The charter of the city of Syracuse provides for a fire commission, and also for a police commission, and that the commissioners then in office should continue to the expiration of their term, when the mayor is required to appoint as successors to such commissioners persons who shall belong to the same political party as the commissioners whom they are appointed to succeed. The provisions as to fire and police commissioners are identical. Laws 1885, chap. 26, §§ 186, 187, 205, 206. The statute establishing a board of police commissioners for the city of Watertown requires the mayor to appoint four commissioners, two from each of the two principal political parties of the state, and that the successor to any such commissioner shall be a member of the political party to which the commissioner whose office has expired belonged. Laws 1885, chap. 189, § 19. Chapter 255 of the Laws of 1870 provides for the election of four police commissioners for the city of Oswego, but that no ballot shall contain more than two names. Chapter 46 of the Laws of 1879 contains the same provision as to the election of school commissioners for that city. Chapter 197 of the Laws of 1867 provided for filling vacancies in the board of fire commissioners in the city of Albany, and that no ballot should contain more than one name. Chapter 828 of the Laws of 1880 declared that no member of the common council of the city of Troy, in electing police commissioners, should vote for more than one. Chapter 186 of the Laws of 1872 provided for the election of four police commissioners for the city of Albany, but that no voter should be entitled to vote for more than two persons for such office. Chapter 515 of the Laws of 1874 related to the election of aldermen in the city of New York, and provided that three should be elected for each ward except the eighth, but that no voter should vote for more than two. The same principle has existed in statutes relating to the appointment of election officers since the organization of our state government, although not protected by any constitutional provision before the amendment of 1894, the obvious purpose of which was to forbid any change in these time-honored laws. The statutes already referred to sufficiently show the course of legislation in this state upon the subject, and render the examination of other statutes quite unnecessary.

If all the various statutes of the state relating to the government of cities which contain provisions involving the principle contained in the statute under consideration are to be held void, it must result in a general derangement of the affairs of all the cities in the state, and lead to boundless confusion in matters relating to their government. "An unconstitutional act is as if it had never been passed by the legislature. It can confer no rights and afford no protection." Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige, 88 N. Y. 178, 190, 38 Am. Rep. 407; Cooley, Const. Lim. 188, Emdlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 858. Relying upon the validity of this principle, commissions for the police, fire, and other departments of the various cities have been organized under statutes containing the identical principle contained in this, which must be regarded and treated as invalid if this statute is held void for that reason. If the various statutes under which such commissions have been appointed are invalid, it must necessarily follow that all the appointments made by such commissions are also invalid, and, consequently, all the members of the police force, fire and other departments of such cities, and all officers appointed by these various commissions, are without title to their office, are entitled to no compensation, and may be held liable for many acts they have performed in reliance upon the integrity of the provisions of these various statutes. It is to be presumed that this court will adhere to the principle of the decision in this case, and it must apply to every such city in the state, and be regarded as condemning all such provisions in the various statutes under which they were incorporated or by which they are governed. Hence the question of their validity is a far-reaching one, and is of great importance, involving, as it does, the governmental affairs of nearly every city in the state. Therefore it should not be hastily or inconsiderately held invalid, whatever may have been the purpose which induced the passage of this particular act. Its purpose must be presumed to have been proper, especially in view of the fact that the police and fire commissioners for that city were elected nearly thirty years since, under a statute which included the principle contained in this. Not only is every intendment in favor of the validity of statutes, but no motive, purpose, or intent can be imputed to the legislature in the enactment of a law other than such as are apparent upon the face of and gathered from the law itself. People, Bolton, v. Albert- son, 55 N. Y. 54. Moreover, if the purpose which induced its passage was improper, still the responsibility is not ours, but rests elsewhere. Unless these provisions of the statute are plainly and clearly in substantial conflict with some particular provision of the Constitution, this court should not declare them void. There should be no reasonable doubt of the unconstitutionality of a statute before it should be annulled by judicial action, and all doubtful questions should be resolved in favor of the validity of the act, or, as was said by Allen, J., in People, Bolton, v. Albertson, supra: "A law which has received the sanction of the legislature and the approval of the executive should only be held void, as repugnant to the Constitution, when the repugnancy is clearly demonstrated."

From 1867 to 1896 the legislature has almost yearly passed statutes involving in some form the general principle contained in the statute under consideration, which have been approved by the executive and acted upon by the different municipalities without dissent or question. As early as 1867 that principle was applied to the election of fire commissioners in the city of Albany, and in 1873 was applied to the election of police commissioners for that city. Thus for nearly thirty years, notwithstanding the frequent changes of officers in the different municipalities, a practical construction has been given to the Constitution, so far as it affects laws containing this principle, to the effect that they are valid, and controlling as to the matters to which they relate. The practical construction given by the legislature to constitutional provisions, for many years acquiesced in and acted upon, unquestioned by the executive and administrative branches of the government, is entitled to controlling weight in its interpretation, and has almost the force of a judicial exposition. People, Williams, v. Dayton, 55 N. Y. 367, 378; People v. Home Ins. Co 92 N. Y. 828, 387; Re Washington, S. A. & P. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 442, 447; People, Evansfeld, v. Murray, 149 N. Y. 367, 376, 32 L. R. A. 844. As was said by Ruger, Ch. J., in the Home Ins. Co. Case, supra: "It would now seem too late to raise a question of such importance and fraught with such dangerous consequences to those engaged in the enforcement of the laws." I think, as was in effect said by Andrews, Ch. J., in the Murray Case, supra, this legislative policy which has prevailed for so long a period, sanctioned by numerous statutes, never questioned in the courts, and acquiesced in by all departments of the state and municipal governments, is a practical construction of the provision now in question; and this construction ought not now to be disturbed. I had supposed the foregoing to be a well established rule of law, to be applied with the same certainty and uniformity as any other, and not a mere rule of convenience. If this supposition is correct, then I cannot understand why it should have been applied to sustain the excise law, and the various other statutes under consideration in the cases cited, and not in this. If there was ever a case where the principle of practical construction should be applied, manifestly this is one. Every correct principle and proper consideration require it. The confusion, derangement, and consequent hardship that must follow the condemnation of all these statutes seem to me to demand the application of that principle in this case, if necessary to uphold this and the various other statutes authorizing the organization of commissions for the management and control of the municipal affairs of a majority of the cities of the state. The principle involved in this class of legislation has been expressly approved by this court. In the case of Rogers v. Buffalo, 123 N. Y. 178, 9 L. R. A. 579, Judge Peckham, who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, fully discussed the question of improving the public service by means of nonpartisan commissions or boards. He in strong terms commended that principle, and as strongly condemned what he termed the semibarbarous system represented by the maxim that "to the victors belong the spoils." In that opinion all the judges of this court concurred, except Ruger, Ch. J., who concurred in the result. Thus to the wisdom and propriety of this class of legislation this court seems fully committed. If the principle there commended is to be now condemned, and this class of statutes is to be held invalid, we shall take a long step backward. It will constitute a positive retreat from the position that the public affairs of the municipalities of the state should be removed from the influence of partisan politics; and, besides, it will be accompanied by the disastrous consequences already indicated, and demoralize and seriously injure the public service.

The question in the Rogers Case arose under the civil service act of 1883, which provided for the appointment of three civil service commissioners, not more than two of whom should be adherents of the same party; and it was held not to be violative of any of the provisions of the state Constitution. We have in that case a direct authority to the effect that the provision of the statute under consideration, which provides that not more than two of the four police commissioners to be appointed shall belong to the same political party or organization, is valid. Indeed, it is conceded by the respondents that, if this provision stood alone, the constitutional objections now urged against it could not be sustained. They, however, insist that the provision which follows, declaring that each member of the common council shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of such persons, and the four persons receiving the highest number of votes shall be such commissioners, is in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution. The claim now most strongly urged is that under the provisions of § 2 of art. 10 the legislature had the power to select the local authority by which the appointment should be made, but that, having conferred that power upon the common council, it must be regarded as conferring the authority upon that body as such; that it can only act as a collective, official body by the voice of its majority, and that this provision is consequently void. If by this act the legislature had selected the common council as the authority by which such appointment should be made, without any provisions as to the manner in which such commissioners should be elected, it might, perhaps, be that it could have acted only in the manner suggested. But such is not the case. It provided that in determining who should be elected such commissioners each member of the council should vote for not more than two, the practical effect of which was to carry into execution the provision that no more than two of such commissioners shall belong to the same political party or organization, on the assumption that the members constituting the common council would vote for commissioners who were members of their own party. That the legislature possessed the power to amend the charter of the city of Albany so as to define the duties and prescribe the powers of the common council, and to direct the manner in which it, as the authority of that city, should elect the police commissioners, I have no doubt. It could have provided that there should have been a two-thirds vote, a majority vote, or less. The municipality, the existence of the common council, the duties it shall perform, and all its acts of a governmental character are under the control of the legislature.

Section 1 of article 8 of the Constitution of the state authorizes the legislature to create municipal corporations by general or special acts, and to alter or repeal such acts from time to time. In People, Rochester, v. Briggs, supra, Church, Ch. J., said: "A municipal corporation is a part of the governmental machinery of the state, organized, not for the purpose of private gain, like private corporations, but for the purpose of exercising certain functions of government, within a specified locality; and it possesses such powers, and such only, as are conferred upon it by the legislature; and they are to be exercised in such form, mode, and manner, and by such agencies, as the legislature may from time to time prescribe, within the limits of the Constitution. . . . Over all its civil, political, or governmental powers the legislature is, in the nature of things, supreme and without limitation, unless restrained by the Constitution." Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, in treating of the power of the legislature over municipal corporations, says: "Over all its civil, political, or governmental powers the authority of the legislature is, in the nature of things, supreme, and without limitation, unless the limitation is found in the Constitution of the particular state."

Assuming, then, as we must, that the legislature had the power to provide in what manner the common council should discharge its duties, it had the authority to provide for the election of police commissioners in the manner pointed out by the statute. The effect of this provision was to amend the charter of the city of Albany so far as it related to the manner in which the common council should act. As there is no constitutional provision which in any way prevents the legislature from providing the manner in which that body shall act in the selection of officers, it is quite plain, I think, that this statute is not in conflict with the provision of the Constitution under consideration. It is, however, suggested that under this statute the members of the common council might all vote for only two members of the police commission, and that then their power would be spent, and only two members elected. This suggestion must, I think, be regarded as too speculative and improbable to require discussion or serious consideration. But, should that condition arise, there would, at most, be a vacancy in the office of two commissioners which might be filled in the manner pointed out in the statute. Moreover, if the statute is simply defective, it by no means follows that the whole statute must be condemned. It may be observed, in passing, that the question whether the police commissioners to be thus appointed were officers of the city within the meaning of the provisions of § 2 of art. 10 may not be entirely free from doubt. Fire Department of New York v. Atlas S. S. Co. 106 N. Y. 566.

It has been intimated that, while the legislature possesses the power to select and confer upon the authorities of a city the right to appoint all city officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by the Constitution, yet it has no power to in any way limit that right by providing the method in which such appointments shall be made by the city authorities, or the qualifications which such appointees shall possess. In People, Nechamens v. Warden of City Prison, 144 N. Y. 529, 27 L. R. A. 718, the validity of chapter 602 of the Laws of 1892 was considered by this court, and it was held to be constitutional and valid. By the provisions of that act it was made the duty of the mayor of each of the cities of the state to appoint a board for the examination of plumbers of each city, to consist of five persons; two to be master plumbers of not less than ten years' experience, one to be a journeyman plumber of like experience, and the others to be the chief inspector of plumbing and drainage of the board of health, and the chief engineer having charge of sewers in such city. Thus, by that act the legislature in effect prescribed not only the qualifications which the appointees should possess, but, as to some, practically who should be appointed. It is possible that that decision may be sustained upon the ground that those officers fell within the last sentence of that section of the Constitution which provides that all officers whose office may hereafter be created may be elected or appointed, as the legislature may direct, although not placed on that ground. It seems to me, however, that the doctrine of that case bears upon the question, and tends to sustain the validity of the statute under consideration, so far as this immediate question is concerned.

In the Rogers Case, supra, it was argued that the civil service act, which was then under examination, was violative of this section of the Constitution. The provisions of that statute required the mayor to prepare certain rules under which the city officers were to be selected, which were to go into effect only when approved by the state civil service commission, and that no officer or clerk should be appointed, and no person should be permitted to enter or be promoted into the classes established, until he had passed the required examination. It was contended that the power conferred upon the public authorities of the city to appoint a street or health inspector of that city was limited by such requirement, and hence the act of 1893 was void, as being in contravention of § 2 of art. 10 of the Constitution. Thus, by that act, the authority to appoint city officers was limited to an extent which required them to be examined under the provisions of that statute, and under rules to be approved by the civil service commission; but it was held that there was no such limitation upon the rights of the local authorities to appoint such officers as to bring the statute within the condemnation of that provision of the Constitution. It will be remembered that that statute was passed before the amendment to the Constitution.

Again, it is a well-established rule of construction that before a statute should be declared invalid it should appear that it is in plain and substantial conflict with some particular provision of the Constitution. Thus the conflict must not only be plain, but it must be substantial as well. The statute must be affected by the provision of the Constitution relied upon in some substantial and material particular. If that portion of a statute which is relied upon as a basis for its condemnation is not essential to the accomplishment of its general purpose, the statute cannot be said to be in substantial conflict with the Constitution. The fact that a statute may be in conflict with the fundamental law in some slight or unessential particular forms no just basis for its condemnation. In other words, unless the provision of a statute will effect a result which will subvert the object and frustrate the purpose of the Constitution, it should be held valid. "The substance of a thing is the essential or important part; the material thing; that in and for which a thing chiefly exists." See Substance, Abbott, Law Dict.; Anderson, Law Dict.; Rapalje & L. Law Dict.

It is manifest from a reading of this statute that the purpose of this provision was merely to carry into effect the former provision that not more than two of the commissioners should belong to the same political party. It was the means devised by the legislature to carry into execution what is conceded to be a valid provision of the statute. The dominant purpose of that provision was to establish for the city of Albany a nonpartisan board of commissioners. Whether the means to secure that result was a provision that each member of the common council should not vote for more than two of such commissioners, or that each member should vote for the four commissioners, only two of whom should belong to the same political party, was at most a mere matter of detail by which to accomplish the chief purpose of the act. If this provision had not been included in the statute, manifestly the latter would have been the plan by which the purpose of the legislature would have been carried into effect. That the statute has provided a different method to accomplish the same purpose is unessential, and the provision cannot be properly said to be one of substance. Indeed, that the aldermen or members of the common council as such were authorities of the city within the meaning of the Constitution, I have no doubt. People v. Raymond, 87 N. Y. 428, 431; People, Sherwood, v. State Bd. of Canvassers, 129 N. Y. 566, 14 L. R. A. 646.

The respondents also contend that the provision of this statute which declares that no person is eligible to the office of police commissioner unless, at the time of his election, he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest or next highest representation in the common council, is void under the provisions of the Constitution of the state. Many of the statutes to which we have already referred contain a similar provision, and hence the doctrine of practical construction is applicable, and this provision may be sustained. Independent of that doctrine, I might be inclined to agree with the contention of the respondents. But I do not deem it necessary to determine the question whether that provision is valid or invalid. If the latter, I am of the opinion that it may be eliminated from the act, and still the apparent and manifest object and purpose of the legislature be effected by the statute as it would then remain. It seems to be well settled that where only a part of a statute is unconstitutional that fact does not authorize the court to declare the remainder void, unless the provisions are so dependent and connected with the object or purpose of the act that it cannot be presumed that the legislature would have passed it without including such void provision. The fact that the legislature may have erred in a matter of detail does not defeat the whole act where, when the unconstitutional portion of the statute is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in substantial accordance with the apparent legislative intent. People, Fowler, v. Bull, 46 N. Y. 57, 69, 7 Am. Rep. 802; Gordon v. Cornes, 47 N. Y. 608, 617; People, Rochester, v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 553; People, Murphy, v. Kelly, 76 N. Y. 475, 489; Re Middletown, 82 N. Y. 196; Durges v. New York, 96 N. Y. 477; People, Angerstein, v. Kenney, Id. 294; Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L. R. A. 184; Re New York & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 540. An examination of these cases discloses the extent to which this court has proceeded in applying that rule to various statutes when they have contained unconstitutional provisions and still have been upheld as to the remainder. In many of them this court seems to have gone further than is required to sustain the statutes in question. Who can say that there is any such connection or dependence between this provision and the remainder of the statute that it must be presumed that the legislature would not have passed it with this provision eliminated, or, in other words, that it cannot be presumed that it would have passed it omitting that provision, if it had been regarded as invalid? I do not think it can be reasonably doubted that, if the legislature had supposed or understood that this provision was invalid, it would still have passed the statute without it. Nor do I think the other provisions of the statute are so connected with or dependent upon that provision that they cannot be divided without defeating the object and intent of the statute.

As has already been suggested, the controlling purpose of this statute is to provide for the appointment of four police commissioners for the city of Albany, only two of whom should belong to the same political party. If the provision that no person is eligible to the office of police commissioner, unless at the time of his election he is a member of the political party or organization having the highest or the next highest representation in the common council, were entirely blotted out, the statute, as it would then remain, would obviously carry into effect the fundamental and substantial intent and purpose of the legislature.

The respondents also contend that the provision of the statute for filling vacancies by which the mayor is permitted to appoint commissioners upon the written recommendation of a majority of the members of the council belonging to the same political party or organization as the police commissioner whose office is vacant, is also in conflict with § 2 of art. 10 of the Constitution. Section 5 of art. 10 of the Constitution provides that the legislature shall provide for filling vacancies in office. In People, Henderson, v. Snedeker, 14 N. Y. 52, 59, it was said: "The effect of this provision of the Constitution, doubtless, was to confer upon the legislature the power to provide for filling vacancies in a different manner from the existing method in case it should be deemed proper." In the case of Rogers v. Buffalo, 123 N. Y. 173, 9 L. R. A. 579, chapter 354 of the Laws of 1888 was under consideration. That statute contained a provision that any vacancy in the position of commissioner should be so filled by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, as to conform to the conditions for the first selection of such commissioner. The spirit of that provision is practically identical with that contained in the act under consideration; and that case should, I think, be regarded as an authority to the effect that such a provision is valid. I am unable to discover any provision of the Constitution with which this portion of the statute is in conflict. It is simply the means adopted by the legislature to carry into effect and continue the principal purpose of the act that no more than two of the commissioners should at any time belong to the same political party. The latter provision being professedly valid, I think the means provided to continue the condition thus created were also valid.

I am unable to find in the Constitution any provision which renders void that portion of the act which provides that, in case of a failure by the board of police commissioners to appoint the chief of police, the senior captain should act as such until the board should make an appointment. The purpose of this provision clearly was to provide for an emergency that might arise, and thus prevent the city from being without a chief of police until such appointment should be made. Its effect was to confer temporarily upon a city officer added powers, and impose upon him other duties, which he would be required to discharge while the emergency continued. That the legislature possessed the power to amend the charter of the city of Albany so as to provide that in such an emergency one of its officers should discharge other and added duties, I have no doubt. The authority of the legislature over such a municipality has already been considered, and I think it possessed the power to enact the provision under consideration, and that it is valid.

Nor do I think the provisions of § 4 of the act, which provide that no person shall be eligible to appointment as patrolman of the city who is over the age of forty years, violate the provision of § 9 of art. 5 of the Constitution, which declares: "Appointments and promo tions in the civil service of the state, and of all the civil divisions thereof, including cities and villages, shall be made according to merit and fitness to be ascertained, so far as practicable, by examinations, which, so far as practicable, shall be competitive; provided, however, that honorably discharged soldiers and sailors from the army and navy of the United States in the late Civil War, who are citizens and residents of this state, shall be entitled to preference in appointment and promotion, without regard to their standing on any list from which such appointment or promotion may be made." That provision of the statute would seem to be a proper and useful one, as it is manifest that the office of patrolman is one which requires a degree of activity, vigor, and endurance that does not usually exist in older persons. Moreover, the value of the services of a patrolman increases by experience, and hence the necessity of appointing at the outset young men to that position. The provision seems to be one that is not only proper, but necessary to secure the best service in that department. It is found in many of the charters of the cities in this state, and is not, I think, in conflict with the provision of the Constitution referred to. The purpose of that provision was to secure appointments according to merit and fitness, and not to interfere with proper provisions of the statute in regard to the qualifications that a particular officer should be required to possess. Notwithstanding that provision, I think the legislature still has the power, when necessary or proper, to provide the qualifications, such as age, residence, business and profession, which a person shall possess to entitle him to be appointed to a particular office.

The only remaining ground upon which it is claimed that this statute is invalid is that it does not strictly comply with the provisions of § 2 of art. 12 of the Constitution which require the insertion after the title of such an act of the words "Passed without the acceptance of the city." The precise words used by the Constitution were not inserted after the title in this act, but the words "Not accepted by the city" were inserted, and were manifestly intended to be in compliance with the requirements of the Constitution. While the language first stated is, in terms, required, still I do not think that the omission to use the precise words mentioned makes a statute invalid when, as in this case, words which are equivalent to those provided for are used. Such a construction of this provision would be too narrow and technical. The words used were within the spirit of the provision, although not within its letter, and were, I think, sufficient.

These considerations lead me irresistibly to the conclusion that the judgment in this action should be reversed, and hence I am unable to concur in the result reached by a majority of the court.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

T. J. ROBINSON.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A presumption that a girl became unconscious before a minister summoned by telegraph could have reached her does not arise from the averment that she became unconscious after sending the message and died before he arrived, where in the same action it is said that if the telegram had been promptly delivered he would have arrived in time to have administered to her spiritual wants.

2. Mental anguish of a father caused by the failure of a minister to reach his daughter until after she was dead, when he had telegraphed for him because of her desire

NOTE.—Limits for delivery of telegrams.

In WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. ROBINSON it was held that a rule of a telegraph company not to deliver messages outside a 1-mile limit cannot be set up to excuse a delay in delivering a message sent to a small town a few miles away, summoning a minister of the gospel to a person near death, when the rule was not known to the sender and was not mentioned by the agent, who received the message about dark, stating that it could be delivered that night. It did not appear that the company enforced this rule or informed the patrons, and the agents did not conform to it, but delivered other messages beyond the limits, and in fact delivered this one, though too late to accomplish its purpose.

Some cases hold that a telegraph company is liable for nondelivery where the addressee lives outside of the free delivery limits, but inside of the city, and the fact of his being out of the limits is not known to the sender, and hold that rules or regulations, unreasonable or unknown, will not be enforced; also that the company will be held liable where prepayment is made or tendered for special delivery which is not complied with. But the failure to prepay for delivery beyond the free-delivery limits has been held sufficient to exonerate the company. A custom to deliver in a small town near the station beyond the limits has been held to override a printed contract or regulation.

So, a telegraph company was held liable for failure to deliver a message where Ind. Rev. Stat. 1897, § 5513, provided that telegraph companies should be liable for special damages occasioned by failure and negligence in receiving, copying, transmitting, or delivering despatches, and § 5514 provided that said company shall deliver to all persons to whom addressed, on payment of any charges due for the same, if such persons or agents resided within 1 mile of the telegraph station or within the city or town where such station is, and the addressee lived in a city and two squares beyond the 1-mile limit, but it was not known to the sender that he lived beyond the 1-mile limit. The court held that the for baptism and union with the church, is not without foundation merely because complete church membership could not have been consummated during her life, but may be the basis of a cause of action against the telegraph company.

3. A rule of a telegraph company not to deliver messages outside a 4-mile limit cannot be set up to excuse a delay in delivering a message sent to a small town a few miles away summoning a minister of the gospel to a person near death, when the rule was not known to the sender and was not mentioned by the agent, who received the message about dark, stating that it could be delivered that night.

4. The court can judicially know that a certain town is one of the smaller towns of the state.

5. A verdict for $500 is not excessive as damages for the mental anguish suffered by a father on account of inexcusable delay in delivering a telegram to a minister of the gospel, calling him to the bedside of a daughter who desired baptism and union with the church, where the result was that he failed to come until after she was dead.

prepayment of a special delivery charge is not under all circumstances a prerequisite to the duty to deliver the message in a city or town, and that a rule which would require prepayment by the sender, though ignorant that such a charge would be made or when the amount was undetermined, would be unreasonable and oppressive. The court further held that the contract providing for a special charge to cover the delivery beyond the free delivery limits, and that only the actual costs of service would be collected, did not indicate that prepayment must be made. (The case of Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Henderson, infra, was not approved.) Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Moore, 12 Ind. App. 186.

And a recovery of a penalty was allowed to the sender where the telegram was not delivered to the addressee, who lived within the city limits, although there was an office regulation, unknown to the sender, that an extra charge would be made for delivery over ten blocks, which was this case, and Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 883, provided that a telegraph company should transmit without partiality and in good faith under a penalty of $100 for neglect, for the benefit of the person sending the despatch. The court further held that the receiver could not exonerate the company by a general order forbidding messages to be delivered to his house on Sunday, and further held that an attempt to deliver by telephone was not a compliance with the requirements of law. Brashears v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 45 Mo. App. 438.

So, a recovery was allowed where a message was sent in care of a college, and the party resided about a block and a half from the college, and both places were just outside the free delivery limits, but the charges for its delivery were paid and the message which should have been delivered at the college at 9 P. M. was left with a saloon keeper near the college between 10 and 11 o'clock at night, and was not received until about 9 o'clock the next morning. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Warren (Tex. Civ. App.) 36 S. W. 814.

And a recovery was allowed where the addressee lived 6 or 7 miles in the country and beyond the free-delivery limits as shown by the blanks, and the sender offered to pay all extra charges, but the agent said that it was all right and the message should go through without delay, as the company would send it and collect extra charges on delivery; and the agent attempted to make special de-

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Rhea County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's failure to promptly deliver a telegraph message. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. V. C. Allen and N. Q. Allen for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. B. G. McKinsie and Burkett, Miller, & Mansfield for defendant in error.

Snodgrass, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error sued the telegraph company for damages for the negligent failure to transmit and deliver from the town of Evansville a telegram addressed to J. A. Whitner, Dayton, Tennessee. The declaration alleges that on or about August 19, 1895, the plaintiff's minor daughter, Katie, was dangerously sick, and expected to die; that she had professed the Christian religion, and desired to be united with the church of God; and that said Whitner should confer the right of baptism, and admit her into the church of which livery but could get no one to carry it, without a guarantee, until the next day, and the message was delivered too late. The court held that a rule requiring a deposit for delivery beyond the free-delivery limits was no defense under the circumstances of this case. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. O'Keefe (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 1137.

So, a telegraph company was held liable where it failed to deliver a message at a point 3 miles from S., and the company was paid for special delivery, although the receiving agent was mistaken as to there being telegraphic communications with S. But there were other stations near, from which it could have been sent, and the company failed to use diligence to inform the sender after it was discovered that there was no office at that place. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Hargrove (Tex. Civ. App.) 36 S. W. 1077.

And a recovery was allowed where a party resided about 17 miles from the office of delivery, being about 3 miles from Post Oak on the road from the delivery office, and a special delivery was guaranteed, and was agreed upon and was not made. Had the messenger been sent to Post Oak he would have ascertained that the addressee was between him and the station and near the road, and it would have been delivered, but instead it was sent by mail to Post Oak, and the sender had forbidden it to be sent by mail and had offered to pay the expense of delivery, and the message was sent on those terms. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Drake (Tex. Civ. App.) 36 S. W. 786.

So, a recovery was allowed for delay in delivering a telegram where the addressee lived beyond the free-delivery limits, as shown in the printed clause on the telegram, but the town was about 1 mile from the depot where the telegraph office was kept, and it had been the custom for years of the company to send messages by hackmen and others to people in the town without extra charges. The company undertook to do so in this instance, and having undertaken to make a delivery it should be held liable notwithstanding the printed clause. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Womaok (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 932.

And the company was held liable for failing to promptly deliver a message where the party resided 3 miles from the office, although the printed rule provided: "Messages will be delivered free within the established free-delivery limits of the terminal office. If delivered at a greater distance, a he was a minister,—the nearest available minister of the said church to the residence of the plaintiff. The message was in the following words:

Evansville, Tenn., 8-19-'95.

To Rev. Whitner, Dayton, Tenn.:

My daughter Katie is dangerously sick. Wants to be baptized. Come to Washington at once. Wire me at Evansville at once.

T. J. Robinson.

This message was delivered to defendant at the town of Evansville, Tennessee, at its receiving office at that point, and charges for its transmission to Dayton paid in advance,—all that was demanded by the agent who received the message. The message was received about dark, the agent receiving it stating that it could be delivered that night, and that he would do his best to get it through. Evansville and Dayton were on the same railroad, and only a few miles apart, and the home of the plaintiff was near Evansville, and in the vicinity of Washington, Tennessee. It appears in evidence that the message was received at Dayton about 7:55 P. M. on the night of its transmission; that the messenger boy of the office had left before the telegram was received, and the agent at Dayton made no effort to procure his return, or to secure any other messenger, in order to deliver the message to Rev. Whitner, who, it appears, lived in the town of Dayton, just beyond the corporate limits, but within the improved portion of the place, and a little more than $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the telegraph office. The message was sent to him the next morning, when he went immediately to Washington, and found the young lady was dead. He reached there about 9 o'clock, and she had been dead about an hour. He stated that he would have gone the night before if he had received the message, and that if he had reached there in time he could have baptized the young lady, and asked her the necessary questions, and could have reported the same to his session, and felt sure she would have been admitted had she lived. The law of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church—his church—required the action of that church session before members could be admitted. The other special charge will be made to cover the cost of such delivery." The court held that the failure to demand charges for delivery and the attempt to deliver required the company to deliver promptly. Whittemore v. Western U. Tele. Co. 71 Fed. Rep. 661.

A telegraph company was held liable where the addressee lived in the suburbs of F. about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from the telegraph station, and the messenger boy did not go to the place where she lived, as some persons informed him that she had moved, and some said that she had not, and the next day the telegram was left with the janitor of a hall, and was received one day too late to arrange for a lecture, and 1 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 888, § 1, provided a penalty of \$100 for failure to transmit with impartiality and good faith, and § 3 provided for delivery within 1 mile of the station or within the city or town. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Gougar, 84 Ind. 176.

In an action for a penalty for failure to deliver a telegram in due time, the declaration was properly amended so as to show that the person to whom it was addressed resided within the city and within 1 mile of the company's station. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Smith, 98 Ga. 685.

In Western U. Tele. Co. v. Buskirk, 107 Ind. 549, it was held that the burden of proving that the party to whom a despatch was sent within the free-delivery limits was upon the defendant in an action under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4176, providing a penalty for failure to deliver within 1 mile of the station or in the town or city. The excuse for non-delivery rests upon the defendant.

And under 1 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 888, which was a similar statute, the same was held to be the rule. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Lindley, 62 Ind. 371.

But in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510, it was held that the burden of proving that the addressee lived within the radius of the free-delivery system, where the contract provided for free delivery within the established free-delivery limits of the terminal office, was upon the plaintiff, and no extra compensation was paid or notice given of the distance of the residence from the office. In this case the evidence was conflicting as to whether or not there was a road which brought the distance to less than $\frac{1}{2}$ mile.

Under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4177, providing that telegraph companies shall be liable for special damages occasioned by negligence in receiving, transmitting, or delivering despatches, a telegraph company was held liable for failure to deliver a message to a party who lived for six years within 1 mile of the office in a city, although the company made efforts to find him by inquiries at the postoffice and all the hotels, and of persons on the street. Western U. Tele. Co. v. McKibben, 114 Ind. 511.

But a telegraph company was not held liable for failure to deliver a message where the party was beyond the free-delivery limits, and nothing was paid for the delivery. A rule establishing the free-delivery limits at $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the office in cities of less than 5,000 inhabitants was held to be a reasonable rule. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Trotter, 55 Ill. App. 659.

And where a party sending a message was an agent of the addressee and had notice that under the rules of the company a message would not be delivered after 5 P. M. away from the office, unless special delivery was paid for, a company was held not liable for not making a special delivery of an answer to the agent in response to his telegram, where special delivery was not paid. Bierhaus v. Western U. Tele. Co. 8 Ind. App. 246.

And a telegraph company was held not liable where the action was not brought within the time provided for in the contract. The court further held that the company used due diligence to deliver the message where the person to whom the despatch was sent did not live within the limits in which free delivery under the contract would be made, and nothing was paid for delivery beyond free limit. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Rains, 63 Tex. 27.

Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4176, providing for transmission of despatches with impartiality and good faith and in the order of time in which they are received, and § 4178, providing for the delivery within 1 mile of the delivery station, was held contrary to the Federal Constitution when applied to intercourse between states. In this case the company further claimed that the statute of Iowa to which place the message was sent provided for delivery within 1 mile of the office, but that the party lived at a greater distance. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 847, 30 L. ed. 1187, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 806, Reversing 95 Ind. 12, 48 Am. Rep. 692.

A telegraph company was held not liable for failure to deliver a telegram to the governor's office under oral instructions given by the party to whom evidence material to be noticed, in addition to that respecting the mental anguish suffered by the father in consequence of the nonarrival of the minister, was offered by the defendant respecting the custom of its office boy, not very material to be stated, and the fact that it had a rule not to make free delivery beyond $\frac{1}{4}$ mile, this not being very much more material than the other, inasmuch as it seemed to be a rule laid away, and of the existence of which nobody was advised, and particularly the plaintiff, nor does it appear that it was observed or required to be. Inasmuch as the testimony in this case shows no failure to deliver any message received addressed to the residents of Dayton, and, on the contrary, that the agent would frequently make delivery at points further than $\frac{1}{4}$ mile, and sometimes at night, for accommodation, when he thought the message was important. That there was ever any refusal to do so does not appear. On this proof, upon defendant's plea of not guilty, trial being had, verdict and judgment were rendered for \$500, and the defendant appealed in error. Errors assigned are: First. Refusal of the court to charge that, if the proof establishes that Rev. Whitner lived more than $\frac{1}{4}$ mile from the telegraph office, and that the company had a rule that messages beyond that limit were not to be delivered free of charge, then the company will not be liable for a failure to deliver, unless an arrangement was made with the company to deliver the message in this instance. Second. Because there was no evidence to support the verdict. Third. Because the verdict was excessive. Fourth. Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If the proof should establish that the Reverend Whitner lived more than $\frac{1}{4}$ mile from the defendant's Dayton office, and that the defendant had a rule that they would not deliver messages free outside of $\frac{1}{4}$ -mile limit from the office of destination, then, if the plaintiff, or the agent who sent his telegram, had notice of such rule, it would have been the duty of the plaintiff or his agent to arrange with the defendant for the delivery of the message; and, if they failed to do this, the company would not be liable for any failure to deliver the message outside the $\frac{1}{4}$ -mile limit. On the other hand, if the proof shows that neither the plaintiff nor his agent had knowledge of the existence of such a rule, and the defendant received a message for transit was directed, when the agent telephoned to such office and found that the party was out of the city, and then delivered the despatch promptly at the residence to the wife of the party. Given v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 112.

In Clement v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 137 Mass. 463, where a company was held liable for gross negligence in failing to deliver a message, the addressee lived more than $\frac{1}{4}$ mile from the telegraph office, and there was no evidence as to whether or not any attempt had been made to find the party. The question of distance was not discussed.

Under statutes providing in one section for prompt transmission, and in another section for prompt delivery, if the party to whom it is directed resides in the city or town or within 1 mile from the delivery office, telegraph companies have been held not liable for failing to deliver to nonresidents or transients, but have been held liable under the 1st section where nonresidents have called at the office and the despatch has not been transmitted, and have been held liable where the custom was to deliver.

So, a telegram addressed to a nonresident of the city, "Care of Teachers' Institute" in a city, did not, as required by Ga. act Dec. 20, 1892, providing for a penalty, specify any place within the limits of the city at which the message was to be delivered, where the Teachers' Institute was only a convention, and was holding meetings alternately in two different buildings. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Murphey, 98 Ga. 763.

And a telegraph company was not held liable for failing to deliver a telegram to a transient visitor whose address was not given to the company, even if he was well known in the town. Ga. Acts 1887, p. 112, providing a penalty for failure to deliver messages to persons to whom they are addressed who at the time reside within 1 mile of the telegraph office or within the town or city in which the office is, does not apply in such a case. But it was said that the penalty might apply if the address was given. Moore v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 87 Ga. 613.

And Ga. act 1887, § 2, providing a penalty for failure to deliver despatches to "persons or agents residing within 1 mile of the telegraphic station, or within the city or town in which such station is,"

did not apply to a transient person, although he gave his address in the city limits and the company failed to deliver the message. The 1st section of the act providing for prompt transmission applied, but this message was transmitted promptly. Whether due diligence required the company to go outside of its office to deliver the message was held to be a question for the jury, and to depend in part on the usage of the company. It was said that if the company should go out of its office to deliver for one person it must do so for all. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Timmons, 98 Ga. 345.

But a telegraph company was held liable for a penalty for the nondelivery of a telegram sent to a nonresident at B, who was well known to almost every person at B, and was intimately acquainted with the agent and was boarding at the same hotel with him, and it was the custom of defendant to deliver telegrams to nonresidents, especially during terms of court, and the addressee had himself received such telegrams and was attending court. (The court adopted the rule suggested in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Timmons, supra.) Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Edwards, 98 Ga. 757.

And the telegraph company was held liable where it failed to transmit a telegram with due diligence under Ga. Acts 1887, p. 112, § 1, providing a penalty for such failure although the party to whom the message was sent did not reside within such limits, as a message should be promptly sent to the office so that it might be called for. So much of the case of Moore v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra, saying the act only applied to those who live in the limits prescribed, must be understood to relate to the failure to deliver only. Horn v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 88 Ga. 533.

A telegraph company was held liable for failure to deliver a message called for at the office, although the sendee was a nonresident. Ga. act Oct. 22, 1887, § 2, providing a penalty for nondelivery to residents of cities and towns and to persons residing within 1 mile from the office, did not apply, and the plaintiff did not have to bring himself within the terms of that section. The 1st section of the act required transmission for nonresidents as well as others with impartiality and good faith, and with due diligence under a penalty. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mansfield, 98 Ga. 349. L.T.

mission and delivery without calling attention to such rule, it would have been its duty to use active diligence in delivering it, if the addressee resided within a reasonable distance from the defendant's office."

Taking up these objections, not according to their order, but in the most convenient form for presenting them, we dispose of the question, first, that there is no evidence to sustain the verdict. On this it is insisted by plaintiff in error that the declaration alleges the young lady became unconscious and died before he could have arrived, had the telegram been delivered in time. It is true that the declaration averred that she became unconscious, though it is not stated at what time. It is stated in the same connection, however, that, had the message been promptly and properly transmitted and delivered, the minister would have duly come to Washington, as requested, and have arrived at the home of the plaintiff in ample time to have administered to the spiritual wants and requirements of the plaintiff's daughter, which at least negatives the supposed inference, from the averment of unconsciousness, that it resulted earlier than the minister could have arrived. It was not essential to prove affirmatively, under this declaration, that she did not become unconscious before the minister could have reached her father's home. There is no presumption from the declaration, taken entire, that she did, but, on the contrary, that she did not.

It is next insisted that the daughter's object was to be united with the church, and that, as it appears from the testimony of the minister that she could not have become a member, according to the regulations of that church, until after the meeting for that purpose, therefore, the nonarrival of the minister was immaterial, and that the anguish experienced by the father could not have any foundation on that account. There is nothing in this objection. It was the daughter's desire, which the father knew, to be baptized, and to have the minister do what he could to unite her with the church. What the effect or non-effect as to the actual uniting herself to the church may have been was not the question. She had the right and desire to have the attendance of the minister for this purpose, and the father must necessarily have suffered just as much from the minister's failure to arrive and administer to his daughter what she desired to have done for her consolation and support in the hour of death, as though it would have effectuated a complete church membership. What would have been the effect of it, it is wholly immaterial to consider. The girl desired to do all she could, and the minister testified he would have done all he could, to effectuate her purpose. The anguish of the father in this disappointment could hardly have been less keen than it would have been in consequence of the fact that, after all was done that could be, it might have been supposed necessary that still further action be taken by the church. The suit is not for any damages which resulted from any wrong to the girl, or the failure to accomplish her admission into the church, but the suffering endured by the father because of his disappointment in the failure of the minister to arrive and afford the daughter whatever help and consolation he could, in her effort to prepare by baptism and other services, which he could render as a minister of God, in her impending dissolution. It may be a matter of doubt what the effect of it all would have been, and whether baptism alone of a repentant believer might not have been sufficient for all practical purposes of accomplishing her desire. This, of course, we cannot decide; but, whether true or not, it is clear that these were things desired with great tenderness and anxiety by the father, and that his anguish would be naturally very great, and that he was not able to have them done because of the defendant's negligence. It cannot be decided that he suffered no pain in consequence of being unable to accomplish any of the things desired because, possibly, he could not have accomplished all.

There is no error in the charge of the court as to the rule about delivery within $\frac{1}{4}$ mile of defendant's office, first, because it does not appear that the public, and still less the plaintiff, had any knowledge of such rule, and it not only does not appear that he was informed of the rule, but on the contrary, that he was advised by the defendant's agent, to whom he delivered the telegram, and to whom he paid all that was asked for its transmission and delivery, that it could be delivered that night. Dayton, we can judicially know, is one of the smaller towns of the state; and, presumably, when the defendant's agent took the message, addressed to a resident of that town, with the statement by him that it could be delivered, and without any inquiry as to distance, or knowledge on the part of the plaintiff and his agent of any rule not to be delivered beyond $\frac{1}{4}$ mile, or suggestion of any such rule by the receiving agent of the company, who received for that proposed transmission and delivery all the compensation it asked, its purpose and contract was to deliver; and the plaintiff was not required to make, or show that he made, further inquiry on the subject. It might be different had the addressee lived in a large city, and probably at a great distance from the telegraph office. Besides, as already stated, it appears in evidence that, though there was a rule of the company that, in towns of the size of Dayton, delivery would be made only within the $\frac{1}{4}$ mile limit, it does not appear that the company required or enforced the observance of this rule, or took any means to inform its patrons of the existence of such rule, and the company's agents did not themselves conform to it, but, on the contrary, delivered messages beyond the limit and, in fact, delivered this one beyond the limit, though too late to accomplish its purpose. A rule merely made, without notice to those who are to be affected by it, and without exaction or conformity to it, and which is not in fact observed by the company itself, cannot, as a protection against liability, be laid away in secret consciousness of the agents of the company, unknown and unobserved, until the occasion arises to apply it on account of liability incurred by failure to deliver, as in this case.

Finally, as to the excessiveness of this verdict. As already stated, it is for $500. The question as to the excessiveness is not, of course, an original one. addressed to us. We are not to render the verdict, but merely to control it, as against the passion, the prejudice, the corruption, or unaccountable caprice of the jury. If none of these things appear, or may be inferred, from the extravagance of the verdict or other facts in the record, we do not attempt to control it. Of course, as we have heretofore intimated, in cases of this character, where the damages are for mental anguish purely, extravagant and extraordinary verdicts will be tolerated; yet, within reasonable limits, the discretion which exists in the jury will be controlled by us. In this case we cannot say that the amount given, while in full and ample consideration, is one evincing passion, prejudice, corruption, or caprice. The negligence of the defendant was gross and inexcusable, and about a matter which the terms of the telegram plainly showed not only permitted no delay, but called for the exercise of a reasonable diligence as a matter of business and a matter of humanity. We are not disposed to encourage negligence of this character by the enforced reduction of verdicts given against it by way of smart money, or as compensatory.

We cannot disturb this judgment on that account, and it is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Mabel L. BUCHANNAN

SUPREME CONCLAVE IMPROVED ORDER OF HEPTASOPHS, Appt.

(173 Pa. 468.)

The beneficiary of a certificate of insurance on the life of her father, who is insane or incapable of attending to business, is entitled to notice of his default in paying assessments before a forfeiture can be declared therefor, after she has given notice to the company of his condition and requested a notice of any default on his part so that she might make an effort to pay the assessment if he did not.

(November 11, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Allegheny County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a benefit certificate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the lower court in refusing a motion for a new trial.

Messrs. J. A. Langfitt and S. A. Will, for appellant:

There are two methods provided in the laws of benefit societies for suspension on account of nonpayment of assessments. Some require an affirmative act of the subordinate lodge to complete the suspension, and notice of such action to the members. In others the law is self-acting or executory, and requires no affirmative action on part of the subordinate lodge to complete the suspension. If, under the former, a member by some affirmative act is suspended by the lodge, and has notice of such act, and does not exercise the right of appeal secured him by the laws of the order, the action of the lodge, if such lodge has jurisdiction, is final, and cannot be assailed in an action on the certificate after the member's death.

Karcher v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 187 Mass. 368; Mulroy v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 28 Mo. App. 468; Hamill v. Supreme Council of R. A. 152 Pa. 537.

If, however, by the laws of the society mere nonpayment of an assessment operates as a forfeiture, the member elects every time he is called upon to pay an assessment either to pay within the stipulated time or suffer the penalty of loss of membership and its benefits by neglecting or refusing to pay within that time.

David H. Buchanan was insane during August and September, 1894.

Mabel was his daughter and beneficiary. As his daughter no matter to whom the certificate was payable she had such an interest in her father's welfare that she was entitled to see to it that his certificate should not be forfeited while he was entirely mentally incapable of attending to the payment of the assessments.

As a beneficiary she had such an interest as entitled her to keep the certificate alive, not against her father's voluntary action, but if he were mentally incapable of receiving notice or of paying the assessment.

Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 255; Helme v. Philadelphia L. Ins. Co. 61 Pa. 107, 100 Am. Dec. 621.

The law abhors a forfeiture, and therefore he who seeks to enforce it must show that he has been guilty of no unjustifiable or unconscionable conduct.

If the contention of appellant is correct that notice could only be given to Buchanan that he only could pay the assessment, and he only direct to whom notice could be sent, then the duty resting on Buchanan was a personal one and his insanity would excuse the performance, and the forfeiture could not be insisted on.

Scully v. Kirkpatrick, 79 Pa. 324, 21 Am. Rep. 62.

SLAGLE, J., delivered the following opinion in the court of common pleas:

"This was an action upon a benefit certificate issued to D. H. Buchanan, and made payable to the plaintiff, his daughter. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was made by defendant, for which a number of reasons have been assigned. We think there was sufficient evidence for submission to the jury of the questions of fact, and only two of the reasons assigned need be considered. The fourth assignment is as follows: 'Witnesses for plaintiff having testified that D. H. Buchanan did not, to their knowledge, receive his copy of the Advocate in September, 1894, the court erred in charging the jury that mailing the said Advocate at Baltimore to the proper address of D. H. Buchanan was prima facie evidence that he received it, but that that evidence might be rebutted.' The court did not instruct the jury as stated. It was contended by plaintiff that the notice published in the Advocate was not the notice required by the constitution of the order; that it was a notice addressed to the conclaves, and should have been addressed to the members. The court held that the notice was sufficient in form. It was further contended that there was not sufcient evidence of mailing. The court submitted the question to the jury as follows: 'Now, was this placed in the postoffice, properly addressed to Mr. Buchannan at the place of his residence, of which the order had notice upon their records? If so, then notice was given.' Counsel for plaintiff contended that they might show that it had not been received. It would probably have been better to have said that it was immaterial whether it had been received or not, the court having practically instructed the jury that there was no evidence to rebut the presumption that it had been received, and may have fallen into an error in saying: 'However, if, under all the evidence in the case, you are not satisfied that this notice was not properly sent and received, the defendant has not made out a case of suspension.' But this certainly could have done no harm, as the case was submitted to the jury on the question which is the subject of the fifth assignment, as follows: 'The court erred in its charge to the jury in stating that Mabel Buchannan, the plaintiff, had an interest in the benefit certificate sued on, and that she was entitled to notice of the calling of assessments, for the nonpayment of which D. H. Buchannan was suspended, if said D. H. Buchannan was mentally incapable of receiving or of understanding the meaning or effect of said notice, there being no provision in the law of the defendant entitling the plaintiff to any such notice in this case.' This is not in the language of the court, but is substantially correct. There was some evidence of the incapacity of Mr. Buchannan at and before the assessment of September, 1894, was made, and that it continued until his death. It was also in evidence that before the assessment was made Mabel Buchannan, the beneficiary, had written to the financial officer to whom all assessments were payable, referring to her father's condition, stating that he was careless, and liable to neglect them [the assessments]: that she had at various times paid them; and asking, 'If you find Mr. Buchannan won't pay them, please let me know, so that I can make an effort to do so.' In view of this evidence the court instructed the jury that Mabel Buchannan had an interest in that certificate. It is true that it is one that was subject to the voluntary control of her father. Therefore she had certain rights, and, if her father was insane, or incapable of attending to business, she had a right to keep this certificate alive; and, when she notified the proper officer, if she did, of her intention to keep it alive notwithstanding what her father might do, she had a right to do it. If he was capable of acting, no action of hers would keep it alive, because he had the power to destroy her rights at any time. But, if he was incapable of acting, she would have the right to say to this officer of this society, 'My father is not capable of attending to this matter, and I will pay these assessments until he is.' The conclusion of the whole matter was stated as follows: 'Now, if her father was in such actual condition as to make him incapable of acting in this matter, she, as the beneficiary, had a right to pay the assessments, and when she asked to be informed of any assessments that were due I think it was the duty of the officers to notify her before any suspension was made; and, if they neglected to do it, then they could not work any suspension of this certificate.' This is the substantial testimony in the case. There is abundant authority for the position of the plaintiff's counsel that where the certificate of a beneficial association provides that a failure to pay any assessment within a certain time shall render it null and void, time is of the essence of the contract, and failure to pay within the time designated renders the certificate null and void; and that, where there is no provision of the contract which declares expressly or by necessary implication that sickness or insanity or similar incapacity shall excuse the payment of any assessment on the day it is due, the courts will not grant relief against such contingency. This is simply to hold that everyone is bound by his contract deliberately made. However, the reasons for this seemingly hard rule are indicated in Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 884, where the author says neither insanity, sickness, nor absence is an excuse for nonpayment of assessments, the payment being an act that can be performed by the member or by some other person. This marks the distinction between this case and those to which he finds the rule to have been applied. The statement of the text is possibly too broad, but certainly anyone related to the member or interested in his estate may come to his relief under such circumstances, and especially when he is named as his beneficiary under his certificate. The beneficiary has an interest in the certificate, and, although it does not become absolute until the death, it is an actually existing interest until annulled under the rules of the order. So long as it remains in force, it belongs to him exclusively. Upon the death of a member it passes to the beneficiary as his own, and not as representative of a member. Hamill v. Supreme Council of R. A. 152 Pa. 537.

"If the plaintiff, having knowledge of the assessment, had offered to pay it to the proper officer, there can be no question but that he would be bound to accept it. When the offer was made in advance, good faith required that the beneficiary should have the opportunity to preserve her rights, not against the voluntary act of the member, but as against neglect caused by his inability to act. She was therefore entitled to notice upon proper request made. No notice was given, and it appears from the evidence that neither the plaintiff nor her mother had knowledge of the assessment; and, if plaintiff had actual knowledge of the assessment, it would be fatal to her claim. This gives pertinency to the testimony of the plaintiff and her mother that they did not see or know of the notice by publication. The only other question is as to the party to whom the request for notice was made. Plaintiff's request was sent to the financier of the local conclave. He is the only officer with whom individual members come in contact. To him all assessments are paid, and the order should be bound by his acts. The question in this case seems to be new. We think the law ought to be and is as given to the jury, and a new trial must therefore be refused."

Per Curiam:

We find no error in this record. For rea-sions given by the learned trial judge in his opinion refusing a new trial, the judgment should not be disturbed.

HARRISBURG & MECHANICSBURG ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Payment into court of an award of viewers from which an appeal is taken by the property owners is not sufficient to satisfy Const. art. 16, § 8, requiring just compensation to be "paid or secured before the taking, injury, or destruction" of property in eminent domain cases; and therefore the act of May 14, 1889, providing that on such payment into court the right to use the property shall vest in the corporation seeking to take it, and that the money shall remain in court to await the final judgment on appeal, is unconstitutional.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Cumberland County dissolving an injunction which had been issued to restrain defendant from constructing its road across the road of complainant without making or securing compensation for damages thereby inflicted. Reversed.

In order to reach points authorized by its charter it became necessary for defendant to cross complainant's road in the construction of its railway. Complainant, believing that this would render its road unsafe and dangerous to travel, asked an injunction to restrain the railway company from entering upon or crossing its road. A preliminary injunction was granted, which was continued until final hearing, the court stating that it would be dismissed if the railway company would obtain the right to enter upon and occupy the turnpike as provided for under the act of May 14, 1889, § 17. A petition was subsequently presented to the court showing that it was impossible to agree as to damages, and asking that viewers should be appointed. The report of the viewers was confirmed and the damages paid into court. The injunction was then dissolved.

Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Wilkes-Barre &

W. S. R. Co. 1 Pa. Dist. R. 637.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no room for doubt that the general purpose and character of the act of May 14, 1889, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Incorporation and Government of Street-Railway Companies in This Commonwealth," are within the constitutional powers of the legislature. There may be particular provisions that are not. This appeal challenges the constitutionality of a provision found in the 17th section, and raises a question not heretofore considered. The 8th section of the 16th article of the Constitution was intended to protect private property against the exercise of the right of eminent domain in a harsh or unjust manner. It provides that "just compensation" shall be made to the owner for all property taken, injured, or destroyed by any corporation, "which compensation shall be paid or secured before the taking, injury, or destruction shall be permitted." The machinery by which just compensation may be ascertained has been provided by law, and it includes an appraisal made by viewers appointed by the proper court, an appeal by either party therefrom, and an ascertainment of the amount of the just compensation by a jury upon a trial after the forms of the common law. Security for the payment of the just compensation to which the property owner is entitled must therefore be security for the amount that may be recovered, upon the trial of the appeal from the appraisal, before a jury. This is a plain constitutional requirement, and the legislature can neither dispense with it in whole or in part. The provision of the act of 1889, now complained of, authorizes the corporation, when an appeal has been taken from the award of viewers by the property owner, to pay into court the amount of the unsatisfactory award, and thereupon to take possession of, or proceed to injure or destroy, the property of the appellant. The section declares that the right to build and use the desired crossing over the plaintiff's turnpike "shall vest" in the railway company upon the payment into court of the amount of the award, and the money shall remain in court to "await the final judgment on said appeal." If the verdict should be much more than the award the plaintiff has no security for its payment, and may have no means for its collection. The title to the crossing having "vested" when the money was paid into the court, the crossing became a part of the line of the railway, subject to encumbrance by mortgage or otherwise, and subject to alienation. It might well happen that, when a judgment was finally entered on the verdict in favor of the property owner ascertaining the amount of compensation due him, the corporation would be found to be insolvent, the line of railway with all its appurtenances encumbered to its full value, or transferred to a purchaser, and the plaintiff left without security or any responsible party to whom to look for the larger part of his just compensation for the injury sustained by him. This is a result that the constitutional provision was intended to guard against, and would effectually prevent if it was fully enforced. The act of 1889 is unconstitutional in so far as it undertakes to confer an absolute right on the corporation to injure the property of the plaintiff by its crossing, without payment or security for the payment of a just compensation, as it may be finally ascertained upon the disposition of the appeal.

The decree was erroneous, and must be reversed, but it is not necessary that the injunction shall be restored if the defendant will promptly give the security that should have been given before making the crossing. The decree is reversed, and the record remitted, with direction that the injunction be restored unless the defendant corporation shall within ten days after notice of this order give security, to be approved by the court below, for the payment to the plaintiff of such sum as may be found due upon the disposition of the appeal from the award of the appraisers now pending, as the damage sustained by, or the compensation due to, the plaintiff by reason of the crossing of its turnpike road by the railway of the defendant at grade; injunction not to issue if such security be given; costs to be paid by the defendant.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Warren County in favor of defendant in an action to enforce payment of a judgment note upon which judgment had been entered and subsequently opened to permit defendant to set up the defense of the statute of limitations. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Samuel T. Neill and W. C. Neill, for appellant:

The defendant is not entitled to the benefit of the statute of limitations by reason of his absence from the state.

Chemung Canal Bank v. Lowery, 98 U. S. 72, 23 L. ed. 806.

Messrs. W. M. Lindsey, James O. Parmlee, and Edward Lindsey, for appellee:

The tendency of the courts of this state is not to hold such laws as act May 22, 1895, retroactive unless the legislative intention that they shall be so appears unmistakably clear.

Bedford v. Shilling, 4 Serg. & R. 401, 8 Am. Dec. 718; Ogle v. Somerset & Mt. P. Turnp. Road Co. 18 Serg. & R. 256; Allen v. Union Bank, 5 Whart. 420; Bechtel v. Cobough, 10 Serg. & R. 121; Lefever v. Witmer, 10 Pa. 505; Uochlan Twp. Road, 80 Pa. 156; Taylor v. Mitchell, 57 Pa. 209.

Legislation which affects rights will not be construed to be retroactive unless it is declared so in the act; but where it concerns merely the giving a complete defense, and cases in which the statute of limitations is still running at the time of the change in the law. If the defense under the statute of limitations was complete when the new law was passed, which annulled the defense, it seems to be a clear case of the deprivation of the prop-mode of procedure it is applied, as of course, to litigation existing at the time of its passage.

Kills v. Reading Iron Works, 184 Pa. 227; Lane v. White, 140 Pa. 99; Palairer's Appeal, 67 Pa. 494, 5 Am. Rep. 450; Com. v. Shopp, 1 Woodw. Dec. 128; Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 477, 5 Am. Dec. 291.

Neither the legislature nor the courts ought to, nor do they consciously, permit themselves to deprive a litigant of his rights without notice; and when the legislature has been so imposed upon as to be induced to pass an act that has that apparent effect the courts ought to interpose between the law and its innocent victim, unless, indeed, overwhelmingly convinced that it was the deliberate intention of the law-making power to change the law, not only for the present and future, but for the past and as in this case take from a litigant, not only a right which he had when his suit began, but one of which he had been assured by the deliberate judgment of this court.

The act entirely deprives a class of people of rights heretofore enjoyed under what is at best no more than a notice that hereafter their use of such rights will be regulated, and is a violation of constitutional requirement as to entitling acts.

The act of May 22, 1895 (Pub. Laws, 112), offends against § 2 of art. 8 of the Constitution of the United States, which requires that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states;" and against the 14th Amendment thereof, which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Starrett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In June, 1881, judgment was entered against defendant by virtue of a warrant of attorney contained in an unsealed note for $4,000, payable one day after the date thereof, November 10, 1878. On defendant's application, the court, in January, 1898, made a decree opening the judgment for the purpose of enabling him to interpose the statute of limitations, and awarded an issue in which it is provided that "the judgment note shall stand for a declaration, and defendant shall plead the statute of limitations, and no other plea, within ten days;

the plaintiff on the trial to be at liberty to show any matter in bar of the running of the statute, subject to the usual rules as to notice of special matter." On appeal to this court, the action of the court below, in thus opening the judgment and awarding the issue, was affirmed. Bates v. Cullum, 163 Pa. 234. By agreement of the parties, the cause was tried January 27, 1896, by the court without a jury. On the trial, evidence relating to the merits of the claim, and also tending to prove that within a few weeks after the note in question was given defendant left the state of Pennsylvania and ceased to be a resident thereof, and thenceforth continued to reside without the state, etc., was offered by the plaintiff, and received under objection. In connection with the evidence of defendant's nonresidence, etc., he also cited and relied on the act of May 22, 1895 (Pub. Laws, 112), which declares "that in all civil suits and actions in which the cause of action shall have arisen within this state the defendant or defendants in such suit or action, who shall have become nonresidents of the state after such cause of action shall have arisen, shall not have the benefit of any statute of this state for the limitation of actions during the period of such residence without the state." Referring to the evidence that was received under objection, the learned trial judge, in his opinion, says: "All this evidence should have been excluded, and we accordingly now sustain the objection, exclude the evidence from consideration, and seal bill of exceptions for plaintiff. The plaintiff's evidence having been excluded, that offered by the defendant may be treated as withdrawn." As to the act above quoted, he says: "The language of the act before us does not seem to require a retrospective construction; at least not such as to compel us, on ascertaining a fact by the trial of an issue, to enter a different judgment from that which we should have entered had the fact been judicially ascertained at the time of the order awarding the issue." He accordingly held that "no fact appears by which the running of the statute of limitations was prevented," and having found that the note in suit "was due more than six years before the judgment was entered" thereon, he enforced the bar of the statute, and entered judgment for the defendant. Hence this appeal, in which the correctness of the learned judge's rulings are challenged.

If the act, properly construed, is applicable to suits and actions, such as this, in which the cause of action arose in this state prior to the passage of the act of 1895, etc., and is not unconstitutional on that or any other ground, it is impossible to justify the action of the court below in excluding the evidence of defendant's "residence without the state" for more than twenty years as a fact "in bar of the running of the statute." One of the terms of the issue awarded by the court is that on the trial thereof the plaintiff shall "be at liberty to show any matter in bar of the running of the statute." The trial did not take place until erty without due process of law in violation of the Federal Constitution. That a perfected defense under the statute of limitations is property within the meaning of that constitutional provision is expressly decided in Normal School Dist. Bd. of Edu. 34 L. R. A.

v. Blodgett (Ill.) 81 L. R. A. 70. It is also in substance decided in Kipp v. Elwell (Minn.) 83 L. R. A. 436, holding that a statute which would reinstate judgments for taxes after they had been fully barred is unconstitutional.

January 27, 1896, more than eight months after the act was passed. All that was adjudicated prior thereto was the authority of the court to open the judgment and award the issue on the terms therein specified. The issue was pending and undetermined when the act went into operation. The learned counsel for defendant in their argument candidly "admit that the weight of authority is in favor of the power of the legislature to repeal and pass laws changing the methods of procedure, and relating solely to the remedy pending litigation;" but they claim "that the peculiar situation of this case" renders those authorities, as well as the act itself, inapplicable. For reasons above suggested, we are unable to see wherein either the act or the authorities referred to are not strictly applicable to the case in hand. The language of the act is clear, specific, and imperative. It applies to "all civil suits and actions in which the cause of action shall have arisen within this state." It affects all defendants "who shall have become nonresidents" "after said cause of action shall have arisen." This language is clearly retrospective, at least as applied to the cause of action and residence of the defendant. Whether our statute of limitations should or should not continue to run in favor of persons who had abandoned their residence in this state was purely a legislative and not a judicial question. The defendant had no right, in or under the statute, that could interfere with the power of the legislature to declare that he and all others similarly situated should not have the benefit thereof "during the period of" their "residence without the state." As was said in Campbell v. Holt, 115 U. S. 628, 29 L. ed. 486: "No man promises to pay money with any view to being released from that obligation by lapse of time. It violates no right of his, therefore, when the legislature says, time shall be no bar, though such was the case when the contract was made." We are of opinion that the act of 1895 is neither unconstitutional nor inapplicable to the facts of this case, and that the learned court erred in holding otherwise, add excluding plaintiff's evidence.

Judgment reversed, and record remitted for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Rehearing denied.

CHATTANOOGA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Thomas JOHNSON, Admr., etc., of Louisa Johnson, Deceased.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. Damages for the death of a married woman cannot include the loss to her minor child where the action is brought by her husband under Mill. & V. Code, § 8130, which provides that a right of action for injuries causing the death of any person shall not abate by reason of the death, but shall pass to his widow, or if none, to his children, or to his personal representative for the benefit of the widow or next of kin, but fails to make any express provision as to the beneficiary in case of the death of a married woman, and leaves the recovery to go to the husband jure mariti, as it would have gone at common law but for its rule of abatement.

2. A surviving husband as such cannot maintain a suit for the wrongful killing of his wife under Mill. & V. Code, §§ 8130, 8133, preventing the abatement of the suit, although the recovery inures to his benefit, but he must bring the action as administrator.

(November 13, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hamilton County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—For a decision denying the husband's right of action in a similar case, see Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McGill (C. C. App. 8th C.) 21 L. R. A. 518.

Mr. E. Watkins, for appellant:

The husband alone can maintain an action upon the facts of this case by virtue jure mariti.

Tafford v. Adams Exp. Co. 8 Lea, 100; Hamrico v. Laird, 10 Yerg. 227; Tune v. Cooper, 4 Sneed, 296.

The personal representative has no right of action upon the facts of this case, and the bringing it in that capacity is a material defect not curable by verdict.

Caruthers, Hist. of a Lawsuit, Martin's ed. p. 330, ¶ 274; Anderson v. Read, 2 Overt. 207, 5 Am. Dec. 661.

The administrator cannot maintain a suit for his own use.

Hagerty v. Hughes, 4 Baxt. 232.

He cannot maintain the suit for the minor child as he has no interest in it.

Tafford v. Adams Exp. Co. supra.

The court erred in not granting motion in arrest of judgment and new trial on the ground that the administrator could not maintain this suit for the benefit of the husband.

Mr. T. C. Latimore also for appellant.

Messrs. Daniels & Garvin and Marchbanks & Murray, for appellee:

The first statute was the act of 1851 which provided that the right of action which the deceased would have had had death not ensued should not abate, but should pass to the personal representative for the benefit of the widow and next of kin; and if he declined to bring the action the widow and children might do so in his name.

The construction put by the court upon this statute was that the action could be brought only in the name of the personal representative.

Hall v. Railroad, Thompson, Unreported Cases, 204; Flatley v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 330; Eldredge v. Stokes, 1 Bart. 312.

Thereupon the legislature passed the act of 1871 which amended the act of 1851 so as to allow the action to be prosecuted by the widow, or, if no widow, by the children, and this was in addition to the remedy provided by the act of 1851.

Under this act it has been held that when there are both a personal representative and a widow the action may be maintained in the name of either, the widow having the right to bring the suit in her own name in the first instance.

Webb v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 88 Tenn. 119; Greenlee v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 5 Lea, 418; Knoxville, O. G. & L. R. Co. v. Acuff, 93 Tenn. 26; Holder v. Nashville, U. & St. L. R. Co. Id. 142.

Under these statutes the decisions of the court were for a time inconsistent upon the question of damages recoverable. It was held that the damages resulting to those for whose benefit the right of action survived was an element of damage for which recovery could be had, in—

Nashville & O. R. Co. v. Prince, 3 Heisk. 580; Nashville & O. R. Co. v. Stevens, 9 Heisk. 12; Collins v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. Id. 841.

This was doubted in Fowlkes v. Nashville & D. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 839.

And expressly denied in later cases.

Trafford v. Adams Exp. Co. 8 Lea, 96; Nashville & O. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Lea, 470; Yockley v. King, 10 Lea, 67; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Pounds, 11 Lea, 129; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Gurley, 12 Lea, 54; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Conley, 10 Lea, 584.

To obviate this construction the act of 1883 was passed, which provided that the damages resulting to the parties for whose benefit the right of action survives shall be recoverable in the action.

This act in no way changes the mode of suing. The suit must still be prosecuted by the widow or children or by the personal representative.

Loague v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 480.

The inclusion of the child will be treated as a mere surplusage, and will not be allowed to defeat the action.

Collins v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 841.

The suit can be maintained in the name of the husband as administrator of his wife for his benefit as husband.

East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Lilly, 90 Tenn. 568; Webb v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 88 Tenn. 129; Nashville & O. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Lea, 470; Bream v. Brown, 5 Coldw. 168.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted by the administrator of Mrs. Johnson to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of his intestate by the plaintiff in error. Her surviving husband qualified as administrator, and this action was brought for his own benefit and that of a minor child of the deceased. There were a verdict 84 L. R. A.

While a number of questions have been made in argument, the only one which will be disposed of in this written opinion is that made upon that part of the charge of the trial judge which imposed a duty upon the jury of ascertaining the damages sustained by the minor child in the loss of the deceased, in the event they found that her death was the result of a wrongful injury received at the hands of the railway company. We think plaintiff in error is right in insisting that the charge, in this respect, was erroneous. In Bream v. Brown, 5 Coldw. 168, it was determined that a married woman was within the act of 1850, carried into Mill. & V. Code, §§ 8180, 8181; and, while there the suit was brought by the surviving husband, as administrator of his deceased wife, for the benefit of himself and the minor child of the deceased, yet the only point there argued and decided was that an action could be maintained for the wrongful killing of a deceased wife. In Trafford v. Adams Exp. Co. 8 Lea, 96, this court, for the first time, was distinctly called upon to determine who was entitled to the recovery in such an action, where the deceased wife left surviving a husband and next of kin. The question there presented was one of difficulty, owing to the peculiar phraseology of our statutes. The novelty as well as the difficulty of the question invited the careful consideration which it received at the hands of the court, the result of which was an elaborate opinion announcing as a conclusion "that the surviving husband was jure mariti, and, to the exclusion of the next of kin, was entitled to the damages" recoverable in such a case. While differing somewhat as to the reasoning of the opinion, all of the members of the court concurred in the holding "that the recovery for a personal injury to the wife which results in death will inure to the benefit of the husband, under the statutory provisions discussed, and that there can be but one recovery in such case;" and that he is entitled to this recovery under the common-law rule of jure mariti. It is true, as is argued at the bar, that in that cause there were no children seeking the benefit of a recovery under these Code sections; yet there were next of kin of the deceased wife, who were entitled to the same rights thereunder that children, if any, would have had; so that the rule of survivorship jure mariti, which excluded the one, necessarily excluded the other, class. Trafford v. Adams Exp. Co. was decided in 1881. In addition to determining this point, that case also settled that the recovery authorized under the statutes then in existence extended only to such injury as the deceased might have had if he or she had survived the injury in question. This decision, thus coming after great fluctuation of judicial opinion as to what were the true elements of damage in such a case, led, no doubt, to the passage of act 1888, chap. 186 (Mill. & V. Code, § 8134), which provided that, when the death is caused by the fault of another, the party suing, if entitled to damages, "shall have the right to recover for the mental and physical suffering, loss of time, and necessary expenses resulting to the deceased from the personal injuries, and also the damages resulting to the parties for whose use and benefit the right of action survives," etc. It is evident that the purpose of this act was not to create a mere class of beneficiaries, but to extend the scope of recovery by allowing not only damages which the deceased might have recovered for his or her own benefit, but also such as resulted from the death to the parties "for whose use and benefit the right of action survived." Loague v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 458. With this single modification, it left the law of this state, so far as the rights of the surviving husband in such case are concerned, as was announced in Trafford v. Adams Exp. Co. supra. Nor has the conclusion reached by the court in that case been seriously called in question since, so far as we are aware, until it was challenged in the present case. On the contrary, our impression is that it has been accepted generally by the profession as a definite settlement of a question that, if not much mooted, at least was open to serious doubt in this state until that time. The rule of stare decisis, after this long and general acquiescence in that decision, would, even if doubtful ourselves of its wisdom, induce us to hesitate seriously before reversing it. But we think an examination of the statute in the light of the common law as it stood at the time of its passage abundantly vindicates the holding of the court in that case.

At common law there were two actions which might be maintained for damages resulting from a tortious injury to the wife. One of these could have been prosecuted by the husband, in his own name, and for his exclusive benefit, and that was for the loss of her society, or of her services, or both, as well as for the necessary expenses incurred by him in consequence of the injury inflicted upon her. The other one of these actions was for the injury which the wife sustained, and this was brought in the name of the husband and wife. While the recovery would be in their joint names, yet the husband might, as in the case of any other chose in action, make it his own exclusively, by collecting and appropriating the recovery. Now, it is this latter right of action which is recognized, but is not created, by the statutes of this state. This action of common law would have died with the wife, and it has been the purpose of our legislature to prevent its abatement. The first statutory provision looking to this end is found in an act passed February 1, 1850, which is in these words: "In all and every case where any person shall come to his death by injuries received from another, whether the same were inflicted feloniously or not, for which injuries, in case death had not resulted, an action of damages would lie at law, the personal representative of the person thus killed shall have the right to institute a suit for the damages," etc. This act was carried into the Code of 1858, at §§ 2291 and 2292. Section 2291 of that Code provided as follows: "The right of action which a person who dies of injuries received from another, or whose death is caused from the negligent acts or omissions of another, would have lain against the wrongdoer in case death had not ensued, shall not abate nor be extinguished by his death, but shall pass to his personal representatives, for the benefit of his widow and next of kin, free from the claims of creditors." This section, as modified by chapter 78 of the Acts of 1871, is § 8130 of Mill. & V. Code. This legislation, as has been observed, did not affect to create a right of action, but recognized one as already existing, and provided that this right of action should not die with the party who was the owner of it. Its purpose was to prevent the abatement which death of the injured party worked at common law. Notwithstanding the peculiar phraseology of § 2291 of the old Code, which restricted the benefit of the recovery in such a case to the "widow and his next of kin," suggesting the ingenious argument that this necessarily excluded from the operations of the statute the case of a married woman dying from a tortious injury, yet this court held in Bream v. Brown, supra, that such a case was within the intent of the statute. This holding was based largely, and properly so, upon the use of the comprehensive word "person" ("the right of action which a person who dies," etc.) in the Code, and it was held that this word was sufficient to overcome the apparently restrictive terms already adverted to. Now, following the lead of that case, and altogether in harmony with its reasoning, we think it may be said, it being admitted that a wife is one of the "persons" provided for by that act, it may be safely assumed, in the absence of an express statutory provision disposing of the proceeds of the recovery for the injury resulting in her death, that they will go exactly as they would have gone at common law but for its rule of abatement, and that is to the husband jure mariti. It is true, the right to bring this action after death depends entirely upon the statute, and it must be prosecuted exactly as that directs. Loague v. Memphis & C. R. Co. supra. It is also true that the proceeds of the recovery in such an action must go according as the statute provides, where it does make such provision. But we have a case where the action is authorized by the Code, and yet where it fails to point out the beneficiary of the recovery. It is a statutory casus omissus, and in such a case we know of no other place to turn, with the view of ascertaining this beneficiary, save to the common law; and we think that a sound basis for the conclusion announced in the Trafford Case.

It follows from what has been said that the trial judge was in error in instructing the jury to take into consideration the child's relationship to the deceased, and, by necessary implication, telling them to consider its interest in its mother's life; and, as it is impossible for us to say how much of this verdict was intended by the jury for compensation to the child, the case must be reversed and remanded.

To meet another objection of plaintiff in error to the form of this action, it may be said that the surviving husband, as such, could not have maintained this suit but that it was essential that he administer. Nor is there anything anomalous in this, as at common law, where a wife died, leaving a husband surviving, before he had reduced to possession a chose in action which belonged to her, "it does not strictly survive to him, but he is entitled to recover the same to his own use, by acting as her administrator." 2 Kent, Com. *135.

Wilkes, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the majority opinion. I think the suit is properly brought in the name of the administrator of the deceased wife, but I cannot agree that the husband is entitled to the proceeds, either jure mariti or under the statute; not jure mariti because without the aid of the statute the husband has no right of recovery in case of the wife's death, whatever may be his rights for an injury to her not resulting in death; and not under the statute because the statute does not so provide. I do not controvert the holding in Bream v. Brown, 5 Coldw. 169, in which it was held that the wife is a "person," within the meaning of the statutes providing that actions shall not abate by the death of the "person" who dies from injuries received; and I am of opinion a right of action in case of her death does exist. In that case the suit was brought in the name of her husband as administrator, for the benefit of himself and the minor children of his deceased wife; and it was held that the action was properly brought by the administrator, but the court did not pass upon the question as to whom the proceeds should go to. It did not, however, hold that it was improper to include the children as beneficiaries of the recovery. In Trafford v. Adams Exp. Co. 8 Lea, 96, it is said the question of who is entitled to the proceeds of such recovery was settled. In regard to this case it is but true to say that it does not seem to me to rest on any satisfactory basis. The reasoning is all in one direction, while the decision is in another and different direction. In that case there were no children. The suit was brought in the name of the husband, as administrator. The contest over the proceeds was between the husband and the nephews and nieces of the wife as her next of kin. The decision was also prior to the act of 1888, which gives damages, not only for mental and physical suffering, loss of time, and necessary expenses resulting to the deceased, but also damages resulting to the parties for whose use and benefit the right of action survived from the death consequent upon the injury received.

Coming to the consideration of the statute, it is clear that the right to bring the action at all depends on the statute, and beyond the statute no such right exists. Loague v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 458. It is also clear that, the right being given by the statute, and the remedy provided in the same act, the right can be pursued in no other way. Flatley v. Memphis, & O. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 280 Loague v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 461; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Lilly, 90 Tenn. 565. The act (Mill. & V. Code, § 3180) prescribes that the right of action shall pass to the widow, and, in case there is no widow, to the children or to the personal representatives, for the benefit of the widow or next of kin; and § 3183 provides that the damages shall go to the widow or next of kin, free from the claims of creditors, to be distributed as personal property. In order to escape what appears to be, and no doubt was, an omission on the part of the legislature to provide for the case when the wife dies, this court has been disposed to hold that the word "widow" means also "widower," and that both are intended to be provided for. It is probable that this ought to be the law, but I think it cannot be based upon the words used in the act. If it could, and the widower would have the same rights as the widow under the statute, then he must take it subject to the same limitations. If the widow takes, she takes for herself and his children. If the widower takes, he should take for himself and her children. But I think the legislature has simply failed to make provision when the wife is killed for any recovery for the husband, and that the recovery in such case goes to the wife's children and not to the husband; and certainly this would be so as to the damages recoverable from the death of the wife, as contradistinguished from those accruing to the husband and wife jointly if she had not died. While I think the husband may sue as administrator, he cannot take the recovery jure mariti, nor as next of kin, nor as widow, nor as widower, and it should go to the children. I cannot see that, under the statute, the husband's right of action is saved; but, if it is, it is not the right of action for the death of his wife, for that never existed at common law, and could not therefore survive; and in any event the recovery should go to her children, when she has children. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Pitt, 91 Tenn. 93; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Lilly, 90 Tenn. 563.

1. A provision exempting debts already contracted from the prohibition against transfers of property to preferred creditors is not embraced within the title of Acts 1895, chap. 128, which indicates merely the prohibition of such preferences without anything to show that it permits any preferences.
2. A prohibition of judgments by default is not within the scope of Acts 1895, chap. 128, indicating a prohibition of preferences by "confession of judgment."
3. The right to transfer property in payment of a debt when solvent is within the constitutional protection of property rights, and is violated by Acts 1895, chap. 128, declaring that every transfer of property to preferred creditors, or which "would have that effect," shall be void, without limiting it to cases of insolvency.

which had been made by the grocery company as in contravention of a state statute. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cooke, Swaney, & Cooke, for appellants:

If an act contains more than one subject, and only one subject is expressed in the title, the whole act is a nullity.

State, Knight v. McCann, 4 Lea, 1; Cannon v. Matthes, 8 Helsk. 518; Knoxville v. Lewis, 12 Lea, 132; Ragio v. State, 26 Tenn. 275.

This act is so broad and sweeping in its character as to practically deprive a debtor, it makes no difference how much property he may own, of the right of disposing of his property in the payment of his debts, notwithstanding the fact that the debtor may be acting in the utmost good faith and may be ever so solvent, and it utterly destroys the right of a debtor to make contracts with a creditor and dispose of any of his property to the creditor where past indebtedness forms any part of the consideration for the contract.

The right of a debtor to contract with his creditors is one of the most valuable rights, and especially during a time like the present, when property has little if any market value.

The right to dispose of one's property is property, and the destruction of this right renders the act clearly unconstitutional.

Messrs. Shepherd & Frierson also for appellants.

Messrs. Pritchard & Sizer, for appellees:

This act cannot be held, under any reasonable construction, to embrace more than one subject.

The title of the act does not pretend to purport to make it apply to all cases of insolvency, nor to all the property of debtors. It is not necessary that the title should state the exact scope of the act, but it is only necessary for it to disclose its general purpose.

Powers v. McKenzie, 90 Tenn. 167.

The 8th section of this act does not undertake or pretend to directly authorize preferences; it simply provides that the act shall not apply to conveyances, etc., of a certain class.

Cannon v. Matthes, 8 Helsk. 504; State, Morrell, v. Fickle, 3 Lea, 79; Frazier v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 88 Tenn. 138; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Orider, 91 Tenn. 489; State v. Yardley, 95 Tenn. 546.

If it be urged that the act imposes a restriction on one class of citizens, to wit, insolvent debtors, which is not imposed on other members of a community, the answer is that the class legislated upon is a natural and not an arbitrary one.

The correct criterion by which the validity or invalidity of a general law under the constitutional provision in question is determined is whether it may be extended to any member of the community who may be able to bring himself within its provisions.

Cole Mfg. Co. v. Falls, 90 Tenn. 466.

An act may contain some provisions that are unconstitutional and others that are valid and unobjectionable; and if when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed wholly independent of that which was rejected, it will be sustained.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 177, 178; Tillman v. Cooke, 9 Baxt. 429; State v. Wilson, 12 Lea, 246; Dugger v. Mechanics' & T. Ins. Co. supra.

The restrictions against preferential sales and transfers of his property by a debtor are not in violation of the constitutional provisions invoked.

Brown v. Smart, 145 U. S. 454, 36 L. ed. 778; Leep v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 58 Ark. 407, 23 L. R. A. 284; Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79; Dugger v. Mechanics' & T. Ins. Co. supra; Black, Interpretation of Laws, 302.

Snodgrass, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this cause was filed by creditors of the Divine Grocery Company to set aside several conveyances, and subject property conveyed for the satisfaction of the complainants' debts. Two of the conveyances were held by the chancellor to have been valid, and from this part of the decree there was no appeal. The other two were declared to be void, as in violation of the assignment act of 1895. Defendant appealed and assigned errors.

The act is contained in chapter 136 of the acts of the general assembly of that session. It was approved May 11, and took effect from the date of its passage, and is found on pages 258 to 260 of the Acts of 1895. It is entitled "An Act to Secure to Creditors a Pro Rata Distribution of the Property, Estates, and Assets of Debtors, and to Prevent Debtors from Making Preferences among Creditors by Assignments, Deeds of Trust, Mortgages, Deeds, Sale, Pledge, or by Any Other Form of Transfer or Conveyance, or by Confession of Judgment, and to Repeal Chapter 121 of the Acts of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee of 1881, Entitled 'An Act to Secure to Creditors an Equal and Just Distribution of the Estates and Assets of Debtors Who Make General Assignments for the Benefit of Their Creditors, and to Prevent the Giving of Preference in Such Assignments, or by Other Conveyances, Confession of Judgment by Default, or Collusion in Contemplation of a General Assignment.'" If this be valid, then certain preferences were given which, according to its provisions, are not permissible, and the decree of the chancellor and of the court of chancery appeals affirming this decree are correct. If it be invalid, there is no objection to the preferences contained in these deeds. And the question, therefore, to be determined, is whether or not the act is constitutional.

The first objection urged is that its title is not broad enough to cover the purposes of the act, and that the act embraces more than one subject, and it therefore violates § 17 of art. 2 of the Constitution of the state, which, among other things, provides that "no bill shall become a law which embraces more than one subject, to be expressed in the title." We proceed, therefore, to analyze the act. to determine whether it is obnoxious to this constitutional provision. The title of the act we have already quoted, and leaving out so much of it as refers to the repeal of a former law, which, of course, covers no subject other than that repealed, we quote again the abbreviated title: "An Act to Secure to Creditors a Pro Rata Distribution of the Property, Estates, and Assets of Debtors, and to Prevent Debtors from Making Preferences among Creditors by Assignments, Deeds of Trust, Mortgages, Deeds, Sale, Pledge, or by Any Other Form of Transfer or Conveyance, or by Confession of Judgment." It will be seen that it is, in general and specific terms, to prevent debtors from making preferences among creditors by assignment, deeds of trust, mortgages, deeds, sale, pledge, or by any other form of transfer or conveyance, or by confession of judgment. It is general, absolute, sweeping, and unconditional to prohibit any preference, without limitation or exception; yet the 8th section of this act provides as follows: "That the provision of the act shall not apply to any assignment, mortgage, confession of judgment, or other conveyance made to pay or secure an indebtedness contracted prior to the passage of this act." Here it is obvious that, under a title of one subject forbidding a preference, an effort is made to legislate by limitation that permits a preference, and is manifestly not in accord with or pursuance of the title of the act, and that the bill embraces this subject and provision for antecedent debt preference, not contemplated in, but in direct antagonism to, the specific terms of its title. We are not here discussing at all the question of the power of the legislature to provide for such preference. We are merely determining the question whether that can be done under a title which specifically and positively forbids any preference. Again, the title of the act is to prevent preferences, among other things, by confession of judgment (only) so far as court proceedings are referred to.

The 8d section provides that any confession of judgment by debtors, or permitting judgment to be taken by default, fixing a lien or encumbrance on any of the debtor's property, estate, or assets, and made for the purpose of giving preference to one or more creditors, or that would so result, shall be held illegal and void, and such preferred creditor or creditors shall only be permitted to share ratably in a distribution of such debtor's assets. Here it is again obvious that a provision had been inserted in the act of a most vital and important character, and without which it is presumed that act would not have been passed, upon a subject not within the title of the act. It is clear that this effort to legislate against the result of a judgment by "default" is entirely beyond the legislation contemplated in the title, as to the effect of a judgment by "confession." They are not synonymous terms, and the express language of the act clearly shows that the legislature did not so understand them. A judgment by confession is one which results from the voluntary agreement of the parties; a judgment taken by default is one resulting either from the fact that a defendant has no defense to make, or does not appear to make it. If a party is sued upon a valid obligation, to which he has no defense, and consequently attempts to interpose none, a judgment by default may be naturally and properly taken against him. Under this section, it is denied the lien has the effect which would have resulted had he come forward and made a pretended or ineffectual defense. There can be no reason that a debtor should be compelled to make a defense when he has none; and this failure to do so when he has none is quite a different thing, in fact as in law, from voluntarily coming forward and confessing a judgment. In this connection, we are not unaware of the objection which might be suggested that the form of a judgment by default in courts of equity is put as "pro confesso," or "for confessed," "as if confessed;" but neither that language nor the effect of such judgment is a judgment by confession. The judgment is taken "as if" or "for" confessed, but is not a judgment confessed by the party. Its terms are not a judgment by confession, and its effect is not such. It is only such judgment as is given a like effect, and hence the expression "pro confesso," or "for confessed." The title of the act provided for judgments by confession. The section referred to in fact attempts to legislate the same effect for a judgment by default where there has been no confession by the party, and is therefore beyond the scope and purpose of the title.

The 2d section of the act provides that whenever any assignment, deed of trust, mortgage, deed, sale, or pledge, or any other conveyance or transfer of a part or portion of a debtor's property, estate, or assets, is made for the purpose of preferring one or more creditors, or would have that effect, it shall be illegal and void, and all such property, estate, or assets shall be divided pro rata among all of the creditors of said debtor. It is clear that this absolutely prevents the transfer, sale, pledge, or mortgage of all or any part of the property of any debtor, however solvent or insolvent, for the payment of any debt, however large or small, and that it denies him the privilege and power (denies to all solvent debtors, with any amount of property, as well as to all insolvent debtors) to pay all or any part of his indebtedness, large or small, without subjecting him to suit at the instance of other creditors, according to § 5 of the act, to sequester and appropriate his property, and throw him into involuntary bankruptcy, and ruin his business and reputation as a consequence. It must be observed that this act has nothing to do with the question of solvency or the insolvency of debtors, either in this caption, or its general provisions. It is an act to prohibit all debtors from making any preferences, and the terms of the second section, as already shown, are in express and positive prohibition of the disposition of any part of the property of a debtor, however solvent, to the payment of any debt, however small.

The practical effect of this is to compel debtors to dispose of their property for cash, even when perfectly solvent, and appropriate the cash to the debt, rather than exchange the property with the creditor on any advantageous terms which might be offered by the latter.—a result which it is obvious would but produce the greatest oppression, and hamper and hinder the citizen in the ownership and exchange of property, in a way that is absolutely intolerable if there be any fundamental law which will prevent. That fundamental law is found in § 8 of art. 1 of the Constitution of the state, which provides that no man shall be taken or imprisoned or dispossessed of his freehold, liberties, or privileges, outlawed or exiled or in any manner destroyed or deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. It is—and correctly—insisted that, while this act does not deprive him absolutely of his property, it takes away from him that element of its value which consists in the right to use and legitimately dispose of it; and here it must not be forgotten that we are not dealing with the question of an insolvent debtor conveying his property, or any part of it, for the purpose of hindering and delaying or defeating creditors; for the act does not stop with a declaration that such disposition, if made for the purpose of preferring one or more creditors, shall be void, but adds that, where it will have that effect, it shall be void. And as any transfer of any part of the property of a debtor, however solvent, to a creditor, in the payment of a debt, has the effect of giving such creditor a preference to that extent, it is manifest that this is a limitation upon the right, for a proper purpose, by a solvent debtor, to convey any part of his property at all, if in doing so he shall satisfy any of his debts.

It was decided in the case of Stratton Claimants v. Morris Claimants, 89 Tenn. 497, 12 L. R. A. 70, that, when the Constitution of this state was framed, the right to own, to hold, to enjoy, to alien, to devise, and to transmit property by inheritance was enjoyed to the fullness and perfection of absolute right, and one of the objects of the Constitution was to protect and preserve this right. To take from property its chief element of value, and to deny to the citizen the right to use and transfer it in any proper and legitimate method, is as much depriving him of his property as if the property itself was taken. Of course, we need not repeat again the meaning of the phrase in this connection, "the law of the land." It does not need to be said that the deprivation provided against is not merely that which might result from an act of the legislature undertaking to take the property, or to deprive the citizen of its value, for any purpose. A subsequent constitutional provision (§ 21 of art. 1) provides that no man's particular services shall be demanded or property taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representative, or without just compensation being made therefor. It has been held that private property may be taken for public use under this provision only upon just compensation, but not for private use at all. These general provisions in respect to the right to own property equally protect the right to use, enjoy, exchange, and transmit it, as held in the Morris Case, before referred to; and neither can be taken from the citizen by the arbitrary enactment of the legislature. That the citizen can be restrained from any improper use or improper disposition of his property is not doubted, and is, of course, not asserted here; but such is not the effort of this act, or, if the purpose of the legislators was to accomplish this result, they have attempted it by means of legislation beyond their power to adopt. It was probably not within the contemplation of the legislators in this sweeping way to deprive the solvent debtor of his power to pay debts with property, or to compel him, under such severe penalties, to always pay cash.

But we can judge of the purpose only by the terms employed in the act. The positive provisions of this act will bear no other construction than that put upon it. We are not dealing with it as an act in which the legislators may or may not have meant, or may or may not have intended, that which the act actually shows; nor are we construing it upon any assumption of what its promoters and supporters might assume they intend to do, or desire to do, in the procurement of its passage. We are dealing with what has been in fact done, and we can give it only such construction as it unmistakably requires.

The act is dealt with in argument, and assumed to be, in the general understanding of its supposed purpose, as designed to prevent improper preferences, and therefore to contain only such provisions as would effectuate this laudable object. If such were the act, its policy would be one which we could not disapprove, and, whether disapproved or not, we would be compelled to sustain. But it too frequently occurs that, where an effort has been made to do what the public may understand as the proper thing to be done, it is taken for granted that everything was done which was expected, and nothing more; and the act is approved or disapproved, not for what it actually is, but for what each for himself may suppose it to be, or to have been intended to be. Such a mistaken view seemed to have been taken of the former act which this was intended to repeal, and much antagonism grew up among certain of the profession as to the construction placed upon it by our predecessors and followed out by us in this court,—a construction wholly unwarranted by what the act was assumed to be, but absolutely required in consequence of what it actually was. This act which repealed it had many better features, and had the merit of much more simplicity of detail and less difficulty of construction, but was open to more serious objection in its glaring injustice and inequity, resulting from the nonobservance of the constitutional requirement pointed out. It is the duty of this court to sustain legislative acts when it can, and no more pleasant duty is discharged by the court, while no less pleasant one is imposed than that which compels a determination of their invalidity.

But the Constitution is the first law of the land. It must be conformed to by legislatures and by courts, and, when an act is in violation of its provisions, the duty of declaring it to be such invites no evasion, and admits of none. It is fortunate when acts of this character, which may ultimately affect the largest property interests, may have the question of their constitutionality early determined, particularly in view of the fact that future legislation might be desired. This question is decisive of the controversy in the case. These deeds were not invalid, unless they were invalid under the act of 1895.

It results, therefore, that the decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals must be reversed, and, as to these conveyances, be dismissed, with costs.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Louisa J. DENNIS, Appt.,

v.

Elias M. DENNIS.

(68 Conn. 183.)

1. Habitual intemperance, within the meaning of a statute authorizing a divorce for such cause, is not shown by the facts that defendant about once in three weeks became intoxicated during the evening to such an extent that the next morning he did not go as usual to his work, and had continued to do so for two years. If it had not caused loss of his position, nor produced want or suffering in the family.

2. A woman who authorizes her attorney to employ detectives to watch her husband, whom she suspects of infidelity, for the purpose of obtaining evidence which will entitle her to a divorce, and who goes with them at a time appointed to surprise him in a compromising position with a lewd woman employed by them for that purpose, may be found to have known that the woman's movements were governed by them, so as to show connivance on her part which will bar her right to divorce.

3. The right to a divorce for adultery will be barred if plaintiff consented to the employment of a person to allure defendant into the offense for which the action is brought.

4. Courts will use their discretion to defeat any and all attempts to use the forms of the law of divorce to minister to the caprices of the fickle minded, or to the revenges of the disappointed or vindictive, or to the passions of the incontinent.

NOTE.—*Drunkenness as affecting divorce.*I. *Drunkenness as a ground for divorce.*a. *Provisions for.*b. *What constitutes drunkenness.*c. *Degree of drunkenness authorizing divorce.*d. *Pleadings and proof.*e. *Defenses.*f. *Incidents and effects.*II. *Drunkenness as affecting cruel and inhuman treatment.*a. *Drunkenness as cruelty.*b. *Drunkenness connected with cruelty.*c. *Drunkenness as evidence of cruelty.*III. *Drunkenness as affecting desertion.*I. *Drunkenness as a ground for divorce.*a. Provisions for.

Drunkenness, independently of other causes, is not a ground for divorce in England (see Shutt v. Shutt, 71 Md. 198); and it is not included in the statutory grounds for divorce in ten of the United States, viz., Maryland, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, and West Virginia. The rest have provisions for divorce for habitual drunkenness or intemperance, or continued drunkenness, or habitual drunkenness continued for a designated length of time, some of them requiring the habit to have been contracted after marriage, and in a few the divorce granted is from bed and board only.

Thus, that drunkenness as an independent ground furnishes no cause for divorce in Maryland, is held in Shutt v. Shutt, supra.

And the same doctrine is stated in Pennsylvania, in Mason v. Mason, 131 Pa. 161, and Bean v. Bean, 11 Lanc. Bar. 133.

But in Johnson v. Johnson, 35 Phila. Leg. Int. 70, it was held that a decree of divorce will not be disturbed on appeal where the evidence established habitual intemperance on the part of the husband.

So, habitual intemperance as a cause for divorce must be continued for one year under the California statute, and a divorce cannot be granted in the absence of a finding of such continuance. Dunn v. Dunn, 62 Cal. 173.

And in Rose v. Rose, 9 Ark. 507, it was held that to dissolve a marriage on the ground of drunkenness it must be habitual drunkenness existing over a period not less than one year, and must be such as to render the marital state intolerable.

And to warrant a divorce upon the ground of three years of habitual drunkenness, under the New Hampshire statutes, it must appear that the libellant had a legal domicile in the state for the whole of the three years during which the drunk-ness existed. Batchelder v. Batchelder, 14 N. H. 380.

So, the Massachusetts statute makes gross and confirmed habits of intoxication contracted after marriage a ground for divorce. Blaney v. Blaney, 126 Mass. 205.

And to make out a cause for divorce upon the ground of habits of intoxication such habits must not only have been gross and confirmed, but they must have been contracted since the marriage, and if they were contracted before the marriage, although not known to the other party until afterwards, there would be no cause for divorce. Lyster v. Lyster, 111 Mass. 327.

And in order to warrant a divorce under Mich. Comp. Laws, § 3227, providing therefor when either party thereto becomes an habitual drunkard, the party must have become an habitual drunkard after marriage, unless, perhaps, where his habits have been concealed from the other party's knowledge. Porritt v. Porritt, 16 Mich. 140.

And neither the question whether the husband had been guilty of cruel and abusive treatment short of extreme cruelty towards the wife, nor whether he had habits of intoxication, however gross and confirmed, contracted before marriage, is in issue on a libel by a wife against a husband for divorce from bed and board on the ground of extreme cruelty and gross and confirmed habits of intoxication since marriage, and where such libel is dismissed, evidence of cruelty and intoxication prior to the date of such libel is admissible on the subsequent libel brought by the husband against the wife for desertion. Lyster v. Lyster, supra.

So, proof of a confirmed habit of drunkenness prior to the period defined in Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 62, § 4, authorizing divorces for habitual drunkenness for the space of one year immediately preceding the filing of the complaint, is admissible as evidence bearing upon the issue, but the statute cannot be construed to allow a divorce for habitual drunkenness during any period prior to the year immediately preceding such filing. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 44 Minn. 132.

And a divorce will not be granted under that act where no evidence is presented on the part of the plaintiff of the drunkenness of the defendant subsequent to her separation from him about a year and a half prior to the commencement of the action, and the defendant's testimony tends to show that for the last half year preceding the commencement of the action he had stopped drinking altogether. Ibid.

b. What constitutes drunkenness.

The habitual use of, opiates the tendency of which is to render the user careless, reckless, untruthful

(June 25, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for New London County in favor of defendant in an action brought to procure a divorce. Affirmed.

The court below made a finding of facts as follows: "(1) The plaintiff and defendant intermarried February 4, 1890, and have one child, the issue of such marriage, a boy four years of age. (2) The plaintiff and defendant were married at Norwich, and since their marriage have lived in New London. (3) For a period of two years prior to the date of the complaint, the defendant was accustomed to use intoxicating liquors more or less. About once in three weeks he became intoxicated, during the evening, to such an extent that the next morning he did not go as usual to his work at the store where he was employed as a clerk. (4) May 18, 1895, the defendant was caught in a compromising situation with a woman unknown. There was no direct evidence offered of any overt act of adultery. The circumstances, however, were such as to justify the inference that the defendant was then guilty of adultery, and I so find. (5) This woman was one employed by the plaintiff's agents to lure the defendant to the commission of adultery, and to the commission of the particular act of adultery above specified, for the purpose of thereby obtaining evidence upon which a divorce could be secured. The circumstances attending the employment and conduct of this woman were the following: (6) In April, 1895, the plaintiff, being desirous of and stupid, and to cause physical prostration and undermine and destroy all the objects of the marital relation, does not constitute drunkenness within a provision authorizing a divorce on that ground, that including alcoholic intoxication only. Dawson v. Dawson, 23 Mo. App. 169.

Thus, a moderate use of opium, though operating subsequently like intoxicating liquors, is not within the meaning of a statute authorizing divorce for habitual drunkenness. Barber v. Barber (Conn.) 14 Law Rep. 375.

And excessive indulgence in the morphine habit is not a ground for divorce under the provisions of Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 40, § 1, permitting a divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness. Youngs v. Youngs, 130 Ill. 230, 6 L. R. A. 548.

So, that a wife has become a confirmed opium eater to the neglect of her domestic duties does not establish cruelty as a ground for divorce, which must consist of personal violence or a reasonable apprehension thereof. Holland v. Holland, 4 Legal Gaz. 372.

Drunkenness is not insanity for which a divorce can be granted under the provisions of a statute giving the court of chancery sole cognizance to decree marriages null and void where either of the parties was at the time insane, though accompanied by circumstances of fraud on the part of the father and friends of the wife to induce the husband to marry. Eizey v. Eizey, 1 Houst. (Del.) 308.

c. Degrees of drunkenness authorizing divorce.

Habitual drunkenness within the divorce law consists of the constant indulgence in such stimulants as wine, brandy, and whiskey whereby intoxication is produced,—not the ordinary use, but the habitual use; and the habit should be actual and confirmed, though it need not be continuous or even of daily occurrence. Mack v. Handy, 30 La. Ann. 491; Williams v. Gross, 43 La. Ann. 568.

To constitute one an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the divorce law it must appear that he drinks to excess so frequently as to constitute a fixed practice or habit. Walton v. Walton, 34 Kan. 195.

Habitual intemperance within the divorce law can only refer to the persistent habit of becoming intoxicated from the use of intoxicating drinks, thus rendering the presence of the party in the marriage relation disgusting and unendurable. Burns v. Burns, 13 Fla. 369.

Frequent and regular recurrence of excessive indulgence in intoxicating drinks constitutes habitual drunkenness amounting to a ground for divorce. Golding v. Golding, 6 Mo. App. 602, Appx.

Habitual intemperance as a ground for divorce consists of the habit of becoming intoxicated from 34 L. R. A.

the use of strong drink, and frequent recurrence of drunkenness proves the habit. McGill v. McGill, 19 Fla. 341.

Thus, one is an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the divorce law who indulges in the practice of becoming intoxicated whenever the temptation is presented and the opportunity offered, and cannot resist the temptation to drink to excess whenever he has an opportunity to obtain liquor. Walton v. Walton, supra; Magabay v. Magabay, 35 Mich. 210.

And who makes no vigorous effort to resist and overcome the habit, or whose will has become so enfeebled by indulgence that restraint is impossible. Magabay v. Magabay, supra.

And one who for a period of two years prior to the beginning of an action for divorce against him was frequently and customarily or habitually given to the excessive use of intoxicating drink, and had during said two years or more lost the power of the will, hy frequent indulgence, to control his appetite for it, is an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the divorce act. Richards v. Richards, 19 Ill. App. 465.

So, drunkenness as a ground of divorce, under the Georgia statute, must be habitual, and an allegation in an action therefor that the husband frequently got drunk and had several fits therefrom is not sufficient. Myrick v. Myrick, 67 Ga. 771.

And the words "continued drunkenness" for which a divorce is authorized under the Rhode Island statute are used in their ordinary sense, and signify gross and confirmed habits of intoxication. Gourlay v. Gourlay, 15 R. I. 706.

And to warrant a divorce upon that ground the proof should be sufficiently clear to convince the court that the respondent's habits of drunkenness were confirmed, and that he was an habitual drunkard. Ibid.

And the words "wasting his estate," in Ky. Rev. Stat. 390, authorizing a divorce for confirmed habits of drunkenness on the part of a husband of not less than one year's duration, accompanied with a wasting of his estate without any suitable provision for the maintenance of his wife and children, embrace and apply to a man's health, time, and labor where he has no property, they being necessary to the support of his family; and where by the confirmed habits of drunkenness he wastes his time and injures his health his wife is entitled to a divorce. McKay v. McKay, 18 B. Mon. & Shuck v. Shuck, 7 Bush, 306.

So, a divorce in favor of a wife on the ground of cruel treatment and habitual drunkenness is supported by proof that after the marriage he frequently became drunk and at such times would abuse and mistreat her, and that he frequently came home late at night and very drunk, when he obtaining a divorce from her husband, went to Boston, and there consulted a lawyer, to whom she was recommended by a friend. This lawyer advised her to employ detectives upon her husband for the purpose of obtaining evidence upon which the desired divorce might be secured. She consented, retained him to represent her interests, and left the whole matter, including the procurement of the necessary evidence, in his hands, with full authority to act at his discretion and in such manner as he thought best in the procurement of such evidence, and in the employment and use of detectives therefor as might be necessary. (7) Pursuant to this arrangement and authority, and for the purposes aforesaid, male detectives were employed by said attorney, on behalf of the plaintiff. These came to New London from Boston, and for a period of two or three weeks shadowed the defendant. At the end of this time the woman above referred to was in like manner employed to act in concert with the other detectives, and by her wiles to entice the defendant into an act of adultery, or into a compromising situation from which the inference of adultery would be drawn, so arranged that his discovery by her associates might be made. (8) She came to New London and began to ply her arts upon the defendant. In the course of a week or ten days she succeeded in making an assignation with the defendant at a house in the city for the following evening, that of May 18, 1895. Her associates having been duly apprised, arrangements were made for the discovery, which was made as planned, by the sudden appearance to the was boisterous, abusive, and often obscene in the presence of his family, and that on some occasions he had been cruel to her while she was sick. Mack v. Handy, 89 La. Ann. 491.

And proof that a husband is an habitual drunkard, and that he has been guilty of wanton cruelty and gross personal abuse towards his wife, entitles her to a decree of separation under the Louisiana Act of 1848, chap. 57, authorizing a separation on account of habitual intemperance, etc.; but proof of habitual intemperance does not entitle her to a divorce a vinculo matrimonii until two years after the decree of separation, as a case of habitual drunkenness under that act must be restricted to the same remedy as the cases with which it is associated. Leake v. Linton, 6 La. Ann. 263.

But to constitute one an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the divorce law he need not be constantly under the influence of intoxicating liquors, and he may be one though there are intervals when he entirely refrains from their use. Walton v. Walton, 34 Kan. 195.

One may be addicted to habitual drunkenness, within the meaning of the divorce law, where he has a fixed habit of frequently getting drunk, though he may not be more often drunk than sober, and though sober for weeks at a time. Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324.

Thus, a fixed habit of drinking to excess to such a degree as to disqualify the person from attending to his business during the principal portion of the time usually devoted to business is habitual intemperance within the divorce law, although the person may during intervals be in a position to attend to his business affairs. Mahone v. Mahone, 19 Cal. 627, 81 Am. Dec. 91.

And repeated acts of drunkenness, followed by occasional spells of sobriety and moderate drinking, when the habit of drinking is so fixed that the temptation to drink cannot be resisted, constitute habitual drunkenness within the divorce law, and where such excesses on the part of the husband are of such a character as to render living with him unsupportable to the wife she is entitled to a decree of separation from bed and board. DeLesdernier v. DeLesdernier, 45 La. Ann. 1384.

And a divorce in favor of a wife on the ground of cruel treatment and habitual intemperance is sustained by evidence that the husband often came home very drunk, and that he frequently staid away until midnight and sometimes all night, and that on some occasions his wife had to undress him and put him to bed, and that he got his bottle filled nearly every morning, and that on several occasions he had been refused whiskey on account of having been drunk, and that he had once been in a condition closely proximating to mariti a potu, though no witness states that his intemperance had wholly incapacitated him for business. Williams v. Goss, 48 La. Ann. 368.

The reason the law makes habitual drunkenness a ground for divorce, however, is not alone because it disqualifies the party from attending to business, but in part, if not mainly, because it renders him unfit for the duties of the marital relation, and disqualifies him from properly rearing and caring for the children born of the marriage. Richards v. Richards, 19 Ill. App. 465.

And to establish habitual drunkenness within the meaning of the Illinois divorce act it need not be shown that for a continuous period of two years prior to the filing of the bill the defendant had a fixed habit of drinking to excess to such a degree as to disqualify him from attending to his business during the principal portion of the time usually devoted to business, as one may be an habitual drunkard and yet be sober for days and weeks together. Ibid.

In Richards v. Richards, supra, Mahone v. Mahone, supra, was distinguished, the court saying that it is hardly to be presumed that the court in that case intended to hold that there could be no such thing as habitual intemperance or drunkenness unless it was indulged in during the usual business hours of the day.

So a husband who has a persistent habit of becoming intoxicated at his house and while with his family is habitually intemperate within the meaning of the statute authorizing a divorce on that ground, though when abroad in the community transacting business he is not habitually intoxicated or intemperate. McGill v. McGill, 19 Fla. 341.

As to the effect of intoxication abroad but not at home, see McBee v. McBee, 22 Or. 329, infra.

And evidence that a husband would become grossly intoxicated three or four times a year for a period of twelve or fifteen years, remaining in that condition from a week to ten days, and that at such times he went or was sent to an asylum for inebriates, and that he could not resist the desire to drink when it came upon him and a single glass of liquor would bring on excessive drinking and gross intoxication, and any undue excitement made him drink, is sufficient to justify a finding that he had contracted such gross and confirmed habits of intoxication as entitled his wife to a divorce under the Massachusetts statute. Blaney v. Blaney, 126 Mass. 205.

And a divorce will be granted against a husband on the ground of habitual drunkenness where it appears that for six or seven years he had been in the habit of getting intoxicated when he went to the village averaging once or twice a week, and that he had been known to be so much under the influence of liquor that he would go to sleep in defendant in his compromising position at said assignation of two of the detectives, accompanied by the plaintiff, who had come to the scene for the purpose. (9) No evidence of any other act of adultery on the part of the defendant was offered. (10) The plaintiff did not give to her said attorney, or to any of the detectives employed by him, any distinct or specific authority or direction, as distinguished from the general authority hereinbefore set out, to employ said woman for the purposes for which she was employed, or to employ any woman for such purpose, and the plaintiff had no actual personal knowledge that the woman found with her husband was one employed by her agents in the manner in which, or for the purposes for which, she was employed. (11) I find upon the foregoing facts that the defendant was not, during the two years prior to the date of the complaint, habitually intemperate; and that the act of adultery established by the evidence was one brought about by the connivance and procurement of the plaintiff, acting through her attorneys or agents. By reason of said facts and finding, and in the exercise of the discretion vested in the court in said matter, the plaintiff's complaint was dismissed. (12) Upon the trial the plaintiff claimed that upon the facts the defendant was guilty of habitual intemperance, within the meaning of § 2802 of the General Statutes; and that, the fact of adultery being found, the plaintiff was entitled to a divorce, since the evidence did not establish connivance on the part of the plaintiff within the meaning of the law, and the facts proved were not such the barn and in the straw stack, and that when intoxicated he was morose and ugly and sometimes brutal and profane and violent, not only against his family but the dumb beasts about his premises, and that he twice broke furniture and dishes and on one occasion used violence against his wife threatening to drive her away with a horse-whip, though there was no evidence that he was ever so drunk that he could not drive his team home and take care of it, and it appeared that he was a good husband and father when sober, and one of the best and most prosperous farmers in the neighborhood. Berryman v. Berryman, 59 Mich. 605.

And while occasional drunkenness, especially of a woman, may form parts of the indignities to the other party which would render his condition intolerable and warrant a divorce on that ground, it cannot be held that one act of drunkenness, though accompanied by acts of indecency probably resulting from drunkenness, would make out a case for divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness for the space of two years. Kempf v. Kempf, 34 Mo. 211.

A man may drink occasionally to excess, however, and yet not be an habitual drunkard within the divorce law. Walton v. Walton, 34 Kan. 135; McBee v. McBee, 22 Or. 329.

And occasional intoxication is not habitual drunkenness which will justify divorce in a woman any more than it is in a man. Meathe v. Meathe, 58 Mich. 150.

There must be the involuntary tendency to become intoxicated as often as the temptation is presented, which comes from a fixed habit acquired from frequent and excessive indulgence. McBee v. McBee, supra.

Thus, a man living in the country who only drank when he happened to come to town, which was generally on business, and then not always to excess, and who seldom carried liquor home, and became grossly drunk on only a few occasions for years, and was a sober man in his family and at home except on such occasions, is not addicted to habitual gross drunkenness within the meaning of the Oregon divorce law. Ibid.

And evidence tending to show that on a few occasions a wife had been so much under the influence of liquor as to become noticeable on that account will not justify a divorce for habitual drunkenness in favor of the husband where the evidence of her intoxication comes mostly from him and his relatives, while her neighbors, some of whom were intimate with her, testify that they had never seen her under the influence of liquor and did not know that she drank, and it appears that she managed her household affairs neatly and in order, and that her husband had such confidence in her prudence and economy that he each week handed over to her a stated allowance for housekeeping expenses in—creasing it as he prospered in business, leaving the expenditure entirely to her judgment. Meathe v. Meathe, supra.

See also the principal case supporting this doctrine.

d. Proceedings and proof.

An allegation in an action for divorce for habitual drunkenness in the language of the statute is sufficient without setting forth the acts constituting the habit. Horne v. Horne, 1 Tenn. Ch. 259; Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324; Burns v. Burns, 13 Fla. 399.

As the language of the statute can only refer to the persistent habit of intoxication from the use of strong drinks, thus rendering the presence of the party in the marital relation disgusting and intolerable. Burns v. Burns, supra.

And the failure to allege that the defendant was disqualified by the use of intoxicating drinks a greater portion of the time from properly attending to business, or that his conduct inflicted mental anguish upon the plaintiff, is not fatal. Reading v. Reading, 95 Cal. 4.

And a complaint and finding in an action for divorce upon the ground of habitual intoxication are not defective where they set forth in the language of the Code habitual intemperance to the degree which causes great mental anguish upon the part of the plaintiff, in not stating the extent of such intoxication, and the acts done by the husband while incapacitated tending to cause such mental anguish, and showing that they were reasonably sufficient to bring about such result. Forney v. Forney, 80 Cal. 523.

So, an allegation in an action for divorce that the defendant disregarding his duties as a husband toward the plaintiff had been guilty of habitual intemperance is sufficient in the absence of a demurrer on the ground of uncertainty. Reading v. Reading, supra.

And in Myrick v. Myrick, 67 Ga. 771, the court stated as one of its reasons for holding an allegation of drunkenness as a cause for divorce insufficient, that it was not in the language of the statute.

But general testimony that the libelee in a divorce suit is an habitual drunkard is not sufficient to warrant the granting of a divorce; the facts must be given in detail so that the court may judge whether or not they amount to habitual drunkenness. Batchelder v. Batchelder, 14 N. H. 380.

And a statement by a witness in an action for divorce upon the ground of habitual drunkenness that the defendant was an habitual drunkard is a statement of a conclusion of law of which the witness is not the judge, and amounts to nothing if the facts shown do not justify the opinion. Horne v. Horne, 1 Tenn. Ch. 259.

And evidence of experts and family acquaint-as to constitute a bar to her complaint. The plaintiff claimed that although there was collusion between the detectives and the woman, yet as the plaintiff had no knowledge of it she was not affected by it, and not thereby barred from obtaining a divorce."

Messrs. Donald G. Perkins and William Belcher, for appellant:

The facts found constituted habitual intemperance within the meaning of the statute.

Standard Dict. Habitual; Com. v. Whitney, 5 Gray, 86; Com. v. McNamee, 112 Mass. 285; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 807.

The fact that the defendant attended his business quite regularly, and was drunk usually out of business hours, does not prevent it from being habitual intemperance.

Richards v. Richards, 19 Ill. App. 465.

What constitutes habitual intemperance is a question of law.

1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 818; Mayhew v. Mayhew, 61 Conn. 234.

The remedy for adultery is statutory and the action in its nature civil, and the courts proceed to grant the remedy in accordance with the fixed and established principles of law applicable to it.

Delliber v. Delliber, 9 Conn. 233; Shaw v. Shaw, 17 Conn. 193; Lyon v. Lyon, 21 Conn. 194; Steele v. Steele, 85 Conn. 54.

The connivance relied upon by the defendant as a bar is a question of fact; and the essential element therein is not found by the trial court.

The court has not found that the attorney ances as to whether the defendant is an habitual drunkard is not admissible. Golding v. Golding, 6 Mo. App. 602, Appx.

But proof of gambling by a husband in an action for divorce on the ground of drunkenness is admissible in support of charges of squandering money and debauchery. Mack v. Handy, 39 La. Ann. 491.

And evidence of intemperance since the filing of a suit for divorce on that ground is admissible, not to show a substantive cause, but a continuing habit. Ibid.

And a divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness of the husband will not be refused on the ground that the wife's testimony that his habit was acquired after marriage was not corroborated as required by Iowa Code, § 2223, providing that no divorce shall be granted on the testimony of the plaintiff alone, where the facts in the case as detailed by the other witnesses tend to show that the habit did not become habitual until some years after the marriage. Lewis v. Lewis, 75 Iowa, 200.

So, in Crichton v. Crichton, 73 Wis. 59, a judgment of the trial court denying a divorce was reversed upon the ground that the unimpeached testimony of the three children of the parties in support of the allegation of cruelty and habitual drunkenness created a clear preponderance of evidence against its findings.

The value of negative testimony in a divorce case that witnesses had not seen the defendant in a state of intoxication depends upon their intimacy with him and their intelligence and opportunity to observe, and is a question for the trial court. Walton v. Walton, 34 Kan. 196.

And negative evidence by witnesses in such an action that they had never seen the defendant intoxicated, is not sufficient to rebut affirmative evidence of those who testify to having seen him drunk. Richards v. Richards, 19 Ill. App. 465.

A decree of a circuit court denying a divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness of the defendant will not be disturbed on appeal where the evidence in the record is not such that the court can feel entirely confident what decree ought to be made. McGonegal v. McGonegal, 46 Mich. 68.

a. Defenses.

A woman who marries a man who is a slave to whiskey and morphine with knowledge of the fact assumes the risk, and will not be granted an absolute divorce because he persists in their use. Tilton v. Tilton, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 538.

And the commission of an act of adultery is a bar to a divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness for more than two years, and a wife sued by her husband for divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness may recriminate that he has been guilty of adultery. Ryan v. Ryan, 9 Mo. 539.

But the ways of life and habits of speech of the parties to an action for divorce on the ground of drunkenness and cruelty where such parties are unrefined should not be tried by the standard of cultivated people, but by the rules which respectable persons of the same condition of life would substantially acknowledge. Kline v. Kline, 50 Mich. 438.

And the fact that a wife was not of the most refined character, and not always truly lady-like in her behavior, and was at times when in anger guilty of profanity, and that she acquiesced somewhat in the drinking habits of her husband and had not remonstrated with him or rebuked him as she ought, furnishes no excuse for his abusing her in his drunken moods, and does not bar her right to a divorce for habitual drunkenness. Berryman v. Berryman, 60 Mich. 605.

So, a wife is entitled to a divorce for habitual drunkenness where the husband remains an habitual drunkard for the statutory period though he then ceases to be one, but if she voluntarily continues the marital relation after he so ceases she thereby condones the offense and nullifies her right to a divorce; but where he continues to be an habitual drunkard the offense is continuous, and the wife may break off at any time and establish her right to a divorce. Moore v. Moore, 41 Mo. App. 176.

And the fact that a wife of an habitual drunkard continues to live with him after the expiration of the statutory period, hoping to reclaim and reform him, will not debar her from subsequently obtaining a divorce upon the ground of his habitual drunkenness where he persists in his habit. Ibid.

And letters from a wife to her husband, from whom she had separated on account of his habitual drunkenness, filled with expressions of love and interest, and disclosing that she looked upon their interests as joint and identical, and containing no intimation that she expected their marriage to be dissolved, do not amount to a condonation of the offense of drunkenness so as to bar her right to proceed for divorce. Ibid.

And a meeting between a husband and wife who had separated on account of his habitual drunkenness, and an understanding between them that he was to furnish her a designated sum of money per month and deed her some property and stop drinking, and kind and affectionate letters written to him by her in pursuance of such an agreement, do not amount to a condonation of the offense of habitual drunkenness which will bar her action for divorce, where he fails to carry out the arrangement and continues his habits of intoxication. Ibid.

So, a wife who dismisses an action for divorce upon the agreement of her husband to convey certain property to her and to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquor need not, after his breach of employed the woman, or knew that she was employed; and even though it may be claimed that the authority to him to act in his discretion was broad enough to authorize him to employ a woman for that purpose, still the fact must be found that he did employ the woman or authorize it, otherwise there is a break in the line of authority from the plaintiff.

Quinebaug Bank v. Brewster, 80 Conn. 564; 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 6, 7, 9; Wilson v. Watson, 154 Mass. 195, 12 L. R. A. 524; Robbins v. Robbins, 140 Mass. 581, 54 Am. Rep. 488.

Messrs. Brandegee, Noyes, & Brandegee, for appellee:

Habitual intemperance is a "condition" founded upon facts, evidenced solely by testimony, and in each individual case to be determined by the trial court upon the evidence before it.

In the case of Trumpy v. Trumpy, 48 Conn. 278, this court refused to review a decision of the trial judge upon this precise question.

Connivance of the attorney was a bar to the principals obtaining a divorce, procured by means of such connivance.

We claim it to be contrary to public policy that a divorce should be granted in this state upon the testimony of sneaks and panders for a marital offense brought about by their own criminal conduct, and while acting as agents and attorneys of the petitioner.

Divorce in this state is not a matter of right, but of grace.

It cannot be had by the procurement or consent of the parties; it is only granted upon such the promise to abstain from the habit of drunkenness, convey back the property in order to give her a standing in court in a subsequent action for divorce upon the same ground. Lewis v. Lewis, 75 Iowa, 200.

And where such agreement is reduced to writing, but the agreement to abstain was inadvertently omitted, such agreement should be regarded as part of the settlement; and where he subsequently breaks his promise to abstain, parol evidence is admissible in a new action for divorce upon the same ground to show the real condition of the agreement and that such agreement was not a bar to the new action. Ibid.

1. Incidents and effects.

The court in granting a divorce exercises a discretion in awarding the custody of minor children having regard to the condition and fitness of the parents and the interests of the children, the power being reserved to alter or modify its decree in this respect, and it will interfere for the due protection and education of children, with the ordinary rights of parents as natural guardians, where the father is guilty of gross ill treatment or cruelty or in a constant habit of drunkenness, or otherwise acts in a manner injurious to their moral interests. McGill v. McGill, 19 Fla. 841.

And a decree of divorce against a wife on the charge of habitual drunkenness, awarding to her the care, custody, nurture, and education of two minor children, will not be reversed on appeal where they were of the age which especially demands a mother's care, unless it affirmatively appears in the record that there was no evidence of the unfitness of the father to take charge of them, and it will be assumed that if the mother's habits of drunkenness are continued and the father should appear to be a proper person to have charge of them the court would modify its order and give him the custody after they had passed the age demanding a mother's care. Brandon v. Bradon, 14 Kan. 342.

So, a woman is entitled to dower under the Maine Act of 1838, chap. 342, providing for a divorce from her husband on the ground that he had become a confirmed habitual drunkard, but the statute has no retroactive effect. Curtis v. Hobart, 41 Me. 280.

And where at the time of the marriage the wife has a stock in trade which by the joint industry of herself and her husband is increased, the stock thus created is community property, but on the separation of the property between them on suit for divorce by the wife for habitual drunkenness of the husband, it is chargeable with the value of the stock which she had on hand at the time of the marriage. Werner v. Kelly, 9 La. Ann. 60.

II. Drunkenness as affecting cruel and inhuman treatment.

a. Drunkenness as cruelty.

Drunkenness is not by itself sufficient to entitle a party to a divorce upon the ground of cruelty and inhuman treatment. Anonymous, 17 Abb. N. C. 221; Mason v. Mason, 1 Bdw. Ch. 278.

And the mere unhappiness of an ill-assorted marriage, or the destruction of domestic comfort by the vice of drunkenness, is not sufficient to warrant a judicial separation on that ground. Hudson v. Hudson, 3 Swab. & T. 314, 38 L. J. Mat. N. S. 5, 9 Jur. N. S. 1802, 9 L. T. N. S. 579, 12 Week. Rep. 216.

And adulterous conduct which falls short of actual adultery, and excessive drinking which does not amount to habitual intemperance within the divorce law, do not constitute a cause of action for divorce for extreme cruelty, as in a legal sense extreme cruelty must be something different from any other cause for divorce, and constitute a separate and distinct cause of action. Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 203.

So, drunkenness, though accompanied by acts of considerable violence, is not a ground for a decree of judicial separation,—especially where the real ground for an application is that the husband wishes to get rid of a drunken wife. Scott v. Scott, 29 L. J. Mat. N. S. 64.

And a party to a marriage is not obliged to suffer two years of extreme and repeated cruelty before obtaining a divorce for that cause because the cruelty is caused by habitual intemperance and the statute provides for divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness for the space of two years. Harman v. Harman, 16 Ill. 85.

So, drunkenness, though repeated, cannot be considered as warranting a divorce on the ground of indignities rendering the condition of the injured party intolerable, where the statute also provides for divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness for two years. Kempf v. Kempf, 34 Mo. 211.

And excessively vicious conduct on the part of a wife which will warrant a divorce within the meaning of the statute is not established by proof that she had become addicted to the habit of occasional intoxication, and of family broils and coarse, revolting language on her part upon these occasions, and that she had on several occasions offered personal violence to her husband while intoxicated when he interfered between her and his mother, and of reprehensible methods resorted to by her to procure liquor to gratify her thirst. Shutt v. Shutt, 71 Md. 193.

b. Drunkenness connected with cruelty.

The right of a wife to relief is not affected by the fact that conduct on the part of her husband entitling her to a divorce for cruelty of treatment terms, by such courts, and upon such considerations, as the state sees fit.

It is the legal dissolution of that status which is begun, continued, and ended solely under the supervision of the state.

The language of our statute was intended to reserve to the court a "sound discretion" to withhold a divorce, even in a case proved, where public policy is opposed to its being granted.

Dutcher v. Dutcher, 89 Wis. 651; Trumpy v. Trumpy, supra; Morrison v. Morrison, 186 Mass. 810; Sparhawk v. Sparhawk, 120 Mass. 392; Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 228, 28 Am. Rep. 129; Sewall v. Sewall, 122 Mass. 161, 23 Am. Rep. 299.

The exercise of such discretion, unless was the result of intemperance. Bowie v. Bowie, 3 Md. Ch. 51; McVickar v. McVickar, 48 N. J. Eq. 490.

Unless the wife was induced to consent to the habitual drunkenness. McVickar v. McVickar, supra.

In McVickar v. McVickar, supra, Laing v. Laing, 21 N. J. Eq. 248, infra, was distinguished, the court saying that it is a question of degree to be determined upon the facts of each case, and that in its opinion acts of cruelty so often repeated as in this case would have induced the chancellor if they had existed in that case to have granted a divorce.

The fact that the cruelty of a husband towards his wife which will justify a divorce was caused by a frenzy of intoxication is no mitigation of the offense where habitual drunkenness is itself a sufficient ground for divorce. Lee v. Lee, 3 Wash. 236.

And acts, language, or conduct which would amount to cruelty within the meaning of the statute providing for divorce on that ground would be aggravated and not excused by intoxication,—especially if it were excessive and habitual. Camp v. Camp, 18 Tex. 523, dictum.

So, acts of violence by a husband toward his wife considered in the aggregate and in connection with other misconduct, such as drunkenness, may be sufficient to warrant a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of cruelty, though each act of violence taken alone might not constitute cruelty. Power v. Power, 11 Jur. N. S. 800, 4 Swab. & T. 178, 24 L. J. Mat. N. S. 187, 18 Week. Rep. 1113.

And cruelty upon the part of a husband towards an amiable and inoffensive wife while drunk is a ground for divorce, though he was good natured and kind when sober and pleased. Lockridge v. Lockridge, 3 Dana, 28, 28 Am. Dec. 52.

And intemperance on the part of a wife which entirely deprives her of power to control her passions and puts her in such a state of mind that she is in the habit of assaulting her husband, is a ground for a judicial separation in his favor, where their difficulties were the consequence, and not the cause, of her intemperance. White v. White, 1 Swab. & T. 562, 6 Jur. N. S. 23, 1 L. T. N. S. 197.

And see also Mack v. Handy, Leake v. Linton, and Williams v. Goss, supra, I. c.

But a wife is not entitled to divorce and alimony on the ground of barbarous and inhuman treatment endangering her life because the husband's conversations and deportment were not always characterized by the delicacy and tenderness which might be expected of a prudent and affectionate husband, and during occasional paroxysms of passion produced or aggravated by the use of ardent spirits he was sometimes vulgar, profane, and boisterous. Bogges v. Bogges, 4 Dana, 808.

And the use of abusive language to a wife by a husband, and habits of constant intoxication, do not amount to legal cruelty. C— v. C—, 28 Eng. L. & Eq. 608.

plainly and palpably abused, will not be reviewed by this court.

Chapman v. Loomis, 86 Conn. 460.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Habitual intemperance, as a cause for which a divorce might be granted, was first named in this state by a statute enacted in 1843, where it was coupled with intolerable cruelty. Precisely what constitutes habitual intemperance, within the meaning of that statute, it is not easy to define. It may, however, be safely assumed that the purpose of the act was not primarily to promote temperance or to reform the offender, but to preserve the peace, comfort, safety, happiness, and prosperity of the

And habits of profanity upon the part of a husband towards his wife furnish no ground for a divorce, though when taken in connection with indulgence in habits of intoxication they may be considered as giving color to his conduct. Powers v. Powers, 20 Neb. 529.

So, habitual drunkenness accompanied by annoyances and extraordinary conduct on the part of a husband does not constitute cruelty justifying a divorce where he is not charged with acts of violence or with having threatened violence. Brown v. Brown, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 44.

And ill-treatment of a wife by a husband during spells of inebriation and proceeding from it will not justify a divorce in the absence of evidence of a fixed purpose on his part to treat her amiss, or that he no longer entertained affection for her. Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324.

And a single blow given in a fit of passion or in a drunken spree when reason was dethroned but subsequently repented of does not amount to extreme cruelty warranting a divorce, and would not amount to it in many situations and circumstances of life even if repeated several times in the course of a few years. Laing v. Laing, 21 N. J. Eq. 248.

Nor is a charge of cruelty of treatment by a wife of her husband in the sense of bodily harm or serious danger to his health supported by proof that she had acquired habits of intoxication, and of occasional outbreaks of passion and violence, but that such outbreaks never occurred except when she was under the influence of drink and without self-control, and that the only personal violence offered occurred on two or three occasions when he interposed between her and his mother who lived in the house with them. Shutt v. Shutt, 71 Md. 193.

Nor will a divorce in favor of a husband against his wife for adultery be denied on account of the cruelty of the husband where the wife's drunken habits were the cause of the husband's violence. Pearman v. Pearman, 1 Swab. & T. 601, 29 L. J. Mat. N. S. 54, 8 Week. Rep. 274.

So, that a husband had become almost a habitual drunkard for a few months, and that he neglected to provide for his wife and family, do not constitute cruel and inhuman treatment for which a divorce can be had. Camp v. Camp, 18 Tex. 523.

And occasional sallies of passion or rudeness of language and conduct tending to wound the moral and mental feelings caused by indulgence in intoxicating liquors or other causes, does not amount to legal cruelty within the meaning of the divorce law, so long as bodily harm is not threatened and there is nothing to create serious apprehension of personal injury or danger. Mason v. Mason, 1 Edw. Ch. 278.

And see also Holland v. Holland, supra, I. b. Mere intemperance in a husband's habits, harshness of manner, and indecency of conduct are not nonoffending party, and of the family of which they are together the members and parents. In a note upon this statute, left by the late Chief Justice Church, he said: "The habitual use of intoxicating liquor, though producing excitement, will not justify a divorce. The habit must be so gross as to produce suffering or want in the family to a degree which cannot be reasonably borne." We are not aware that any court in this state has attempted to define these words. The expression is one of those terms which, like the expression "intolerable cruelty," often arise in the law, and which cannot well be defined in advance. They must be applied by the prior to cases as they arise, by inclusion or exclusion, and the existence of the condition in question decided as a matter of fact. The language of the statutes in other states, by which the use of spirituous liquors is made a cause for divorce, is so divergent as to afford but little aid in the construction of our own. In California it has been held that a fixed habit of drinking to excess, to such a degree as to disqualify a person from attending to his business during the principal portion of the time usually devoted to business, is such "habitual intemperance" as is made a ground of divorce. Mahone v. Mahone, 19 Cal. 626, 81 Am. Dec. 91. "Habitual intemperance" is a condition, and when any person gets into that condition he is said to be "habitually intemperate." These latter words are frequently used in policies of insurance, and in various cases arising on such policies these words have been the subject of judicial discussion. In the case of Northwestern *ufficient to warrant a divorce for cruelty; there must be something more than mere injury to a person's sensibility or sense of delicacy. Waskam v. Waskam, 31 Miss. 154.

Though the propensity to drink to intoxication is not of itself a ground for separation, however if the consequences of intoxication produce bodily injury or endanger the wife's personal safety the court will interfere. Mason v. Mason, supra.

And bodily injury inflicted on a wife by her husband while suffering from attacks of delirium tremens is a sufficient ground for judicial separation where the court is satisfied that though the acute disorder may have subsided, the wife could not cohabit with him without incurring great peril of a renewal of such bodily injury. Marsh v. Marsh, 28 L. J. Mat. N. S. 12, 1 Swab. & T. 312, 5 Jur. N. S. 46.

And a decree for alimony will be made where it appears that the husband had for several years indulged in the use of intoxicating liquors to such an extent as to have produced repeated attacks of delirium tremens during which he became very violent by reason of which the wife had been compelled on one occasion to go to a neighbor's house, remaining all night, and upon her return he assaulted her with a stick and kicked at her, conducting himself in a violent manner, where she swears that she was apprehensive of further illtreatment, though this was the first instance in which he had ever struck her. Rodman v. Rodman, 20 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 423.

So, the fact that a husband had become very intemperate and while under the influence of liquor treated his wife in a cruel and barbarous manner, sometimes ejecting her from his premises and at other times using toward her the most vulgar and offensive language and making false accusations against her, entitles the wife to a divorce upon the ground of inhuman treatment. Allen v. Allen, 31 Mo. 479.

And that a man had been in the habit of becoming intoxicated at frequent intervals and so remaining for a period of several days together, during which he was extremely abusive and insulting to his wife, accusing her of infidelity without cause, and frequently threatening her with violence, and on one occasion violently assaulting her, and several times endeavoring to commit suicide, justifies a decree of divorce on the ground of cruelty. Lee v. Lee, 3 Wash. 226.

And evidence that the defendant was habitually intoxicated and was quarrelsome and profane and dangerous while in that condition, and that he had used profane and abusive language towards his wife and threatened to inflict personal violence upon her, and had endeavored to execute his threats by chasing her and attempting to strike her with a chair, and had on several occasions kicked her, establishes a case of legal cruelty which will entitle her to a divorce. Hughes v. Hughes, 19 Ala. 307.

And a complaint in such an action charging the defendant with habitual intoxication and violence resulting therefrom as evidenced by threats and abuse, and alleging his use of abusive language towards his wife compelling her through fear to seek safety in quitting his presence, and threats of personal violence such as would endanger her personal safety, and specifying particular instances of misconduct, is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to relief. Ibid.

So, proof that a husband drank at times to excess, and sometimes took from ten to fifteen drinks a day, and that his conduct seemed affected by the use of liquor, and that when under the influence of liquor he was boisterous, quarrelsome, oppressive, and at least disgustingly unpleasant, and that he indulged in habits of profanity and would walk the floor and flourish his cane and act as though he would strike his wife, and that she would sometimes sit up all night thinking he would kill her before morning, justifies a divorce for extreme cruelty under the Nebraska statute. Powers v. Powers, 20 Neb. 529.

And evidence that a husband was in a state of almost constant intoxication so gross as to be at times unfitted for labor, and that what little he earned went in part for drink, and that his wife was often left without the commonest necessities of life, and that he habitually found fault with her and called her foul names and charged her publicly with the commission of criminal acts and consorting with other men, and frequently threatened personal violence, and on one occasion actually attempted and did to some extent accomplish it, drawing a razor and threatened to cut her into mince-meat, and shoving her off of the porch, justifies a divorce on the ground of indignities to the person rendering her condition intolerable and her life burdensome. Mason v. Mason, 121 Pa. 161.

So, where a husband becomes frequently drunk and while in that condition chokes his wife and grossly accuses her of unchastity and locks her up and threatens to smash her head with a brick, she is entitled to a divorce on the ground of inhuman treatment endangering her life. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 53 Iowa, 511, 35 Am. Rep. 240.

And evidence tending to show that the defendant in a divorce case was an habitual drunkard and when intoxicated was violent, profane, and grossly indecent in his language and conduct, and that he frequently applied violent epithets to his wife and daughters and threatened to kill them and on several occasions pushed her about in anger, is sufficient to show a cause of cruelty and inhuman treatment which will warrant a divorce. Crichton v. Crichton, 73 Wis. 59.

Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Muskegon Nat. Bank, 13 U. S. 501-505, 80 L. ed. 1100-1102, the Supreme Court of the United States, by Justice Miller, said: "The whole case turned, so far as the jury was concerned, upon the true definitions of the words 'habitually intemperate.' . . . We do not know of any established legal definition of those words. As they relate to the customs and habits of men generally in regard to the use of intoxicating drinks, and as the observation and experience of one man on that subject are as good as those of another of equal capacity and opportunities, their true meaning and significance would seem to be a question addressed rather to the jury than to the court. While there may be on the one hand such a clear case of intemperate habits as to justify the court in saying that such and such facts constitute a condition of habitual intemperance, or, on the other hand, such an entire absence of any proof, beyond an occasional indulgence in the use of ardent spirits, as to warrant the opposite conclusion, yet the main field of inquiry, and the determination of the question within it, must be submitted to the jury, and the question on this submission must be decided by them." The case of Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Foley, 105 U. S. 850, 28 L. ed. 1055, was on a policy of this kind. The court below had instructed the jury that if the habits of the insured "in the usual, ordinary, and everyday routine of his life were temperate," he was not "intemperate," within the meaning of the policy, although he had "had an attack of delirium tremens resulting from an exceptional indulgence;" and this instruction was sustained.

And evidence that a husband had contracted irregular and intemperate habits, and that on a trivial dispute he threw hot brandy and water in his wife's face, and that he struck her upon her refusal to clean his boots, and cut her hand by forcibly taking a knife away from her, and that he pulled her down stairs and injured her ankle and threw a jug full of water at her which cut her fingers, and that he had frequently thrown cold water over her,—justifies a decree dissolving the marriage. Waddell v. Waddell, 2 Swab. & T. 584.

And in Wachholz v. Wachholz, 75 Wis. 377, it was held that where a husband had for three years given himself up to dissipation and neglecting his family and business and spent much of his time in saloons, and had squandered a large amount of money, and had acquired a thirst for drink, and his temper had become soured, and he often treated his wife unkindly and swore at her and twice struck her in anger, and financial ruin was imminent, and she felt with good reason that she could no longer live with him, she is entitled to a divorce for cruelty and inhuman treatment.

So, in Clutch v. Clutch, 1 N. J. Eq. 474, where the husband was proved to be an intemperate and grossly abusive man, and that in one instance he turned his wife and children out of doors compelling her to take refuge in her father's house, and in another he forcibly turned her out of doors, and frequently refused to provide for them the common necessities of life, and she exhibited marks and bruises upon her person which she represented to be the effect of his violence, a decree of separation for the term of three years was granted upon the theory that the case was not one of the most aggravated character, and that there might be hope of reformation and reconciliation.

a. Drunkenness as evidence of cruelty.

Though habits of intoxication on the part of a husband do not form sufficient ground for a decree of separation or alimony in favor of the wife, they are material to be considered in connection with other objectionable acts on his part as tending to show a greater liability of a recurrence of ill-treatment than if he were sober. Rodman v. Rodman, 20 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 428.

And evidence of the drunkenness of a husband, in connection with evidence of personal violence or threats by him, may be considered on application of the wife for a divorce on the ground of extreme and repeated cruelty, as tending to explain the nature and character of the violence and threats. Coursey v. Coursey, 60 Ill. 126; Harman v. Harman, 16 Ill. 85.

And habits of profanity on the part of a husband, though furnishing no ground for divorce, may be taken into consideration in connection with habits of intoxication, as giving color to his conduct. Powers v. Powers, 20 Neb. 529.

III. Drunkenness as affecting desertion.

Where a husband continues his habits of intoxication to the extent of rendering it unsafe for his wife to live with him for the statutory period authorizing a divorce for desertion after her separation from him on that account, she is entitled to a divorce upon the ground of desertion. McVickar v. McVickar, 46 N. J. Eq. 490.

And drunkenness which disqualifies a husband to discharge his marital duties or obligations, as, for instance, which compels the wife to leave him, constitutes a degree of cruelty in itself which if continued for a great length of time, as for three years, in analogy to the time prescribed by the statute for abandonment, would warrant a divorce on that ground. Camp v. Camp, 18 Tex. 522, dictum.

So, a woman who was compelled to separate from her husband because of his drunkenness and his neglect to furnish her and her child with the means of support, and returned to her father in another state where she remained for the statutory period, is entitled to a divorce under the New Hampshire statute upon the ground that he has willingly absented himself from her for three years together without making suitable provision for her support. James v. James, 55 N. H. 266.

And habits of intoxication so gross and confirmed as to render a continuance of cohabitation unendurable might justify the wife in separating from the husband in Massachusetts, although for want of proof that such habits had been contracted since marriage or of cruel treatment they would not amount to one of the statutory causes of divorce. Lyster v. Lyster, 111 Mass. 337.

But intemperance and improvidence on the part of a husband, on account of which his wife refuses to live with him, do not render the separation a desertion by the husband within the meaning of the divorce law. Plimley v. Plimley, 35 N. J. Eq. 18; Laing v. Laing, 21 N. J. Eq. 248.

Nor does it amount to extreme cruelty that would justify a divorce a mensa et thoro. Laing v. Laing, supra.

But where a husband, from whom his wife has separated because of his habits of intoxication making it unsafe for her to live with him, so far reforms as to render it reasonably safe for her to resume cohabitation, it is his duty to seek her out and manifest his reformation, and if he fails to do so and voluntarily prolongs the separation for the statutory period after his reformation, the wife being ignorant of the change, he is guilty of desertion which will warrant a divorce on that ground. McVickar v. McVickar, supra. F. H. B.

The finding in this case shows that the defendant, "about once in three weeks, became intoxicated, during the evening, to such an extent that the next morning he did not go as usual to his work at the store where he was employed as a clerk," and had continued to do so for a period of two years. While this condition of the defendant very likely caused annoyance and vexation to the plaintiff, and possibly grief and humiliation, it does not appear to have occasioned any loss of position to the defendant, or any trouble between him and his employer, nor does it appear to have been so gross or so long continued as to have produced want or suffering in the family. We fail to see in this case that the superior court committed any error in law in this respect.

The trial court held that the act of adultery proved was one brought about by the connivance and procurement of the plaintiff, acting through her attorneys or agents. The appellant strenuously insists that this finding is not supported by the evidence. Connivance is the corrupt consenting of a married party to that conduct of the other of which afterwards complaint is made. It bars the right of divorce because no injury is received; for what a person has consented to, he cannot set up as an injury. Connivance is a thing of the intent resting in the mind. It is the consenting. But the connivance may be the passive permitting of the adultery or other misconduct, as well as the active procuring of its commission. If the mind consents, that is connivance. Ross v. Ross, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 784; Pierce v. Pierce, 8 Pick. 299, 15 Am. Dec. 210. The connivance of the plaintiff is established as a fact upon evidence to the admission of which no objection was made, and we suppose this to be a conclusion which this court cannot revise. The argument of the appellant is founded on that part of the finding which says that "the plaintiff did not give to her said attorney, or to any of the detectives employed by him, any direct or specific authority or direction, as distinguished from the general authority hereinbefore set out, to employ said woman for the purposes for which she was employed, or to employ any woman for such purpose, and the plaintiff had no actual personal knowledge that the woman found with her husband was one employed by her agents, in the manner in which, or for the purposes for which, she was employed." The argument is that this finding is inconsistent with the conclusion to which the court came, because it shows, as she claims, that her mind never consented to the adultery of her husband. This argument cannot be maintained, in view of the other facts of the case. Connivance can usually be proved only by proving facts from which, with their circumstances, it may be inferred. From the finding before us it appears that the plaintiff had suspected her husband of infidelity, although she did not suspect any particular woman. She was desirous of obtaining a divorce. She consulted an attorney in Boston, who advised her to employ detectives to watch her husband. She authorized that attorney to employ such detectives for that purpose as he saw fit, to procure such evidence as in his judgment was necessary, giving him full authority in the premises. Detectives were employed by him, and sent from Boston to New London. Among other things done by this attorney and the detectives he hired, a lewd woman was employed to lure the defendant by her wiles into an act of adultery, or into a compromising situation from which the inference of adultery would be drawn, so arranged that his discovery would be made. This lewd woman came to New London, commenced her practices on the defendant, succeeded in attracting his attention, and in drawing him into the precise sort of an act for which she was employed. During the progress of her efforts the plaintiff was informed by the detectives that her husband had been seen with a woman at night in the streets of the city, and on the night arranged for the discovery she went with the detectives to the room where the defendant and the lewd woman were together. There was sufficient to justify the superior court in finding that the plaintiff must have known that the movements of this lewd woman were in some way governed by the detectives who she knew had been employed by her attorney, and who gave her the information which they did, by which she was enabled to confront her husband while in that woman's company. Soon thereafter the plaintiff caused her petition for a divorce to be brought, praying for a divorce based on the act she had so discovered. Her conduct then and ever since might well be deemed to cast a reflex light on her knowledge of the purposes for which the detectives were employed, and her consent to the artifices which they practiced. These are the facts and circumstances from which the trial court held that the plaintiff was barred of all right to have a divorce for the acts of adultery she had proved. In the light of the authorities we have cited, we think the decision of the court on this part of the case should not be disturbed. Morrison v. Morrison, 136 Mass. 810; Myers v. Myers, 41 Barb. 114; Hedden v. Hedden, 21 N. J. Eq. 61; Austin v. Austin, 10 Conn. 221; Cairns v. Cairns, 109 Mass. 406; Masten v. Masten, 15 N. H. 159; Gower v. Gower, L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. 428. In this last case it was held that, "if a person employed by a husband to watch his wife for the purpose of obtaining evidence of her adultery brings about an act of adultery, the husband cannot obtain a decree of dissolution [of the marriage] on the ground of such adultery, although he may not have directed or authorized his agent to bring it about." The petitioner admitted that he had employed one Williams to watch the respondent, and to obtain evidence of her adultery, but denied that he had ever instigated Williams to induce her to commit adultery, or sanctioned his taking any step with that view. The evidence showed that the act of adultery on which the petitioner relied had been brought about by the contrivance of Williams. In deciding the case the judge ordinary said: "I think it quite possible that he [the petitioner] did not tell Williams to do what Williams appears to have done; but, at the same time, he never warned him not to do what a man of his class and character would be likely to do. The very first thing which would occur to such a man, if evidence were not forthcoming, would be to make an occasion which should furnish that evidence. In that point of view the petitioner is responsible for the act of his agent. But I decide the case on the broader ground that the petitioner cannot obtain the benefit of redress in this court for an act of adultery brought about by his own agent." Other cases supporting the same doctrine are Williamson v. Williamson, L. R. 7 Prob. Div. 76; Hawkins v. Hawkins, L. R. 10 Prob. Div. 177; Heyes v. Heyes, L. R. 13 Prob. Div. 11.

The state makes itself a party to all marriages, in that it requires the marriage contract to be entered into before officers designated by itself, and with certain formalities which it has prescribed. This state does this, not alone that children may be born and properly reared, but that the parties to the marriage may themselves be the better citizens; it being in accordance with the experience of all mankind that human beings are happier, and are better citizens and better disposed towards the state, when married and surrounded by the ties of a family and with children, than when they remain unmarried. The state desires good citizens. It regulates divorce procedure in its own interest. A divorce cannot be had except in that court which the state authorizes, and for those causes only, and with those formalities, which it has by statute prescribed. As the state favors marriages for the reasons stated, so the state does not favor divorces, and only permits a divorce to be granted when those conditions are found to exist, in respect to one or the other of the married parties, which seem to the legislature to make it probable that the interests of society will be better served, and that parties will be happier, and so the better citizens, separate, than if compelled to remain together. The state allows divorces, not as a punishment to the offending party nor as a favor to the innocent party, but because the state believes its own prosperity will thereby be promoted. Seeley's Appeal, 56 Conn. 302, 206. The forms of the law of divorce should never be allowed to minister to the caprices of fickle-minded persons, or to the revenges of the disappointed or vindictive, and least of all to the passions of the incontinent. Nor under any circumstances should they be used in fraud of the statute allowing divorces, nor of the court. To the end that any and all attempts to use the forms of the law of divorce for any of the purposes indicated, shall be discovered and defeated, all courts possessing divorce jurisdiction are vested with a discretion. A wise discretion should always be exercised in administering the law of divorce, lest its spirit be disobeyed by a too narrow adherence to its letter. "Courts are the mere instruments of the law, and can will nothing. When they are said to exercise a discretion, it is a mere legal discretion, a discretion to be exercised in discerning the course prescribed by law; and when that is discerned, it is the duty of the court to follow it. Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge; always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the legislature; or, in other words, to the will of the law." Chief Justice Marshall, in Osborn v. Bank of United States, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738, 868, 6 L. ed. 204, 234.

There is no error.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

SAVANNAH, FLORIDA, & WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Pf. in Err.,

v.

John J. WALLER et al.

(97 Ga. 164.)

1. Mere permission by, or implied license from, a railway company for children to enter its yard for the purpose of carrying meals to their fathers, there being a perfectly safe way for the children to pass and repass without going under freight cars standing upon tracks in the yard, will not subject the company to liability for injuries caused to one of these children by pushing upon him a car under which he had suddenly gone for the purpose of getting a ball which had been thrown there, but for the throwing of which the company was in no way responsible; and it not appearing that the company's servants by whom the car was put in motion knew, had reason to know, or were in a position to discover that the child was under it at the time.

2. The sudden throwing of the ball, the child's being attracted thereby, and his rapidly following it under the car, all together, constituted an emergency which the company could not reasonably have anticipated or guarded against; and consequently the unexpected catastrophe which resulted from the movement of the car at the very moment when the child was exposed to danger was a mere casualty or accident, for which the company should not be held liable.

3. Where, by permission of its officers, the yard of a railroad company, where its trains are constantly drilling, is frequented at a given hour daily by young children, who come there on lawful business, such permission, when acted upon regularly for a number of years, is at least notice to the company of the probable presence of such children at such place at such hour, and, in the running and drilling of its cars during the time when they are usually present, the company is bound to exercise such care as would afford reasonable protection to any of such children as, happening to be upon the yard, might have casually strayed, or by some object been allured, upon one of its tracks; and the measure of precaution so to be taken is to be estimated with reference to the apparent peril of the position, coupled with the capacity of the child to know and appreciate its danger, and the absence, or probable absence, of such discretion as would enable it to take proper measures for its own protection.

4. Where, in an action against a railroad company for damages for personal injuries inflicted, it appears that in switching its cars a train of the company was run backward through its yard at a time during the day when, with permission of the officers of the company, young children, not of sufficient discretion to take precautionary measures for their own safety, were accustomed to assemble there, and that one of such children, running under a stationary car to get a ball which had been thrown there, was run over and injured in consequence of this car being suddenly put in motion by the backing train coming in contact with it, and where it further appears that no lookout was stationed upon the rear of said backward-moving train, or elsewhere thereon, so as to command a view of its movements, and give notice to those in charge of the engine of danger to one of such children who may have either casually strayed upon the track, or who might by any means have been allured thereon; and where it further appears that no other equivalent precautionary measures were taken to prevent injuries which might have been probably thus inflicted,—a verdict of the jury finding against the defendant upon the question of negligence, and awarding damages for the injury, is supported by the evidence, and is not contrary to law.

ERROR to the City Court for Savannah in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts as stated in the official report were as follows:

The plaintiff, a boy of seven years and nine months, was caught under a moving car of the railroad company, and his right leg was so crushed as to render necessary an amputation just below the knee. His father was employed by the company as a laborer in repairing cars, his place of work at the time being in the company's yard in the city of Savannah, on the other side of the track where the injury occurred from that where his home was situated. For about a month the plaintiff had been bringing his father's dinner, and was accustomed to go across the track for this purpose. This practice by plaintiff and others was known to the company and the time allowed for dinner (thirty minutes) did not admit of the father's going to his home for the same. On the day in question, about 1 o'clock, the plaintiff had carried the dinner and was returning. At the same time three employees of the company, other than his father, were engaged in throwing and catching a ball from either side of the track where the injury occurred. As plaintiff approached, walking on the space between two tracks, the ball was thrown towards one of the men, who failed to catch it, and it bounced upon a cross-tie, and [went under the end of the last of a number of freight cars standing still upon the track. One of the men said to plaintiff, "Sonny, get that ball." He thereupon ran for it, and it seems that some negro boys were running for it at the same time. Plaintiff went upon the track, and then under the end of the car, putting his foot upon the brake beam, and reaching for the ball. While in this situation the standing cars were struck at the other end of the train by a number of other cars pushed by the company's engine for the purpose of making a coupling. They rolled 20 or more feet, and plaintiff was knocked down two or three times in the effort to escape, and succeeded in doing so only with the loss of his leg. He brought suit for damages, and obtained a verdict against the company for $4,000. The company excepted to the overruling of its general demurrer to the declaration, to the denial of a nonsuit, and to the refusal of a new trial.

Mr. William W. Gordon, Jr., for defendants in error:

The duty that the law imposed upon the defendant may be determined by the character under which the plaintiff came upon defendant's premises, which was either as trespasser, i. e., bare licensee, or licensee by inducement or implied invitation.

It may be left to the jury to infer that the defendant knew, what was a matter of common knowledge (and also recognized by law), that a child is indiscreet and will be tempted to go about or upon dangerous machinery, and will be attracted by anything in motion, especially a ball, to go to places against the danger of which its immature judgment interposes no warning or defense.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The nature of this case may be gathered from the recitals in the headnotes; there being no substantial conflict, in so far as they relate to the facts, between the one announced by a majority of the court, and those in which Justice Atkinson expresses his dissent to the judgment rendered. We differed, however, in applying the law to the facts.

Unless the railway company was negligent relatively to the child who was injured, he was not entitled to recover. It was not, as to him, negligent unless it violated some duty which it owed to him with reference to the particular act by which the injury was occasioned. It cannot be denied that a railway company has an undoubted right to shift and move freight cars at its pleasure upon the tracks in its yard, nor that, under ordinary circumstances, it would be under no obligation to keep a watch upon the movement of these cars for the purpose of preventing an injury to a child, or any other person, who might casually happen to be upon one of the tracks when a car was set in motion. It is insisted, however, that as the plaintiff was one of a large number of children who were permitted by the company to enter its yard for the purpose of carrying meals to their fathers, who were employees in 84 L. R. A.

the service of the company, and that as it was known to the company these children were likely to be in the yard at or about the dinner hour and would probably go under the standing cars, it owed to them a duty of seeing to it that such cars were not suddenly put in motion so as to endanger their lives or limbs. We do not think that the mere permission by the company for these children to enter its yard for the purpose stated carried with it, under all conceivable circumstances, a duty so sweeping as this; there being a perfectly safe way for the children to pass and repass, while in the yard, without going upon the tracks where cars were standing, and no occasion for their going under the cars at all. Certainly the invitation by the company to the children, if the above-mentioned permission or license may properly be so termed, did not contemplate that they should go under or so near to these cars as to become in danger. But it is said the company might have foreseen that because of their indiscretion and want of judgment, arising from their tender years, these children were liable to exceed the license they actually had, and that the company ought, accordingly, to have taken the proper precautions to insure their safety in case they should do so. Granting that this would be true, if the injury to the plaintiff had happened while things were going on in the usual and ordinary way in the company's yard, we feel constrained to hold that this particular injury was at last the result of a mere casualty. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the company was under a duty, in the usual course of its business in its yard, to see that a car was not put in motion while one of these children was under it, or just in front of it, it would then have to take the chances of becoming liable for an injury resulting in this way. But we do not think the company was under the burden of taking all the chances of what occurred in the present case. It had nothing to do with the throwing of the ball. It could not foresee or prevent the ball's going under the car, or anticipate that the child would be attracted by it and would rapidly follow it. It does not appear that the servants of the company by whom the car was put in motion actually knew, had reason to know, or were in a position to discover, that the child was under the car at the time it received the impetus which sent it forward. Indeed, the engineer handling the locomotive attached to the train of cars which came in contact with the standing car was a considerable distance from the latter when the train struck it. Taking all the facts together, the chief justice and the writer are of the opinion that they constituted an emergency not reasonably to be anticipated, and that the unexpected catastrophe resulting from the movement of the car at the precise moment when the plaintiff was exposed to danger should be treated as a mere accident. The particular combination of circumstances by which his injury was occasioned would very rarely exist. Just such a thing as this would not probably occur once in ten years, though hundreds of children should during that period enter the company's yard for the purpose above mentioned. It cannot, we are quite sure, be fairly insisted that, to guard against and prevent a calamity of this kind, any higher or greater degree of diligence should be required of the company than ordinary diligence. There is no rule of law, nor any precedent, which, in our opinion, would justify a court in holding that the company, in view of its relations to the plaintiff, under all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, was bound to exercise more than ordinary care for his safety. Assuming the correctness of this position, it follows that if, in order to make the company liable, the rule of extraordinary diligence must be put upon it, there could be no lawful recovery. We are satisfied that nothing short of "that extreme care and caution which very prudent and thoughtful persons" would have exercised under like circumstances could have enabled the company to foresee, guard against, and prevent all the different occurrences from which the injury resulted. In our opinion, it was not less careful as to the protection and safety of the plaintiff than persons of ordinary prudence would have been. It seems clear, at any rate, that it was at least as prudent in this respect as the child's own father. We do not mean to even intimate that if the latter had been negligent his negligence would have been imputable to the child. The idea we intend to convey is that the same facts which show ordinary diligence on the father's part are available to show a like degree of diligence on the part of the company, and we think the evidence in this case establishes that degree of diligence as to both. This being so, the company did not violate any duty it owed the plaintiff, and consequently should not have been held liable. As requiring it to exercise for his protection extraordinary diligence would be exacting from it a higher degree of care and prudence than the law imposes upon it, its failure to observe such diligence, if such was the fact, was not, relatively to the plaintiff, negligence at all, and could not, therefore, be the basis of a recovery in his favor. We have given this case much thought and deliberation, and our conclusion is that under the evidence the verdict cannot be supported upon legal principles and ought to be set aside.

Atkinson, J., dissenting:

Aside from the facts stated in the official report, it is only necessary to refer to what, in the treatment of the questions made in this cause, both by the majority and myself, is an accepted fact; and that is that the plaintiff, at the time of the infliction of the injuries complained of, was a child of too tender years to be chargeable with negligence on his own account. This admission obviates a discussion in justification of the finding of the jury in so far as it found that fact in his favor. Dealing with him as a person wholly irresponsible, and chargeable with no measure of diligence for his own safety, we are to consider what are the relative rights of the person injured, and the relative duties of the defendant company. It may be stated, as fundamental, that under the provisions of the Code a railroad company, in the running and operating of its trains, at all times, at all places, owes to all persons at least the duty of ordinary care. This is a necessary deduction from the Code provision which from the proof of injury raises a presumption of negligence, and places upon the company the burden of proving ordinary care; for if the duty was not imposed by statute the presumption could not arise. Just what amount of vigilance constitutes ordinary care is necessarily a question of fact, and cannot, in the nature of things, be measured by any standard which in advance can be prescribed by law, and hence such are questions to be determined by a jury. So far as this particular case is concerned, it would make no difference whether this child was a licensee or not; whether he was in the position where he was injured by permission of the company or not. Being of too tender years to be chargeable with negligence, he was wanting in capacity to become a wilful trespasser, and therefore is to be judged by the same rules as would apply to any animate, though irrational object injured under like circumstances? Let us suppose that, instead of being a human being, he had been an ordinary domestic animal, and being injured, the owner had brought suit to recover; what would it have been necessary for him to prove? It would have been necessary only to prove ownership, value, injury. In order to rebut the presumption, it would have been necessary for the defendant company to show that its servants were in the exercise of ordinary care, and this has been frequently held to involve proof that its servants were on the lookout; that in that respect they were not negligent; that they did not see, and could not have seen, the animal injured, in time to prevent the injury; and that after the danger became apparent they used all ordinary and reasonable means to prevent the catastrophe. It would be no reply to the action to say that the animal had no right to be at the point injured; for it has been held by this court, even in those districts where it is unlawful for animals to run at large, the duty of the company to take precautions to prevent injury to them is not thereby lessened. So with the child injured in the present case. As to one of his mental capacity, it would be no reply to say that he had no right to be where he was injured. Being irresponsible, he was under no duty to look out for his own safety; and therefore the company could not avoid a recovery by showing that he was negligent, but only by showing that its servants at the time of the injury were in the exercise of ordinary care. In the present case, however, not only was the person injured not a trespasser, but he was in the dangerous position of walking along its tracks by permission of the railroad authorities, and was injured at a time during the day when the company must have known from experience and observation extending over many years, that many children of his tender age were wont to be at that place, and exposed constantly to the very dangers into which, in consequence of their youth, they were likely to be allured; and yet when, under these circumstances, one of them is injured, and the company offers no excuse by way of evidence showing diligence upon its part, it is said that to require proof such as would be necessary to shield it if the action were for injuries to an animal is to impose upon it the duty of extraordinary care. No diligence at all was shown upon the part of the defendant company, and yet, in the face of the statute imposing upon it the burden of proof in such cases, it is held that no recovery could be had. Upon the principle of the Turn-Table Cases, which are familiar to the profession, I am content to rest my individual judgment that the law of the case was with the plaintiff. The facts the jury found with him; and upon these two propositions it is, with the greatest deference for the opinion of my learned brethren, earnestly submitted that the judgment of the trial court, approving the finding of the jury and denying a new trial, should be permitted to stand.

(168 ILL. 51A.)

1. A person injured by eating unwholesome food at a public restaurant must, in order to recover damages from the person keeping the restaurant, establish carelessness or negligence on his part.
2. Proof by one injured by eating unwholesome food at a public restaurant of the fact of eating the food and of consequent sickness is not sufficient to make a prima facie case in his favor against the restaurant keeper, nor to shift the burden upon the latter to establish due care.

(November 9, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by unwholesome food negligently furnished by defendants to plaintiff. Affirmed.

Statement by Craig, J.:

This was an action on the case brought by appellant against appellees to recover damages for injuries resulting to the appellant from eating an oyster stew served by appellees in their restaurant in Chicago on the 5th day of February, 1891. It was alleged in the declaration that the defendants were the proprietors of a public restaurant known as the "Boston Oyster House," furnishing to patrons, among other things, oyster stews; that on the 5th of February, 1891, they received the plaintiff as a guest and patron, and furnished to her a certain dish of food, known as an "oyster stew," for a certain charge paid by plaintiff, and it then became the duty of the defendants to carefully prepare the stew, of healthy and wholesome material, yet the defendants, disregarding their duty in this behalf, did carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully, and though the carelessness, negligence, and unskillfulness and default of the defendants and their servants, and for want of due care and attention to their duty, prepare and deliver to the plaintiff, to be by her eaten, an oyster stew that was not good or wholesome, but deleterious, dangerous, and, poisonous; that the plaintiff, though using all due care, and without fault, then and there ate the stew, and immediately thereafter, and as the immediate and direct consequence thereof, and of said negligence and carelessness of the defendants, became and was poisoned and became sick, and was sick, and suffered terrible bodily injury, and endured great physical and mental pain, and became permanently injured, and was obliged to and did lay out and expend large sums of money in endeavoring to get healed, and claiming damages. It appears from the evidence introduced by plaintiff that on the morning of February 5, 1895, plaintiff being then in good health, accompanied by her friend Mrs. Thompson, left her home in Chicago, and spent the forenoon in shopping, and about 12 o'clock entered the restaurant of the defendants. Each ordered a stew; Mrs. Thompson eating hers; the plaintiff eating, according to her testimony, only the broth of her stew. While eating the oysters, Mrs. Thompson observed a peculiar taste in her mouth,— as she described it, "a brassy taste." This was observed soon after beginning to eat, and again about the time of finishing. Some oysters being left in the plaintiff's dish the ladies observed that they were green, and called the attention of the waiter to the fact. He insisted, however, that the oysters were all right. After finishing their meal, they paid for the oysters and left the restaurant. As soon as they got on the steps, Mrs. Thompson began to feel sick, and both went across the street to a physician's office. Before leaving the restaurant they wrapped two of the oysters in a piece of paper, and showed them to the doctor. At the doctor's office plaintiff was taken sick and was in great agony and pain. She had burning sensation and hot feeling; was sick and faint. An emetic was given to each, and they remained in the office some time; Mrs. Thompson becoming materially better; Mrs. Sheffer improving so that they were able to start home. On the street car, going home, plaintiff was taken worse. She was bloated, and her clothes had to be opened. She was removed to the platform of the car, and then to a drug store. After remaining in the drug store for some time, she was removed to her home, at State and Thirty-Seventh streets, where, from her sickness, she was confined to her bed for some three weeks. The evidence tends to show that she has never recovered from her sickness. It also appeared that from eight to nine hundred oyster stews were served in the restaurant during the noon hour. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, the court, at the request of the defendants, instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendants, and it is claimed that the court erred in giving this instruction.

Mr. Edwin F. Abbott, for appellant:

There is an implied warranty of the soundness and wholesomeness of provisions prepared for immediate consumption.

Where the causes which produce the injury are under the management of the defendants, and, in the ordinary course of things, the injury would not have been suffered, the defendants are prima facie liable.

On grounds of public policy innkeepers are prima facie liable for losses which happen to the goods of guests. On the same principle, and for the greater reason that life and health are more valuable than property, restaurant keepers should be prima facie held liable for injury sustained by reason of their guests eating improper food furnished by the inn-keeper.

Messrs. Duncan & Gilbert for appellees.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Whether the plaintiff became sick from eating the oyster stew at the defendants' restaurant was a question for the jury, and while the evidence produced by plaintiff that eight or nine hundred persons were served with oyster stews at the same time and place, none of whom became sick, would seem to be a strong circumstance tending to establish that the plaintiff's sickness was attributable to other causes, yet we are inclined to the opinion that, if plaintiff had made out her case in other respects, it would have been the duty of the court to submit this question to the jury. It will be observed that the plaintiff, in her declaration, averred that the defendants, as restaurant keepers, served plaintiff with oysters, and "carelessly negligently, and unskillfully, and through carelessness," did "deliver to the plaintiff, to be by her eaten, an oyster stew that was not good or wholesome, but deleterious, dangerous, and poisonous," etc., whereby plaintiff became sick. This was, no doubt, regarded by the plaintiff as a material averment; and it was a material averment, one upon which the right of recovery of plaintiff rested; and, unless the evidence fairly tended to establish negligence on the part of the defendants, plaintiff could not recover. But it is said in the argument that innkeepers are prima facie liable for losses which happen to the goods of their guests, and, on the same principle, restaurant keepers should be prima facie liable for injury resulting from unwholesome food furnished by them. The law is well settled that the keepers of public inns are required to safely keep the property of their guests, and in case such property is lost the innkeeper can only relieve himself from liability by proving that the loss occurred without any fault on his part, or that the loss occurred through the fault of his guest; and the burden of proof to exonerate the innkeeper is upon himself, for the reason that the law, in the first instance, will attribute the loss to his default. Johnson v. Richardson, 17 Ill. 304, 63 Am. Dec. 369.

As respects the goods of a guest, which he takes with him when he stops at an inn, the innkeeper is practically an insurer; and, where an action is brought to recover for goods lost, the guest is only required to show the existence of the relation of innkeeper and guest, and the loss, to authorize a recovery. But as a food served at a restaurant, such as oysters, ice cream, and the like, we are not aware that a similar rule establishing liability ever existed. There is no similarity between the two cases, and the principle that governs one does not apply to the other. If a person keeping a public restaurant fails to exercise ordinary care in furnishing food to his patrons, and damages result, he would be liable, if his business be conducted in a careless or negligent manner, and through such negligent a patron is injured. But, where an action is brought to recover damages, the burden is upon the person bringing the action to establish carelessness or negligence.

Plaintiff claims that, having proved that she ate the oyster broth at the defendants' restaurant, and in consequence became sick, her case is made out, or at least the burden of proof is shifted on the defendants. If this rule was adopted, the plaintiff would be relieved from proving the most important element of her declaration, the negligence of defendants, which is really the foundation of the action. This would, in effect, make the restaurant keeper an insurer. Such a rule is not correct in principle, nor has it been sustained, so far as we are advised, by any respectable authority. Wiedeman v. Keller, 58 Ill. App. 382,—a case cited by appellant, was one where the plaintiff brought an action against a retail dealer in meats to recover damages resulting from eating pork containing trichinae, sold to him by the dealer. In deciding the case the court held that when a vendor of provisions has no notice of, and cannot, by the exercise of reasonable or ordinary care, ascertain, the unwholesome or unsound condition, there is no implied warranty of the soundness of provisions not prepared or manufactured by such vendor. Here there is no pretense that the defendants manufactured either the oysters or the milk, the two ingredients of the oyster stew, and, under the rule laid down in the case cited, there could be no liability. Plaintiff has cited Van Bracklin v. Fonda, 12 Johns. 467, 7 Am. Dec. 889, as authority. But that was an action brought against a person for selling a quarter of beef as good and sound, when it was bad and unwholesome; but it was proved that the vendor knew when he sold the beef that it was diseased, and, while the rule laid down in that case is proper under the facts, it has no application to this case. Here the plaintiff called but one witness to prove negligence or carelessness on the part of the defendants, and, upon an examination of the evidence of the witness, it will be found that the evidence, when fairly considered, does not tend to show that the defendants were guilty of any negligence or carelessness.

As the plaintiff failed to introduce any evidence tending to prove the most material averment of her declaration, the instruction of the court to find for the defendants was correct.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shelby County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

Statement by Given, Ch. J.:

Action to recover upon a policy of insurance against loss by fire. Plaintiff alleges that the merchandise and fixtures insured were destroyed by fire on or about the 1st day of July, 1889. Defendant answered, admitting the policy, that the fire damaged some of the insured property, and denying that the fire occurred on the 1st day of July, 1889. That the policy sued on was issued in consideration of a promissory note of the plaintiff in words and figures as follows:

$60.00. Des Moines, Iowa, April 1, 1889.

On the 1st day of July, 1889, for value received, I promise to pay the Hawkeye Insurance Company, at their office in the city of Des Moines, Iowa, sixty dollars, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from date, being premium for insurance, under policy No. 192,542. And it is hereby agreed that, if this note is not paid at maturity, the whole amount of premium of said policy shall be considered as earned and payable, and the policy shall be null and void; and the company shall not be liable for any loss or damage that may occur to the property insured while this note shall be overdue and unpaid; and if this note remains unpaid for the period of sixty days after maturity, then I agree to pay said company the further sum of 10 per cent on the amount due as fees for collecting the same.

George D. Ross,

P. O. Address, Harlan,
County of Shelby, Iowa.

That said policy was made and accepted on the conditions therein, one of which is to the effect that a failure to pay said premium note at maturity "shall immediately terminate all liability of this company under this policy, and the company shall not in any case be liable for any loss or damage that may occur at a time when any such note or notes, or any instalment therein, or any part thereof, shall be overdue and unpaid." Defendant avers that on the 1st day of June, 1889, it served on the plaintiff a notice in writing, by inclosing it in a registered letter addressed to plaintiff at Harlan, Iowa, the postoffice address named in the policy, notifying him that said note would be due on the 1st day of July, 1889, demanding payment and stating that "unless such payment is made within thirty days from service of this notice your policy will be suspended." The notice also called attention to the conditions in the policy and note, stating that if the note was not paid when due the policy would become suspended. Defendant alleged that the note fell due July 1, 1889, and, being overdue and unpaid the policy was suspended, and defendant was not liable thereon for the alleged loss. Plaintiff in reply denies that the defendant served said notice on him on the 1st day of June, 1889. A further issue was joined by amendment to the answer and reply that need not be noticed. The cause was tried to a jury, and a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

The insurance company must know when service is effected in order that the calculation of short rates may be correct. Under the construction placed upon this statute in the instructions complained of, it would be almost impossible to compute short rates accurately. Surely the law will not put upon a party the risks incident to improper calculations when the errors are attributable to the law itself.

Time begins to run when the notice is mailed. That is a fact, definite, easy of ascertainment, about which no mistake is likely to occur, and proof of which is abundant, direct, and satisfactory.

But if service is dependent upon proof of when a certain number is affixed to the letter difficulties appear which, at times become almost insurmountable.

Holbrook Bros. v. Mill Owners' Mut. Ins. Co. 86 Iowa, 255.

Given, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The evidence shows without conflict that the loss occurred on July 2, 1889, and the court so instructed the jury. The premium note fell due on July 1, 1889, and was unpaid at the time of the fire, wherefore appellant claims that the policy was, by reason of said condition therein, and in the note, and the service of said note, suspended at the time of the loss. Appellant's first contention in argument is that §§ 1, 2, chapter 210, Laws 1880, providing that such policies shall not be declared forfeited or suspended for nonpayment of premium until after thirty days' notice is given, is unconstitutional. It is entirely clear from the record that this question was not raised in or presented to the district court. Appellant does not present the question either in the pleadings, motion for verdict, or instructions asked. On the former appeal, and on both trials below, the defense that the policy was suspended at the time of the loss was grounded on the alleged compliance with said chapter 210.

The constitutionality of said act is first questioned in the assignment of errors. Appellant concedes that this question was not presented to the district court, but insists that it may be presented in this court for the first time as reasons why the instructions complained of are not correct. The instructions were given upon the issues claimed by the parties, and upon which they tried and submitted the case, and they will not be heard to insist upon any different issues on appeal. In law actions, this court sits as a court of review only, and will not consider questions that were not presented to the trial court. Iowa Homestead Co. v. Duncombe, 51 Iowa, 525; Garland v. Wholebau, 20 Iowa, 271; McGregor v. Gardner, 16 Iowa, 538; Goodnow v. Plumb, 67 Iowa, 661; Edwards v. Cosgro, 71 Iowa, 296; Laverty v. Woodyard, 16 Iowa, 5; Lower v. Lower, 46 Iowa, 525; Hoyt v. Hoyt, 68 Iowa, 703; Benjamin v. Shea, 83 Iowa, 392.

2. On the former appeal (83 Iowa, 586), the question presented was upon an instruction to the effect that the service of the notice by registered letter was not completed "until, by due course of mail, for registered matter, it should be received at the office of its destination." This court held that the service of such a notice is completed when the letter is properly addressed and registered at the postoffice. It was not held, as claimed by appellant, "that the notice was served when the letter was mailed." Section 2 of said chapter 210 provides that such notice may be served by registered letter, addressed to the assured at his postoffice address named in or on said policy. This court said that "in such a case the service is complete when the acts specified as constituting the service are done." Registering the letter is one of the acts specified, and is necessary to constitute a complete service. Appellant insists, and correctly so, that the ruling on the former appeal is the law of this case. The learned district judge, so viewing the law and the former opinion of this court, instructed the jury that registration of the letter was necessary to a completed service, and submitted the question whether said letter was registered on June 1, 1889. The court further instructed that "under the laws, rules, and regulations of the postoffice department, after a receipt has been given therefor and the letter has been numbered, the letter becomes registered." After reciting the undisputed facts, that the defendant had on June 1, 1889, delivered the notice in question to the postmaster at Des Moines, properly addressed and stamped for registry, and procured from him a proper receipt therefor, the court instructed as follows: "The only question for you to determine, as to this defense is as to whether the registry was completed by assigning to said letter its number and indorsing the same on the letter. All other things necessary to a complete registration of said letter on June 1, 1889, are shown by the uncontroverted evidence. You must determine from the evidence whether its registry number was indorsed on said letter, June 1, 1889, or not." On the former appeal we were not called upon to decide, and did not decide, what constituted the registration of a letter. The instructions are in harmony with the laws, rules, and regulations of the postoffice department as shown in the evidence. It is true that, under the authority of § 1053 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, the postmaster at Des Moines was using "other than standard registration forms." Instead of the slip receipt provided for by postal laws and regulations, receipts were given to appellant, and to certain other companies, for letters deposited for registration, in a separate book for each company. This related solely to the manner of receipting for the letters, and did not in any way change the requirements as to registration. Section 1056 of said Laws, Rules, and Regulations is as follows: "After a receipt has been given, therefore, and the matter has been numbered as prescribed in the preceding sections, the letter or parcel becomes registered and must be guarded with the utmost care." We have seen that service of such notice by registered letter is not complete until the letter, properly addressed, is registered, and that it is not registered until numbered as required. The question whether this letter was registered on the 1st day of July, 1889, was submitted to the jury, and it found, as under the evidence it was warranted in doing, that the letter was not registered until after that day.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

John S. ZEILER, Appt.,

v.

CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY, Impleaded, etc.

(.....Md.)

1. The indefinite postponement of the consideration of an ordinance to authorize a certain company to lay railway tracks in specified streets does not prevent the subsequent passage at the same session of another ordinance granting the same company the right to lay tracks on streets many of which are the same as were named in the prior ordinance, but containing new provisions as to the connection of the new tracks with an existing system, and various other provisions for a more efficient protection of the public interest, although a rule of procedure prohibits action during the session on the "same subject" after a question has been indefinitely postponed.
2. The two thirds of the members of a branch of a municipal government, which are required by a rule of procedure in order to dispense with one of the regular readings of a proposed ordinance, need not be two thirds of all the members of the body, but only two thirds of the members voting, if they are not less than a majority, and the majority constitutes a quorum.

Messrs. Thomas G. Hayes and Thomas I. Elliott for the other appellees.

Page, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant contends that the ordinance mentioned in the bill of complaint is null and void, because (1) it did not pass the first branch in conformity with law, because it was put upon its passage before it had been read twice upon two separate days, as required by the ninth joint standing rule, then in full force and unsuspended; and (2) it did not pass either branch legally because the question as to authorizing the Central Railway Company to extend its railway "over almost all of the streets named in the ordinance" had been indefinitely postponed in the second branch at the same session of the council, and, under the twentieth joint standing rule, the same subject could not be again considered at such session, by amendment or otherwise. These propositions involve the consideration of two questions: First, were the rules of procedure violated as stated? And, second, if they were, did such violation, under all the circumstances of the case, operate to render the ordinance null and void?

It is contended that the indefinite postponement of the "question as to authorizing it [the Central Railway Company] to extend its railway over almost all of the streets named in the ordinance [mentioned in the bill], including Wolf street," precluded the possibility, under the rules, of passing the ordinance under consideration. The facts are these: On the 18th of May, 1896, the joint standing committee reported favorably, to the second branch, two ordinances,—one entitled "An ordinance to authorize the Central Railway Company to lay its tracks on Wolf street, Aliceanna street, and certain other streets in the city of Baltimore" (this will be hereafter referred to as the "Wolf street ordinance"); the other, "An ordinance to authorize the Central Railway Company to lay its tracks on E. Lexington street in the city of Baltimore" (this will be referred to as the "Lexington street ordinance"). On the same day both were read and laid over, under the rule. On the 25th of May the Wolf street ordinance was put upon its second reading. After several amendments were offered and voted on, it was moved and adopted that "the further consideration of the report and ordinance be indefinitely postponed." On the 8th of June the Lexington street ordinance, having passed its second reading, came up again, the question then being upon its passage; and it was amended by striking out all of the ordinance, as reported by the committee, after the words at the end of the first section, and inserting those provisions which the appellant contends are in fact the same subject as the Wolf street ordinance. The rule alleged to have been upon a vote, see Lawrence v. Ingersoll (Tenn.) 6 L. R. A. 306, and note; also State, Walden, v. Vancord (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 632.

NOTE.—The above decision on the effect of an indefinite postponement of an ordinance seems to be a novel one.

thereby violated is as follows: "Rule 20. When a question shall have been indefinitely postponed, the same subject, whether originating in this or received from the other branch, shall not be acted on again, or reconsidered during the session." From the bare reading of this rule, it is clear that the indefinite postponement of a question precludes the further consideration of the subject to which the question must be referred, during the entire session, whether it originated in the one branch or the other. What, then, was the subject under consideration, upon which the vote of postponement operated? It certainly needs no argument to show that no single feature of the Wolf street ordinance can be separated from its context, and be properly regarded as the "subject" under consideration. It is true that each item in the ordinance demanded of the members, as watchful guardians of the public welfare, a careful scrutiny. Whether the Central Company should be the donee of the franchise, whether the tracks ought to be permitted on each street named, the terms and conditions upon which the privileges were to be granted, and many other matters, demanded the careful attention of the council. But none of these, taken separately, can properly be regarded as the "subject" postponed. Such a construction would be too narrow, and would preclude the council from considering any other measure that contained any one or more of these features. Such new measure might be highly beneficial to the public, and, taken in its entirety, wholly free from the objections of the original ordinance; and yet, if it contained any feature common to both measures, the rule would have the effect of rendering the council wholly powerless. We think a more correct construction of this rule is that which prevents further action upon a subject or scheme which is substantially the same as that contained in the postponed ordinance. Now, is the scheme of the Wolf street ordinance substantially the same as that of the Lexington street ordinance? The donee of the franchise, it is true, in both is the same; also the mode of propulsion; and many of the streets in the one are mentioned in the other. But, in its entirety, the scheme of the Lexington street ordinance is wholly different from that contained in the Wolf street ordinance. The Wolf street ordinance authorized tracks from Aliceanna street to North avenue, along the streets named; but there is no provision requiring the company to connect the new tracks with its present system, or to furnish an outlet for its passengers, on a single fare, to the center of the city. Without such provisions, the new tracks would be but a local concern, and persons using the new road could go no further than over its limits, unless by transferring and paying an additional fare. On the other hand, by the Lexington street ordinance the company was required to lay its double tracks down Lexington street to Gay, and connect its present system, by a single track, with the new system of tracks; and, having thus provided for a continuous road, permission was granted to lay tracks on other streets, opened and to be opened and paved. Moreover, there was a more efficient protection of the public interests, in the requirements for gutter plates and grooved rails. There are other features by which the two bills may be distinguished, but what we have said is quite sufficient, we think, to substantially differentiate the two measures. Neither in respect to the privileges conferred on the company, nor in the methods by which the safety, convenience, and general interests of the public are protected, nor in the essential features of the two schemes, are the two bills alike. They present two entirely different propositions, having, it is true, some features in common, but, in their substance and entirety, wholly dissimilar. We are of opinion, therefore, that there was no violation of the twentieth rule in the passage of the ordinance in question.

Having thus passed the second branch, the Lexington street ordinance, amended as we have stated, came up for consideration in the first branch on the 8th day of June. "Mr. Allison moved a suspension of the rules to obtain a second reading." The yeas and nays were called for, and fourteen members voted in the affirmative, and six in the negative, whereupon it was announced that, "two thirds of the members having voted in the affirmative, the motion was declared adopted." The appellants contend that this decision was in violation of the ninth standing rule, which is as follows; "Rule 9. Every ordinance or joint resolution, before being put on its passage, whether originating in this, or received from the other branch, shall have two readings on two separate days, unless two thirds of the members of the branch shall by a vote otherwise direct; but simple resolutions of inquiry, etc., may at once be put on their passage." It is insisted that the "two thirds" here mentioned means two thirds of all the members of the branch (that is, in this case, two thirds of twenty-two members); and, if this be correct, the motion to suspend failed to receive the requisite vote. Attention is also called to rule 15, to show—First, the rule cannot be "suspended;" and, second, there is a distinction to be made between "members of the branch" and "members present," which can only be satisfied by construing the former term to mean "all the members of the branch." Rule 15 is as follows: "No standing rule of the branch shall be rescinded or changed without the assent of three fourths of the members of the branch, and after one day's notice shall have been given; but any standing rule may be suspended, upon the assent of three fourths of the members present except rule 9." But we do not deem it important to determine here what was meant by the use of these different terms,—whether, by the words "members present," it was intended to include all who were actually present, as distinguished from those voting. The question now before us must be determined by the proper meaning to be placed upon the words "members of the branch," as used in the ninth rule. It is now well settled that in all cases a majority of a legislative body is a quorum, entitled to act for the whole body, except the power that creates it has otherwise directed. In United States v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 6, 36 L. ed. 825, the court said: "When a quorum is present the act of the majority of the quorum is the act of the body. This has been the rule for all time, except so far as in any given case the terms of the organic act under which the body is assembled have prescribed specific limitations." There is no act of the state of Maryland that prescribes what number shall constitute a quorum of either of the two branches of the city council. That is determined by the common law, which fixes the "majority as the legal body;" and, under the authority granted by the legislature, to "settle their rules of procedure," there exists no power in either branch, or both, to fix a greater number. Heiskell v. Baltimore, 65 Md. 125, 57 Am. Rep. 808. In that case the court defined a quorum to be "that number of the body which, when assembled in their proper place, will enable them to transact their proper business; or, in other words, that number that makes a lawful body, and gives them the power to pass a law or ordinance." It would therefore seem to follow from this that when "a branch," or "the members of a branch," are the words used, with nothing to qualify them, and in the absence of a clear intent to the contrary, they must be taken to mean that "number of the body that makes a lawful body." To construe the words "two thirds of the members of the branch," as used in the ninth rule, to mean two thirds of all the members, would be to fix a meaning upon them that would deprive the majority of their legal power to act. It would amount to declaring that a majority, constituting the lawful body, intended, by a rule of procedure, to take away from itself, under certain circumstances, the power it rightfully has, to do the work it was assembled to do. We think, therefore, it would be anomalous to hold that, while a majority is competent to do business, a rule made under a power to settle the "mode and manner" of conducting the business should be construed in such a manner as to take away from it the power to do business at all, under certain circumstances. "Two thirds of the members of the branch," we are of opinion, means two thirds of the members voting, not being less than a majority, and not two thirds of all the members. This view is fully sustained by authority. In the case of State v. McBride, 4 Mo. 808, 29 Am. Dec. 636, the question was upon the adoption of an amendment of the Constitution. "Two thirds of each house" was the vote necessary to ratify it. The question to be solved was, What was the meaning of the word "house," as used in the Constitution? Did it mean all the members elected, or did it mean any number sufficient to constitute a quorum? The court held that, the "most common meaning of the word being the number of members sufficient to constitute a quorum to do business," a vote of two thirds of those voting, being a quorum, was sufficient. So, where the constitutional provision was that the legislature shall pass no act of incorporation unless with the assent of at least two thirds of each house, it was held the word "house" meant members present and doing business, being a quorum. Southworth v. Palmyra & J. R. Co. 2 Mich. 287. This case is cited, apparently with approval, in Cooley, Const. Lim. 141 (marg.); Warnock v. Lafayette, 4 La. Ann. 419. In the case of Green v. Weiler, 83 Miss. 700, it was held that in matters connected with the organization of a body, the preservation of order, and the transaction of its ordinary business of legislation, the word "house" is synonymous with "quorum" or "majority." The Constitution of South Carolina (art. 9, § 7) provides that no law to create a public debt shall take effect until it has been passed "by a vote of two thirds of the members of each branch of the general assembly," etc. In construing this provision the supreme court of that state, in the case of Morlon v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C. N. S. 463, after stating that the Constitution fixed the quorum to be a majority, proceeded as follows: "It [a quorum] is indeed, for all legal purposes, as much the body to which it appertains as if all the component parts were present. When, therefore, either branch of the general assembly is spoken of, in the absence of a clear intent to the contrary, the quorum of such body must be understood as intended. It would follow that provisions ascertaining the mode in which the body should divide, in order to complete action in any given case, whether by a mere majority, or by a still greater proportion, must be interpreted primarily as applicable to the body as legally organized at the time such action is taken. If the rule is the mere majority rule, then a majority of the quorum present and acting is intended; if the rule is that of two thirds, then two thirds of such quorum must concur, for effective action." The motion made was for "a suspension of the rules in order to obtain a second reading." This we think was passed by a two-thirds vote, and was sufficient to put the ordinance on its second reading. It is true, rule 15 makes no provision for the suspension of rule 9, but rule 9 itself provides, substantially, that the branch, by a two-thirds vote, may direct when the ordinance or joint resolution may be read. The motion, therefore, while it may possibly be ineffective to work a suspension of rule 9, is quite sufficient to indicate a direction to put the ordinance on its second reading at once.

It follows from what we have said that, in our opinion, there have been no violations of the rules of the council, and it therefore is not important to this case to consider what, if there had been such violations, the effect would have been upon the validity of the ordinance in question.

Decree affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT

W. P. RATLIFF, Appt.,

v.

Ambus BEALE.

(.....Miss.)

Nontaxable property cannot be sold for the payment of a poll tax under Const. § 243, which makes said tax "a lien only upon taxable property," as this section is a part of the article on franchise, and is intended to be a clog upon the franchise more than a means of revenue.

(November 30, 1896.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Hinds County in favor of complainant in a proceeding brought to enjoin defendant from selling certain exempt property for the collection of a tax. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wiley N. Nash, Attorney General, for appellant.

Mr. J. A. P. Campbell, also for appellant:

It is not to be charged that the convention falsely pretended to be aiding common schools, when at the same time it was scheming to prevent this aid by providing against the collection of the poll tax, that it professed a purpose to aid the common schools, but this was a mere pretense, and the poll tax was not to be enforced as to the very large majority of those subject to it.

Will it be believed that the provision ("said tax to be a lien only upon taxable property") is really the result of design, and part of a carefully concerted scheme to exclude negroes from voting, and yet that it is at the mercy of a legislature, when it is known that the convention refused to commit to the legislature any power over the franchise article, and refused to commit to the legislature the matter of establishing and maintaining common schools?

For a long time it had been provided by statute in force when the Constitution was made, that "taxes assessed shall be a lien upon and bind the property assessed from the 1st day of February," etc., and, if an intelligent design can be attributed to the making of the clause in question, it must have been in view of this, and to limit this lien or charge to taxable property.

If it was the purpose of the convention to free nontaxable property from liability for poll taxes in civil proceedings, why was it not so said? Why employ an equivocal expression? Why leave the matter in doubt?

If schools are to be aided, the poll tax is to be collected, and, if nontaxable property is not liable, the tax is a sham and delusion, for probably nine tenths of those liable to poll tax will escape payment.

Let the constitutional convention be rescued from the reproach of deception and double dealing; let the term "lien" have its ordinary meaning, well established in our jurisprudence; let the poll tax be collected in aid of the common schools, and let reliance be placed on other means of excluding negroes, without exempting them from the personal tax levied by the Constitution itself for its darling scheme of common schools.

A lien is a tie that binds property—such hold upon it that it cannot be disposed of except subject to the claim.

Anderson, Law Dict.; Anderson v. State, 23 Miss. 459; Morgan v. Campbell, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 890, 23 L. ed. 798.

We copied from Massachusetts Constitution. Was that to exclude negroes, or was the denial of the right to vote in case of nonpayment a means of enforcing payment, in order to aid schools?

That would be puerile as a remedy for the evils of an unsatisfactory body of electors. Let the negro feel an interest in elections, and he will as surely pay his taxes as he will raise money to go to a circus, and, if he did not, campaign funds would pay for him, if his vote was looked to.

The provision requiring the legislature to appropriate enough to supply the failure of the poll tax to maintain schools four months each year would never have become part of the Constitution but for the imposition of the poll tax, and the promise that that would supply a large part of the means to maintain the schools the required time.

Messrs. Frank Johnston, S. S. Calhoun, and Lowry & Jayne, for appellee:

Property which is by law exempt from taxation cannot, under the provisions of § 243, art. 13, of the state Constitution on the elective franchise, be subjected to the payment of the poll tax.

The insertion of the word "only" by the convention indicates the purpose clearly to exempt the nontaxable property.

The word "lien" is used in the Constitution in the same sense as the terms "charge," "subjected to," "answerable for," and the like, and this is in accordance with the correct and technical definition of the word "lien."

A lien is the qualified right which may be

NOTE.—A judicial construction of a constitutional provision to make it accomplish an ulterior purpose not indicated by its language is uncommon, if not anomalous. Such a construction is made in the above case. A constitutional provision imposing a poll tax is held best effectuated by the nonpayment of the tax.

exercised in a given case over the property of another, though it is neither a jus ad rem nor a jus in re.

Where a statute gave priority of payment to the taxes levied by it, a lien was not thereby created, and a bona fide sale of the property before it was attached for the taxes, and before the lien was acquired by the levy, defeated the priority of payment.

An execution lien is required on particular property by the delivery of an execution to the sheriff and its levy on the property.

Buckner v. Pipes, 56 Miss. 366.

The Constitution declares that there shall be no right to a satisfaction out of nontaxable property for the poll tax.

It cannot be said, from the nature of the thing, that the power exists to levy upon and sell the property, while the power or right of creating a lien upon it is denied by the Constitution.

The intention of the framers of the Constitution appears clearly to be to exempt the nontaxable property from the payment of the poll tax, and to leave as the only penalty for the nonpayment of the tax the loss of the elective franchise to those not paying this tax.

The purpose of the Constitution is to exonerate the exempt property from the poll tax, and thus leave that large class of voters who own only nontaxable property the option to pay the poll tax, or to lose the elective franchise as the penalty for the failure to pay said tax.

The Constitution declares, by § 241, that no criminal proceedings may be had to enforce the collection of this tax.

After placing the nontaxable property beyond the reach of a levy for the poll tax, the Constitution cut off the only other mode by which the legislature might make the payment of the poll tax compulsory as to this class of voters, and thus left them the option of not paying the poll tax as an inducement for them not to vote.

The convention placed § 243 in the Constitution as an important part of the suffrage scheme provided by that instrument, and as such it must be construed and enforced.

The percentage of illiteracy among the negroes is decreasing each year, and in the course of a few years, under the operation of the educational limitation on the suffrage alone, there will probably be an actual majority of negro voters in the state. But if the poll-tax limitation remains, with the option on the part of the negro to save his $2 and waive his right to vote, in other words with the requirement of paying $2 for the privilege of voting, a white majority will be secured to the state, if not permanently, certainly for a long series of years.

This honorable court, the guardian of the Constitution, and the final arbiter of the rights and liberties of the citizen, will uphold and preserve in its integrity a constitutional safeguard which was conceived and brought forth in a spirit of patriotism and mutual concessions, and which has brought to the people of this state the blessings of peace and repose, in 34 L. R. A.

place of the disorders and dangers that formerly attended the operation of unlimited suffrage.

There was no concealment of the purpose of the convention to make the payment of the poll tax a condition of the suffrage.

If the poll tax was not to be a condition of the suffrage, and if its payment was not to be made in effect optional by the poorer classes who owned no taxable property, in other words if the contention of the appellee is not correct, then the following questions are incapable of any reasonable and intelligent solution. Why should the convention have levied a poll tax at all and fixed its amount? This is a subject of ordinary legislation, and not one of the functions of a Constitution.

Why should the convention have refused to allow the provision to stand, making the payment of the poll tax compulsory? Why tie the hands of the legislature in this subject if the purpose was simply confined to the collection of a poll tax per se?

Why should the Constitution have declared that no criminal proceedings should be had for the collection of the poll tax?

Why should the Constitution provide that a poll tax should be a lien on one class of property and that it should not be a lien upon or bind another class of property?

Why should it declare that the legislature could not charge it upon or make it a lien on exempt property? And that it might be a lien on nonexempt property?

That the legislature in collecting the poll tax, and as a convenient mode of collecting it, might make it a lien in advance on taxable property.

But that the legislature may not make it a lien in advance on exempt property, as a means of collecting the tax, but may provide for a lien by a levy or distress.

That the legislature may not create a lien. But that the tax collector is left free to get a lien by a levy.

That the poll tax is to be collected out of any property. But that in collecting out of exempt property, no lien can be created, in aid of its collection.

Cooper, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, the sheriff and tax collector of Hinds county, seized an article of household furniture, which is by law exempt from taxation, to cover the payment of a poll tax due by the appellee. The appellee thereupon sued out a writ of injunction to restrain the sale of or further proceeding against said property, and, on final hearing, the injunction was made perpetual. From that decree, the tax collector appeals.

There are no controverted facts in the case. It is admitted that the tax is due and unpaid, and that the proceeding is in all respects regular if the property seized by the officer was subject to be taken and sold for the tax. The question involved is whether nontaxable property may be sold for the payment of poll taxes, and the solution of this question rests upon construction of § 243 of our Constitution, which is as follows: "A uniform poll tax of

§3, to be used in aid of the common schools, and for no other purpose, is hereby imposed upon every male inhabitant of this state between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years, except persons who are deaf and dumb or blind, or who are maimed by loss of hand or foot; said tax to be a lien only upon taxable property. The board of supervisors of any county may, for the purpose of aiding the common schools in that county, increase the poll tax in said county, but in no case shall the entire poll tax exceed in any one year $3 on each poll. No criminal proceedings shall be allowed to enforce the collection of the poll tax." The question is, What is meant by that part of this section which declares that "said tax to be a lien only upon taxable property?" and this is determinable by the inquiry in what sense the word "lien" is employed. For the tax collector it is contended that the word was used to designate that right or condition created and fixed by our then-existing statutes, by which a charge or lien was given to the state and its counties upon all property assessed for taxes, which lien took relation back to the 1st day of February of the year in which the property was assessed and the tax levied, and by virtue of which the property, into whosesoever hands it might come, was liable to seizure and sale. This statutory lien, it is correctly argued, did not render the property in the hands of the owner to whom it was assessed liable to seizure for taxes, for this liability arose from the facts of his ownership and the assessment of the property and the levy of the taxes thereon. And so it is contended that the purpose of the constitutional provision is simply to declare that no liens shall be created upon nontaxable property which would render it liable to the poll tax to the owner after it has passed into the hands of third persons. For the appellee it is argued that the word "lien" is used in its broadest sense, and excludes not only the idea of a technical lien enforceable against third persons, but excludes also all right or power in the legislature or any executive officer or in any court to proceed against, to charge, or to subject, nontaxable property to the payment of the poll tax. Counsel for the respective parties press upon the attention of the court with great earnestness those matters which, if viewed alone, would lead to the one or the other construction contended for. In our opinion, they are all of importance, and are to be considered.

In construing the Constitution, we are to resort to such rules as would aid in the construction of a statute, keeping always in view the fact that, while statutes descend into particulars and details, constitutions deal usually in generalities, and furnish along broad lines the framework of government. In Daily v. Scope, 47 Miss. 867, it was said: "The Constitution is a law, differing only from a statute as it is of superior and paramount force, irrepealable by the legislature, and which prescribes, where it conflicts with a statute. When the framers of the Constitution employ terms which in legislative and judicial interpretation have received a definite meaning and application, which may be more restricted or general than when employed in other relations, it is a safe rule to give to them that sig-nification sanctioned by the legislative and judicial use." To find the meaning of the language of the Constitution, we are to look to the existing body of the law, whether common or statutory (Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 520); to former constitutions (Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 897, 35 Am. Rep. 870); to existing evils; to the objects and purposes to be accomplished; and to the remedies intended to be provided (Cooley, Const. Lim. 70; People, Les. v. Chautauque County Supers. 48 N. Y. 10; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 518).

We know that a large part of the property of this state has for many years been exempt from taxation. Since the year 1871, there have been exempt, among other things, the wearing apparel of all persons, provisions in hand necessary for family consumption, and farming produce raised in this state in the hand of the producer, one gun, all poultry, household furniture not to exceed in value $250, two cows and calves, ten head of hogs, ten head of sheep or goats, colts foaled in the state under three years old, farming utensils used for agricultural purposes, the tools of any mechanic necessary for carrying on his trade, the libraries of all persons, and pictures and works of art not kept or offered for sale as merchandise. The valuation of real and personal property for taxation in the year 1880 was $165,847,834. If to this be added the assessment value of railroads in the state approximately, $24,000,000, we have total value of taxable property,—$189,847,834. By the eleventh census of the United States, the value of the agricultural products of this state for the year 1889 was given at $73,342,995. There were in the state in that year 144,318 farms. If to each farm it be assumed that there was of all other exempt property the value of $25, there would be $3,607,950 to be added, making a total valuation of property exempt from taxation of $76,950,945. Of this exempt property, probably fully one half was in cotton, the staple agricultural product, and this, in the course of the year, all passed out of the hands of the producer. There is great force, therefore, in the suggestion that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to provide that one third of the property of the state should be held exempt from a tax imposed by the convention itself in aid of a cherished object,—the common schools of the state,—but only intended that the property should not be subjected after it had passed into the hands of third persons, innocent purchasers of our great staple.

But we are not to look to the existing statutes alone to determine in what sense the word "lien" was used. We are to consider the condition of things as existing at the time, and especially must we note those grave and permeating forces for evil which were known by all men to exist, the silent and increasing influences of which were corrupting the public conscience, and threatening to involve in common ruin the morals and civilization of one race, and the liberty and safety of another. It is not the province of this court to consider with whom rested the fault which gave origin to the conditions under which the convention was assembled. We deal with them only as existing facts, forming a part of the history of the times. We consider them because we are working to discover the sense in which an ambiguous word was employed by the convention, and because, as existing facts, they cast a light upon the question under investigation. It cannot be doubted that the question involved in the proper settlement of the electoral franchise had been the subject of more reflection and thought for a period of many years than was bestowed upon all other subjects as to which our Constitution underwent material change. Not only in this state, but throughout our sister states, thoughtful and anxious men turned upon the solution of the question all the light to be gathered from history or speculation. Our unhappy state had passed in rapid succession from civil war through a period of military occupancy, followed by another, in which the control of public affairs had passed to a recently enfranchised race, unfitted by educational experience for the responsibility thrust upon it. This was succeeded by a semimilitary, semicivil uprising, under which the white race, inferior in number, but superior in spirit, in governmental instinct, and in intelligence, was restored to power. The anomaly was then presented of a government whose distinctive characteristic was that it rested upon the will of the majority, being controlled and administered by a minority of those entitled under its organic law to exercise the electoral franchise. The habitual disregard of one law not only brings it finally into contempt, but tends to weaken respect for all other laws. The most dangerous and insidious form in which this evil can exist is that which manifests itself in the disregard of public rather than private right, for not only are the consequences more widely diffused, and less rapidly eradicated, but, because no particular right of individuals is directly involved, resistance is less prompt, and the evil progresses to dangerous proportions before its existence is noted. Not only was the question of the franchise a most difficult one for solution by reason of its nature, but there was added to its treatment the limitations upon state action imposed by the amendments to the Federal Constitution. The difficulty, as all men knew, arose from racial differences. The Federal Constitution prohibited the adoption of any laws under which a discrimination should be made by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

It would too much extend the volume of this opinion to enter upon a review and examination in detail of all the provisions of our recent Constitution in which the subject of the electoral franchise, and its cognate one of the selection of governmental agencies, is dealt with. We deal with so much only as is necessary to a determination of the question involved. He who reads the Constitution of 1869 and that of 1890 will have his attention arrested by the marked difference in the number and character of the provisions upon the franchise, and the selection of the chief magistrate of the state. The Constitution of 1869, in its single article on the franchise (§ 2, art. 7), provided simply that "all male inhabitants of this state, except idiots and insane persons and Indians not taxed, citizens of the United States, or naturalized, twenty-one years old and upward, who have resided in this state for six months and in the county one month next preceding the day of election at which said inhabitant offers to vote, and who are duly registered according to the requirements of § 8 of this article, and who are not disqualified by reason of any crime, are declared to be duly qualified electors." The governor and other state and county officers were under this Constitution selected by popular election. The corresponding article in the Constitution of 1890 (§ 241) is as follows: "Every male inhabitant of the state, except idiots, insane persons, and Indians not taxed, who is a citizen of the United States twenty-one years and upwards, who has resided in the state for two years and one year in the election district, or in the incorporated town or city in which he offers to vote, and who is duly registered as provided in this article, and who has never been convicted of bribery, burglary, theft, arson, obtaining money or goods under false pretenses, perjury, forgery, embezzlement or bigamy, and who has paid on or before the first day of February of the year of which he shall offer to vote, all taxes which may have been legally required of him, and which he has had an opportunity of paying according to law for the two preceding years, and who shall produce to the officers holding the election satisfactory evidence that he has paid said taxes, is declared to be a qualified elector; but every minister of the gospel in charge of an organized church shall be entitled to vote after six months' residence in the election district if otherwise qualified." By other provisions, representation in the house and senate was apportioned among the counties, and the counties were arranged in three groups, and the minimum representation to which each group should be entitled in the house was fixed; but it was provided that a reduction in the number of senators and representatives might be made by the legislature, if the same be uniform in each of the said three divisions. To the election of the governor by the popular vote, it is necessary that some person shall receive not only a majority of the popular vote, but also a majority of "electoral votes," which are votes distributed among the several counties in proportion to the number of representatives to which they are respectively entitled. If no person shall receive such majorities, then the house of representatives is required to choose a governor from the two persons who shall have received the highest number of popular votes. Const. §§ 254-256, 140, 141.

If we look at the map of the state, and at the census reports, showing the racial distribution of our population, and consider these in connection with the apportionment of the Constitution, it will at once appear that, unless there shall be a great shifting of population, the control of the legislative department of the state is so fixed in the counties having majorities of whites as to render exceedingly improbable that it can be changed in the near future by the ordinary flow of immigration, or by the growth by births among our own people. The election of the chief executive of the state is also largely affected by the same means. It is in the highest degree improbable that there was not a consistent, controlling directing purpose governing the convention by which these schemes were elaborated and fixed in the Constitution. Within the field of permissible action under the limitations imposed by the Federal Constitution, the convention swept the circle of expedients to obstruct the exercise of the franchise by the negro race. By reason of its previous condition of servitude and dependence, this race had acquired or accentuated peculiarities of habit, of temperament, and of character, which clearly distinguished it as a race from that of the whites,—a patient, docile people, but careless, landless, and migratory within narrow limits, without forethought, and its criminal members given rather to furtive offenses than to the robust crimes of the whites. Restrained by the Federal Constitution from discriminating against the negro race, the convention discriminated against its characteristics and the offenses to which its weaker members were prone. A voter who should move out of his election precinct, though only to an adjoining farm, was declared ineligible until his new residence should have continued for a year. Payment of taxes for two years at or before a date fixed many months anterior to an election is another requirement, and one well calculated to disqualify the careless. Burglary, theft, arson, and obtaining money under false pretenses were declared to be disqualifications, while robbery and murder and other crimes in which violence was the principal ingredient were not.

In the article of franchise is found the section we have under consideration. True, as argued by counsel, it was a revenue measure, for it imposes a tax. But it is also true that the payment of the tax is one of the qualifications of an elector, and the question is whether its primary purpose is for revenue, with incidental disqualification to vote attached upon its nonpayment, or whether the tax was levied primarily as an additional disqualification to those who should not pay it, with the incident of revenue derivable from those who should pay. It is to be noted that the section is a part of the article on franchise, and not of that on common schools, in aid of which the tax was levied, and where it would more appropriately be placed as a revenue measure. This is not of great importance, but is of some weight. When a Constitution is submitted to the vote of the people, and becomes operative only when adopted by them, we are aware of the rule that the debates of the convention and the journals showing how and when amendments were introduced, and the course of procedure, are of little weight. The reason is that, under such circumstances, it is not so much what the members of the convention thought or said upon a given subject, as what the people intended to declare by adopting the instrument, that is material. But it must be remembered that our Constitution was never submitted to the people. It was put in operation by the body which framed it, and therefore the question is what that body meant by the language used. In this view, the following history of the subject of poll taxes, as appearing in the journals of the convention, will cast some light upon the question involved: The poll tax was first suggested by some amendments offered by Mr. Calhoun (the president of the convention), of which 300 copies were ordered to be printed, and the amendments were referred to the appropriate committees. The poll-tax section was among the amendments relating to franchise, and, as offered, provided that its payment should be a prerequisite to entitle one to vote, but "no penalty other than levy and sale of landed property shall ever be exacted for its nonpayment." Journals, p. 88. The 7th section of the article on education, as reported by the committee on that subject, was as follows: "The legislature shall levy a poll tax of $2 a head in aid of the common school fund, and for no other purposes, and the payment of said tax shall be made compulsory, under such conditions and exceptions as may be deemed best by the legislature." Id. p. 121. As reported to the convention by the committee on franchise, the clause now under consideration read as follows: "Said tax to be a lien on taxable property." Id. p. 135. As adopted, it was in its present form. Id. p. 238. It is evident, therefore, that the convention had before it for consideration two antagonistic propositions: One, to levy a poll tax as a revenue measure, and to make its payment compulsory; the other, to impose the tax as one of many devices for excluding from the franchise a large number of persons, which class it was impracticable wholly to exclude, and not desirable wholly to admit. In our opinion, the clause was primarily intended by the framers of the Constitution as a clog upon the franchise, and secondarily and incidentally only as a means of revenue.

Having reached this conclusion, it follows as a corollary that, when the language used is susceptible of two constructions, it must be so construed as to carry into effect the purposes of the convention. It is evident that, the more the payment of the tax is made compulsory, the greater will be the number by whom it will be paid, and therefore the less effectual will be the clause for the purpose it was intended. It cannot be denied that it was the purpose of the convention to declare a different rule in reference to property subject to taxation and that which was exempt; and, when we consider the fact that a very large proportion of those it was thought desirable to exclude from the exercises of the franchise owned no other property than that which had for many years been exempted from taxation, the conclusion becomes irresistible that it was intended to leave the payment of the tax to the voluntary action of those who owned no other than non-taxable property.

Having reached this conclusion, it is not deemed necessary to examine and review the various statutes which have been brought to our attention. They were all brought forward into the Code of 1892 from the Code of 1890, which was enacted under our former Constitution, in which there were no restrictions. They must now be confined in their operations to such property as is within the competency of the legislature to subject to seizure and sale.

The decree is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

Edgar M. WESTERVELT, Receiver of Citizens' National Bank of Grand Island, Pff. in Err.,

George A. MOHRENSTECHEK et al.

(76 Fed. Rep. 118.)

1. The bond of a cashier of a national bank for the faithful performance of his duties "for and during all the time he shall hold the said office" covers defaults in years subsequent to that in which it is given, notwithstanding the by-laws of the bank provide, that the cashier shall be elected annually, and a resolution appointing him to the office was passed in each year, as the act of Congress relating to national banks provides that the cashier may be dismissed at pleasure of the board of directors, and the first appointment under such act is for an unlimited term.

2. It is no defense to an action upon the bond of a cashier of a national bank for misappropriation of money and excessive loans that the bank or its receiver has obtained judgments upon the notes taken by the cashier for such money and loans.

(August 31, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce liability on the bond of a bank cashier. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. O. A. Abbott and Ralph W. Breckinridge, for plaintiff in error:

The office of cashier of the Citizens' National Bank of Grand Island, Nebraska, was not an annual office. The directors of said bank had no power to hire a cashier for a specified time, and George A. Mohrenstecher held the office of cashier from the time he was qualified as such until the suspension of the bank, at the pleasure of the board of directors.

No by-law could make this an annual office.

In the absence of any allegation on the part of the sureties of knowledge on their part of the existence of the by-law in question, they are conclusively presumed to have contracted solely with reference to the statutory term of office, and can claim no rights or exemptions under such by-law.

The language of the bond in suit is broad enough to cover the whole time that Mohrenstecher filled the office of cashier.

Mr. John W. Blee also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. C. C. Flansburg and S. L. Geishardt, for defendants in error Stull and O. A. Mohrenstecher:

Where the by-laws of a national bank provide that the directors, at their first meeting in January of each year, shall elect a cashier of said bank, and that said cashier shall hold his office for one year and until his successor is elected and qualified, the office of such cashier is to be construed as an annual office.

Whether the office was annual or not, Mohrenstecher's original appointment was terminated by the directors on January 14, 1890.

United States v. Kirkpatrick, 23 U. S. 9 Wheat. 720, 6 L. ed. 199.

A bond, general in its terms and unlimited as to time, nevertheless binds the sureties thereon only for the period to which the office may be limited by the charter or by-laws of the corporation, or up to the time of the election of a successor to the incumbent in the person either of himself or of another.

The suit by the receiver upon the notes was an election of remedies and an adoption and ratification of the cashier's act in making the loans. He was the representative, not only of the bank, but also of the creditors and all parties concerned. He is therefore estopped to maintain this action since it implies a repudiation of acts which he has solemnly made his own.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action upon the bond of the cashier of the Citizens' National Bank of Grand Island, Nebraska, brought by Edgar M. Westervelt, the receiver of that bank. The defendant in error George A. Mohrenstecher was the cashier, and the principal, and Mary Mohrenstecher, Otto A. Morenstecher, and William Stull were the sureties, on the bond. Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff below upon the pleadings, on the ground that the office of cashier of this bank was an annual office, and that the delinquencies charged in the petition occurred after the expiration of the year during which the bondsmen were liable. The facts material to the questions presented to this court, which were disclosed by the pleadings, are: The Citizens' National Bank of Grand Island, Nebraska, was a national banking association engaged in the business of banking from some time anterior to January, 1899, until on December 4, 1893, it suspended payment and went into the hands of the plaintiff in error, who was appointed its receiver by the comptroller of the currency. The national bank act provides that such a banking association shall be a body corporate and shall have power:

"Fifth. To elect or appoint directors, and by its board of directors to appoint a president, vice-president, cashier, and other officers, define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalty thereof, dismiss such officers or any of them at pleasure, and appoint others to fill their places. Sixth. To prescribe, by its board of directors, by-laws not inconsistent with law, regulating the manner in which its stock shall be transferred, its directors elected or appointed, its officers appointed, its property transferred, its general business conducted, and the privileges granted to it by law exercised and enjoyed." 13 Stat. at L. chap. 106, p. 101, § 8; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5136, p. 993.

The articles of association of this bank provided: "The board of directors shall have power . . . to elect or appoint a cashier and such other officers and clerks as may be required to transact the business of the association; to fix the salaries to be paid to them, and continue them in office or dismiss them, as in the opinion of a majority of the board the interests of the association may demand."

The by-laws of the association provided that the cashier of the bank should be elected at the first meeting of the board of directors in January of each year; that he should give a bond in the sum of $10,000, and should hold his office one year, and until his successor should be elected and qualified. One D. H. Vieths was appointed cashier of this bank at the annual meeting of its board of directors in January, 1889, and resigned in May of that year. Thereupon the board of directors passed this resolution: "Resolved, That George A. Mohrenstecher be appointed cashier of this bank;" and Mohrenstecher entered upon the discharge of his duties as cashier, and continued to discharge them until the bank suspended on December 4, 1893. On August 13, 1889, the defendants in error delivered their bond in the sum of $10,000 to the bank, and the latter accepted it, and never thereafter took any other bond to secure the faithful discharge of the duties of this cashier. This bond contained no recital of the time or term for which Mohrenstecher was appointed, and no reference of any kind to his appointment, or to the time during which the obligors bound themselves to be responsible for his acts, except that which is contained in the following condition of the bond, viz.:

"The condition of the above obligation is such that whereas the above-bound Geo. A. Mohrenstecher has been appointed cashier of the Citizens' Nat. Bank of Grand Island, Nebr., by reason whereof he will receive into his hands and have under his care and charge money, goods, and chattels, and other things the property of said bank. Now, if the said Geo. A. Mohrenstecher for and during all the time he shall hold the said office of cashier of the said bank shall execute the duties thereof with integrity and fidelity, and will faithfully perform and fulfil the trust thereby in him reposed, and well and truly at all times when thereunto required, account for and render over to said bank all moneys, goods, chattels, and other things the property of said bank that may come into his hands, possession, or control, so that no default, fraud, or failure shall happen or be occasioned by any neglect or failure on his part to perform his duties as such cashier, then this obligation shall be void, otherwise it shall remain in full force and virtue."

On January 14, 1890, and at the first meeting of the board of directors in each January thereafter, that board passed a resolution in substantially this form:

"Resolved, That George A. Mohrenstecher be appointed cashier of this bank."

Subsequent to January 14, 1890, Mohrenstecher appropriated to his own use large amounts of money of the bank, under the pretense of loaning it to himself and others, whose promissory notes he took, payable to the bank, and placed among its assets. He also loaned money of the bank, in excess of the amounts permitted by the national bank act, to several persons, upon their promissory notes. By these unlawful acts of its cashier, 84 L. R. A.

the bank lost $17,321.82. The bank or its receiver obtained judgments upon the various notes so taken in its name, but has been unable to collect the judgments. The defendant in error Mary Mohrenstecher was a married woman when she signed the bond.

Were the obligors on this bond liable for the defaults of the principal in it after January 14, 1890, under this state of facts? The contention of their counsel is that the office of cashier of this bank was an annual office, and that their liability was limited to the unexpired term of Vieths, for which Mohrenstecher was appointed in May, 1889. It is familiar law that, in cases, where the term of office to which the principal is elected or appointed is fixed by law, the liability of his bondsmen will be limited to the current term, unless they expressly agree to continue liable after its expiration. Harris v. Babbitt, 4 Dill. 185; United States v. Irving, 42 U. S. 1 How. 250, 259, 11 L. ed. 120, 124; United States v. Kirkpatrick, 23 U. S. 9 Wheat. 720, 6 L. ed. 199; Savings Bank v. Hunt, 72 Mo. 597, 37 Am. Rep. 449; Wapello County v. Bigham, 10 Iowa, 59, 74 Am. Dec. 870; Wardens of St. Saviour's v. Bostock, 2 Bos. & P. 175; Dover v. Twombly, 42 N. H. 59; Welch v. Seymour, 28 Conn. 887; Scott County v. Ring, 29 Minn. 398; Tresno Enterprise Co. v. Allen, 67 Cal. 505; Biselow v. Bridge, 8 Mass. 274; Chelmsford Co. v. Demarest, 7 Gray, 1; Hassell v. Clark, 33 Barb. 196. It is equally well settled that, where the bond recites the length of the term for which the officer is elected or appointed, the liability of the bondsmen is presumed to be limited to that term, in the absence of an express agreement to be responsible for a longer time. Lord Arlington v. Merricke, 8 Wms. Saund. 411; Liverpool Waterworks Co. v. Atkinson, 6 East, 507; Kaw Life Assn. v. Lemke, 40 Kan. 661, 664. But a bond for the fidelity of one who holds his office during the pleasure of the appointing power covers all delinquencies until he resigns or is removed. Ezeler Bank v. Rogers, 7 N. H. 21, 23. No one denies that the law favors sureties, that doubts of the extent of their liability are to be resolved in their favor, and that the burden of proof is upon the obligee to establish their liability upon their bond. But, after all is said, a bond is nothing but a contract. It is the written evidence of the meeting of the minds of the parties to it, and, subject to the rules favoring sureties to which we have referred, it must be construed by the established canons for the interpretation of contracts. The rule for the construction of contracts which prevails over all others is that the court may put itself in the place of the contracting parties; may consider, in view of all the facts and circumstances surrounding them at the time of the execution of the instrument, what they intended by the terms of their contract, and when their intention is manifest it must control in the interpretation of the instrument, regardless of inapt expressions, or more technical rules of construction. Accumulator Co. v. Dubuque Street R. Co. 27 U. S. App. 364, 872, 13 C. C. A. 87, 41, 42, and 64 Fed. Rep'

70, 74. Let us apply this salutary rule to the bond in this case. The act of Congress under which this bank was organized provided that its board of directors might appoint a cashier, require bonds of him, and fix the penalty thereof, and dismiss him at pleasure, and appoint another to fill his place. Its articles of association provided that the board might appoint a cashier, fix his salary, and continue him in office, or dismiss him, as in the opinion of a majority of the board the interests of the association might require. It is plain that, in the absence of any other regulations, a cashier once appointed under this act of Congress and these articles of association would hold his office until he resigned, or until the board of directors of the bank dismissed him. A subsequent appointment of the same man to the same office would have no more effect upon him, or upon the term of his office, than a second deed of the same property by one who had already conveyed it to the same grantee would have. The only act of the board of directors that could affect the tenure of his office, under the act of Congress, would be his dismissal.

It is, however, contended that the by-laws (which provided that the cashier should be elected at the annual meeting in January in each year, should give a bond in the sum of $10,000, and should hold his office for one year and until his successor was elected and qualified) made this an annual office, and limited the term of the office of this cashier to the unexpired portion of the year for which his predecessor, Vieths, was elected. But how could the by-laws of this bank repeal or modify the act of Congress and the articles of association under which they were enacted? The act of Congress expressly fixed the tenure of office of the cashier of this bank. It expressly provided that the board of directors might dismiss the cashier and certain other officers "or any of them at pleasure and appoint others to fill their places." It provided that this cashier should always hold his office subject to instantaneous removal at the pleasure of the board of directors. Nor is it at all probable that this provision of the national bank act was inserted without purpose or consideration. Observation and experience alike teach that it is essential to the safety and prosperity of banking institutions that the active officers, to whose integrity and discretion the moneys and property of the bank and its customers are intrusted, should be subject to immediate removal whenever the suspicion of faithlessness or negligence attaches to them. High credit is indispensable to the success and prosperity of a bank. Without it, customers cannot be induced to deposit their moneys. When it has once been secured, and then declines, those who have deposited demand their cash, the income of the bank dwindles, and often bankruptcy follows. It sometimes happens that, without any justification, a suspicion of dishonesty or carelessness attaches to a cashier or a president of a bank, spreads through the community in which he lives, scares the depositors, and threatens immediate financial ruin to the institution. In such a case it is necessary to the prosperity and success—to the very existence—of a banking institution that the board of directors should have power to remove such an officer, and to put in his place another, in whom the community has confidence. In our opinion, the provision of the act of Congress to which we have referred was inserted, ex industria, to provide for this very contingency. In any event, it is there, and it clearly provides that the cashier of a national bank may be dismissed at the pleasure of the board of directors, and that it may appoint, not the same man again but another in his place. National banks are the creatures of the act of Congress. Under familiar principles, they have no powers beyond those expressly granted, and those fairly incidental thereto. Re Omaha Bridge Cases, 10 U. S. App. 98, 174, 2 C. C. A. 174, and 51 Fed. Rep. 809; Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 2 C. C. A. 174, 280, 51 Fed. Rep. 309, 816, 10 U. S. App. 98. It follows from this principle that, since the act of Congress expressly provides that the cashiers of national banks should hold their offices subject to the pleasure of the board of directors, neither the bank nor its board can make time contracts or appointments in violation of that provision. Hurrlington v. First Nat. Bank, 1 Thomp. & C. 361; Boone, Banking, § 353; Ball, Banks, 65. What, then, is the effect of these established rules upon the by-laws of this bank? It is that that part of these by-laws which provides that the cashier shall hold his office for one year, and that he shall be elected annually, must fall, and the cashier of the bank must hold his office under the act of Congress, subject to immediate removal at the pleasure of the board of directors, until he resigns or is removed.

It is argued that the fact that this cashier was again appointed in January of each year converted his term of office from a continuous term, at the will of the board of directors, into annual terms. If the board of this bank had passed daily resolutions appointing him cashier, would those resolutions have made his term of office daily? The fact is that he would have continued in office exactly as he did, if none of the resolutions or appointments subsequent to May, 1889, had ever been passed or made by the board of directors. His first appointment was, under the act of Congress, to an unlimited term,—to a term that could be ended by the bank only by his dismissal by its board of directors. That board never did dismiss him. It never did appoint another to take his place. How subsequent resolutions of appointment could affect the term of his office, which was fixed by this act of Congress, it is difficult to understand. It seems clear that his appointment to an office which he already held, and would continue to hold without further appointments, could not be more than the manifestation of an intention on the part of the board of directors that he should continue to hold his position. 1 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 27, p. 80; Amherst Bank v. Root, 2 Met. 522, 539; Dedham Bank v. Chickering, 3 Pick. 335, 340. Now, let us place ourselves in the situation of the parties when this bond was made, and see if its expression of their intention is doubtful. Mohrenstecher had been appointed cashier of this bank in May, 1889. On August 13 in that year, three months after he was appointed, and four months before the annual election of cashier, according to these by laws, Mohrenstecher and his sureties gave a bond to this bank, in which they recited his appointment, and agreed to pay the penalty of the bond unless "the said Geo. A. Mohrenstecher, for and during all the time he shall hold the said office of cashier of the said bank, shall execute the duties thereof with integrity and fidelity," etc. It must be conceded that the obligors in this bond had the right and the power to agree to indemnify the bank against any defaults of Mohrenstecher, as its cashier, during the time subsequent, as well as during the time antecedent, to January 14, 1890, when they claim that their liability ceased. They certainly could, by apt words, have expressed their intention to limit their liability for him to the time antecedent to that date. They certainly might, by suitable expressions, have declared their intention to be liable for him both before and after that date. Which did they do in this bond? Is an agreement to indemnify "during all the time he shall continue to hold the office of cashier" an expression of an intention to indemnify for the first four months of the time he should continue to hold that office, or for all the time he should continue to hold it? This is the real question here, and it seems to us to be susceptible of but one answer. No apter or more suitable words than those used in this bond occur to us to express an intention on the part of these obligors to continue to be liable as long as Mohrenstecher should continue to hold this office, and we are unwilling to hold that the English language is incapable of giving expression to that idea. After a thoughtful and deliberate consideration of the plain words of this bond, and of the facts and circumstances surrounding these parties when it was made, all doubt of its meaning, and of the intention of the parties to it when it was executed, has disappeared from our minds; and the conclusion has been irresistibly forced upon us that these obligors intended to agree, and did agree, to indemnify the bank for the defaults of Mohrenstecher until he ceased to be its cashier.

The fact that the bank or its receiver has sued and obtained judgments upon the promissory notes which this cashier took for misappropriated money of the bank and for excess loans is no defense to this action. This is not an action to rescind any contract and recover back the consideration thereof. It is an action for damages for breach of the conditions of this bond. The obligation of the bond is to pay any loss or damage which the bank sustained by the failure of this cashier to faithfully fulfill and perform the trust reposed in him, and to comply with the other conditions expressed therein. Neither the bank nor the receiver is required to repudiate his transactions, or restore the consideration it has received from them, in order to maintain this action. There is no inconsistency between an action upon the notes he wrongfully took, and a recovery of all that the makers can pay upon judgments thereon, and an action upon this bond for the losses sustained by the breach of its conditions. The bank and the receiver may take every benefit they can derive from the acts of this cashier, use every just endeavor to collect every note he has obtained in the name of the bank, and at the same time may press this action on the bond for the damages caused by the breach of its conditions. Of course, the bank and the receiver can have but one payment and satisfaction of the debts owing upon the notes the cashier took, and when they are paid in full that payment will constitute a defense to this action, but until then both remedies may be pursued. Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Caduc, 144 Mass. 85; Walden Nat. Bank v. Birch, 130 N. Y. 221, 14 L. R. A. 211; Emery v. Baltz, 94 N. Y. 408; White v. Smith, 83 Pa. 186, 75 Am. Dec. 589.

Whether or not this bond was signed or based upon the faith and credit of the married woman, Mary Mohrenstecher, or made with reference to her separate estate, is a disputed question under these pleadings, which does not appear to have been considered by the court below. For that reason, and because this judgment cannot be sustained in favor of the other defendants in error in any event, we will not enter upon its consideration until it has been decided by the circuit court.

The judgment below must be reversed, with costs, and the case remanded to the court below, with directions to proceed to its trial.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Robert DOSTER

v.

(117 N. C. 651.)

The frightening of a mule, caused by the usual noise incident to running a street car by electricity, without any unnecessary noise made for the purpose of scaring the animal, does not make the street-railway company liable for resulting damages.

(December 20, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Mecklenburg

NOTE.—Frightening of horse by street car.

1. Generally.
2. By bells, gongs, and whistles.
3. By steam.
4. Contributory negligence.

The case of DOSTER v. CHARLOTTE STREET R. Co. holds that an electric street-railway company was not liable for injuries caused by a mule backing and breaking a part of the buggy, where the mule was frightened by the noise of a street car coming towards him run by electricity, and there was no testimony to show that the motorman wantonly or maliciously made any unnecessary noise for the purpose of scaring the animal, and the car was stopped 15 feet distant from where the mule had

County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to hold defendant liable for injuries and expenses caused to plaintiff by reason of defendant's alleged negligence in frightening his mule. Reversed.

Plaintiff was driving a mule along a public street and met a street car coming towards him. The mule was frightened and began to rear and back. In so doing he broke some portions of the buggy. Plaintiff thereupon signaled the motorman to stop, which he failed to do until he had arrived opposite the place where the plaintiff was trying to control the animal. Plaintiff sued for injury to the buggy and to the mule, and for loss of time and expense which had been caused by the accident. Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Burwell, Walker, & Cansler, for appellant:

If a railway company runs its cars in the ordinary way, without making any unusual or unnecessary noises, it is not liable to plaintiff, whose horse becomes frightened at the cars and causes injury to the plaintiff.

Morgan v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 98 N. C. 248; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, title Street Railways, p. 1081; Pittsburgh Southern R. Co. v. Taylor, 104 Pa. 806, 49 Am. Rep. 580.

stopped. The court held that a motorman was not negligent in failing to diminish the speed unless the animal was actually on the track in his front, or unless the motorman had reasonable ground to believe that the animal was so frightened that he would cause a collision.

I. Generally.

The cases hold that a street-railway company is not liable for injuries caused by horses being frightened by the cars or gong, where the danger could not have been anticipated by the employees of the railway company, or where there was no negligence on their part in running the cars, or where there is no evidence that the injury is caused by their cars, or where the driver of the horses is guilty of contributory negligence. Some of the cases tend to the doctrine that the ringing of the gong is not negligence on the part of the company, and that the presumption from horses being hitched near the track is that they are used to the cars. The rule is that a company is only required to use reasonable care in operating the cars.

But a street-railway company was held liable for injuries where the employees unnecessarily, recklessly, or violently sounded the gong or made other noises frightening horses, thereby causing injury, and where the danger was apparent and could have been avoided by the use of reasonable care on the part of the employees of the company, and especially where the place was more dangerous than usual owing to a narrow roadway or obstructions.

A stricter degree of care is required where the dangerous character of the place is caused by the street-railway company. And recovery has been allowed against a city, which without authority allowed the use of steam on a street railway, which caused an injury by frightening a horse.

So, an electric-car company was not held liable where horses were frightened at the sounding of a car gong, and ran away and killed a man in a buggy, and the driver said "the horses pulled me over the end gate on the tongue and ran away," as, while the horses were attached to the wagon and the driver's feet were inside, he could not be pulled out on the tongue while holding on to the lines. There was no evidence that he was jolted out by the wagon striking an obstruction, nor that the motorman could reasonably anticipate that the driver would be placed in such a perilous and helpless position by anything that was occurring. This decision was on the ground that the law does not imply that the driver of the horse is in peril because the horse is merely frightened by a trolley car, but the presumption is that the driver will be able to control the horse. The court also held that the motorman must use reasonable care if he sees that the driver is in peril. East St. Louis & St. L. Electric Street R. Co. v. Wachtel, 63 Ill. App. 181.

And a company was not held liable where a team became restive at the approach of an electric car, and the driver left the rear end of his wagon and went to the horses' heads to quiet them, and the car stopped at a crossing near the horses, the gripman at the same time ringing his bell, and the horses took fright and ran away. The court said that the plaintiff might naturally be supposed to be able to control the horses, standing at their heads, and the ringing of the bell was not negligence. A steam whistle tends to alarm horses, but a traction bell does not. Steiner v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 134 Pa. 199.

And the same was held where a team hitched to a post on a street was frightened by the sounding of a street-car gong while the car was moving along the track, and broke loose and ran away causing injury to the wagon, and it did not appear that the gong was sounded unnecessarily or negligently, and it was not shown that the driver of the car was aware that the horses were frightened. The court said that the motorman might well act on the presumption that teams standing on the side of the street were not liable to be frightened. North Side Street R. Co. v. Tippins (Tex. App.) 14 S. W. 1067.

And was not held liable where a horse was frightened at the movement of a street car in being replaced on the track, and the horse reared and fell dead, and there was nothing unusual in the movements to restore the car to the track; and this on the ground that street-car companies have just as much right to run cars on the streets of the city as other citizens have to drive through the streets with their horses. There was no evidence that the death was caused by the cars. Hassel v. People's Pass. R. Co. 122 Pa. 90.

So, where the motorman rang a gong when he saw in front of his car a carriage with the back curtain closed, and it was his duty to ring a warning at the crossing, and the injury was caused by the effort to pass the car by the driver losing one line and the control of the horse, and personal injuries resulted, the company was not held liable. The court said that the mere fact that the horse became frightened at an electric car and by the sounding of its gong, and ran away, does not make the car company liable. But if the motorman discovered that the horse was frightened and danger was apparent, his continuing to sound the gong would be such wilful conduct as to make the company liable. Galesburg Electric Motor & P. Co. v. Manville, 61 Ill. App. 490.

And a company was not held liable where a dummy train was ascending a steep grade, and someone, without authority, checked the train with a brake, and the conductor had the brake taken off to help the engineer advance the train, and the engineer, not knowing this fact, reversed the engine at the same time, which caused the train to back too rapidly, causing a collision with a wagon which was on the track, by reason of the mules being suddenly frightened by the backward movement of the train, and personal injuries resulted. Rome Street R. Co. v. McGinnis, 94 Ga. 229.

So, where a driver was injured by reason of her horse being frightened by an approaching electric

If plaintiff could have avoided the consequence of defendant's negligence, or was himself negligent at the same time that defendant was, he cannot recover.

Mr. James A. Bell, for appellee:

A street railroad accepts its charter on the implied condition that it will not injure others by the construction or maintenance of its road. It must be maintained upon the most approved plans, and by the use of common and approved means, with a view to the safety and convenience of the public traveling on the streets.

2 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. 1005.

The rules which govern ordinary railroads does not apply to street railways.

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 942.

The very business of a street railway requires that it should operate its cars along the most public streets, while the track of an ordinary railroad is generally laid to avoid the most public thoroughfares; the trains of any ordinary railroad are made up of many cars, car, which was not shown to have been moving at an unusual rate of speed, or at a rate greater than that allowed by a city ordinance, and the horse turned suddenly and the wheel of the wagon struck an obstacle and upset the wagon, the company was not held liable. Yingst v. Lebanon & A. Street R. Co. 107 Pa. 438.

And the company was not liable where the motorman failed to stop the car, simply because a horse on the same street had become frightened at the appearance and noise of a car run by steam, and the failure to stop the car was not shown by the circumstances to be a wanton and wilful disregard for the safety of the horse, so that the continued movement of the car could have been attributed only to malice. A demurrer was sustained to the petition, which alleged injury to plaintiff caused by the horse being frightened, running away, kicking the plaintiff and injuring him, as the court said there was no allegation of improper speed or needless noise, and it was consistent with the petition that the train was being operated with due care, and the only negligence charged was that the company did not stop the car to allow plaintiff to pass. But the petition charged that it was running at a high rate of speed, making a terrific noise so as to greatly frighten plaintiff's horses, which began to plunge to get away, that this was seen by defendant's employees, and that the place was in a very narrow point between the railroad and the bank of a river, and that the employees failed and neglected to stop the car until plaintiff could drive the horse past it. Chapman v. Zanesville Street R. Co. 27 Ohio L. J. 70.

A verdict against a street-car company was set aside as not sustained by sufficient evidence, where the horse took fright at an approaching car, and the motorman appeared to have been vigilant and active from the moment when he first saw the horse coming until the collision, and during that time the car only passed over a distance of 80 to 50 feet, and when the horse came near the car the driver had lost control of him and then the horse made a sharp turn in front of the car, capsize the buggy and caused the death of the driver, and there would have been no collision if the horses had not turned. It was claimed that if the motorman had stopped the car there would have been no collision, but the court said if he had, who can tell that the horse would have turned just as he did. Bishop v. Belle City Street R. Co. 93 Wis. 139.

And where a team driven by a full-grown man began to prance 175 feet distance from a car, and there was no evidence that the team seemed to be beyond control, and it backed suddenly in passing the car, threw the corner of the sleigh against the car and injured the persons riding therein, the company was not held liable. Eastwood v. La Crosse City R. Co. (Wis.) 68 N. W. 661.

And a recovery was refused where two women were standing in a buggy preparing to get out, and as the gripman began ringing a gong at the crossing of a street the horse reared and as the car came opposite backed the buggy against the car, and 34 L. R. A.

one of the women was injured. The horse had been accustomed to grip cars and the gong, and it was mere conjecture why the horse suddenly lost his good behavior, and his bad behavior was not shown to have been provoked by the street-car company, and what scared the horse was mere opinion. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Harma, 59 Ill. App. 378.

So, where a team was frightened at the sight of cars being operated upon the street, the company was not liable unless it failed to use reasonable care to avoid damages, after it discovered that there was danger by fright of teams or otherwise. Kankakee Electric R. Co. v. Lade, 55 Ill. App. 454.

An instruction that when the servants of an electric-car company "saw the plaintiff's horses were frightened, then it was the duty of the defendant company to have stopped its car and allowed plaintiff to get out of danger," was erroneous, as what the servants should do was a question for the jury and not for the court. Ibid.

So, an instruction that if an electric-car company "by watching out, could have seen plaintiff with his team, and that the team was frightened, then it was its duty to do what it could to avoid accident," is erroneous, as it was only the duty of the employees to use reasonable care to avoid injury. Ibid.

In a suit for personal injuries caused to the owner while driving horses which were frightened by cars, claiming that the company failed to stop the cars when the horses were frightened, a city ordinance requiring the motorman to keep a vigilant watch for carriages and govern himself accordingly was inadmissible in evidence. Ibid.

In Omaha Street R. Co. v. Duvall, 40 Neb. 22, it was said that a street-car company would not be liable if the motorman, in the exercise of reasonable care could not have checked the car in time to have avoided a collision, where the horse was frightened and sprang in front of the moving car causing injury to the rider.

But the reckless use of gong or steam, or failure to use reasonable care to prevent an anticipated accident, has been held sufficient to impose liability on street-railway companies, where injuries were caused by horses being frightened.

So, a recovery was had against a street-railway company where a person was injured by reason of his horse being frightened while standing near the track, and the gripman negligently sounded the gong violently and too near the horse while he was frightened. The court held that the case of Steiner v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 134 Pa. 199, to the effect that the traction bell does not naturally tend to alarm horses, was not approved. The question as to the effect of a gong is not local, but general, and the views of the state court of last resort are not binding on the Federal court on this question. A street-railway company is liable for damages caused by unnecessarily recklessly, and violently ringing the gong, when by due prudence harm might be properly avoided. Lightcap v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 60 Fed. Rep. 212, Affirmed Phila-and are heavy and difficult of management, while the street cars are easily controlled, and can be readily stopped and started.

Muncie Street R. Co. v. Maynard, 5 Ind. App. 372; Ellis v. Lynn & B. E. Co. 160 Mass. 841; Benjamin v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 8.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself, his buggy, and his mule to the risk of any accident which might be caused by the animal's taking fright at the usual noise incident to running a street car by electricity, there being no testimony tending to show that the motorman wantonly or maliciously made unnecessary noise for the purpose of scaring the animal. Where a horse is being driven or is running uncontrolled along a highway parallel to a railway of any kind, though it give unmistakable evidence by its movements that it is alarmed at an approaching train or car, the engineer or motorman in charge is not negligent in failing to diminish the speed, unless the animal is actually on the track, in his front, or he has reasonable ground to believe that in its excited state it is about to go or may go upon it, so as delphia Traction Co. v. Lightcap, 61 Fed. Rep. 762, 17 U. S. App. 606.

And where a woman was injured by her horse becoming frightened at a street car, and the motorman sounded the gong, overtook her and sounded the gong again, as the jury might find negligence if the car was not stopped nor its speed slackened, and the gong was sounded while the plaintiff was in obvious difficulty from the fright of her horse, the company was held liable. The court held that the omission to stop the car or to stop the noise of the gong, under the circumstances, might well be deemed to show carelessness. Benjamin v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 8.

And the company was held liable where horses ran away, and the servant of the railway company was guilty of negligence in continuing to ring the bell or sound the gong, when it appeared that the horses, which were frightened, would be likely to run away. The court held that it was the duty of the railway company to either stop the car or cease ringing the bell or sounding the gong, when the circumstances were such as to reasonably lead to the belief that to continue to do so would likely cause the team to run away. Citizens' R. Co. v. Hair (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 1060.

An electric-railway company was held liable where the driver of a carriage was injured by reason of the horse being frightened at the noise of an approaching electric street car, and such fright was manifest to the motorman, who continued to propel the car and to make a loud noise with the gong, causing the horse to become unmanageable, and threw the driver out of the carriage, and the driver was in the exercise of due care. The court said that the duty of a driver of a horse and the manager of an electric car upon a highway are equal, and each must have a reasonable regard for the safety and convenience of the other. Ellis v. Lynn & B. E. Co. 160 Mass. 841.

And the company was held liable where plaintiff was driving in front of an approaching dummy engine, and as he turned towards the curb the engineer sounded an unusual and extraordinary whistle, and the horses became frightened and ran in front of the engine and were injured. The court held that the question of negligence was one for the jury. Lott v. Frankford & S. Pass. R. Co. 159 Pa. 471.

A city was liable for damages where a person was injured by the fright of his horse occasioned by a steam motor upon the street, the fee of which was in the city for public uses, and the city without authority had permitted the use of steam motors on the streets, and McClain's (Iowa) Code, § 1282, authorized railways to cross over or under any highway, but this did not confer the power to grant the right to use steam on the streets. Stanley v. Davenport, 54 Iowa, 463, 87 Am. Rep. 216.

And the company was held liable where a boy riding in a vehicle was killed, and the horse was about 300 feet from the car and was frightened from the repeated sounding of the gong, and the motorman was in a position to see the peril of those riding in the wagon long before the collision, and to have avoided it with due care, but kept ringing the bell until within 20 or 30 feet of the wagon. It was shown that if he had slackened the speed of the car when he must have first seen the horse's actions, he could have stopped the car and prevented the injury, and the driver was not guilty of negligence. Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Lowe, 12 Ind. App. 47.

And a recovery was allowed where the plaintiff was sitting in a sleigh at the side of the road, and an electric car coming at a high rate of speed frightened another team causing it to run into plaintiff's question as to the rate of speed, and as to whether team, and the motorman did not slacken his speed or stop the car when he saw or should have seen that the team was frightened. The court held that the the motorman should have stopped the car, was for the jury. In this case the motorman admitted that he was instructed by the manager to stop if he found a team at all restive. Lines v. Winnipeg Electric Street R. Co. 11 Manitoba Rep. 77.

And a recovery was allowed where the motorman might, in the exercise of ordinary care, have seen at a distance of a square that the horse was frightened, and that the driver was in a perilous situation, and the motorman drove the car at a rate of 8 or 10 miles an hour, and injury resulted, although he might have stopped within a distance of 25 feet, and the horse had passed the car several times without becoming frightened on that evening. The court held that the question of negligence was one for the jury. Marion Street R. Co. v. Carr, 10 Ind. App. 200.

So a recovery was allowed where the horses were frightened by the engine and car, and the horses commenced to lunge and back, and finally one fell upon the track and the other fell upon that one, and the engine ran upon the animal killing him, and the evidence showed that the engineer could have seen the helpless position of the plaintiff in time to have stopped his train and have avoided injury. The court held that it was the duty of the engineer to be constantly on the alert, and if he discovered plaintiff's property so situated that injury must follow unless he stopped the engine, it was his duty to make a reasonable effort to do so. But the court said that it is not obligatory to stop an engine upon a street-car track upon seeing that a horse is frightened, unless the situation will cause a reasonable man to believe that danger could not otherwise be avoided. Muncie Street R. Co. v. Maynard, 5 Ind. App. 372.

And the company was held liable where the motorman in charge of the car could, in the exercise of reasonable care, have seen the plaintiff in time to have checked his car after the plaintiff's horse from sudden fright sprang upon the track and before a collision occurred which caused injury to the rider. The court said that utmost skill and watchfulness on the part of the motorman, as well as other employees of street-railway companies, is required to avoid collisions with individ-to cause a collision. Snowden v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 95 N. C. 98; Wilson v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 90 N. C. 69; Carlton v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 104 N. C. 385. Where the engineer on a railway train actually sees a person driving a team in the direction of a crossing in his front, or in the act of passing over it, it is not his duty to stop, unless he has reasonable ground to believe that the horse or vehicle is in some way fastened or detained upon the track, or that some emergency has arisen which may be reasonably expected to cause a collision, with consequent injury to person or property. Bullock v. Wilmington & W. R. Co.

105 N. C. 180; Rigler v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 94 N. C. 604. It may often happen that greater care is obviously necessary to avoid in jury to a loose, frightened animal (as in Wilson v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. supra) than to a man in the same position, on or off a track, because, if apparently in possession of all of his powers and faculties, the man may be reasonably expected, up to the last moment, to avoid peril, while the excited animal is as ready to rush into as to run away from danger. There was no testimony tending to show that the mule was upon the track in front of the car, or that there was any apparent danger that it would uals equally entitled to the use of public highways. Omaha Street R. Co. v. Duvall, 40 Neb. 29.

And a company was held liable where an electric car was running at a high rate of speed faster than usual at a place at which there was a cut in the street, and a high embankment caused by the company, and a horse in the cut became frightened and attempted to climb out of the roadway over the embankment and his rider pulled him back, and while trying to dismount, the horse was struck by the car. The court held that the obstruction in the street tended to cause the injuries, and great care should have been used in running the cars at such a place. Greeley v. Federal Street & P. V. Pass. R. Co. 153 Pa. 218.

And was held liable where a team of horses was being driven in a narrow place near the track, and as soon as the electric car came in sight became frightened and unmanageable, and began to rear and jump and one of them was injured by the car, which was running at a high rate of speed, and the conductor saw or ought to have seen, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, the team, and that they were frightened. The court held that it was the duty of the conductor to stop or slow up when failing to do so would cause an injury. And the question of negligence was for the jury. Gibbons v. Wilkesbarre & S. Street R. Co. 155 Pa. 379.

And a company was held liable where it ran its cars fast with an engine and smoke, steam, and noise which were frightful to horses, and the persons on the engine saw, some distance away, that a horse driven by a woman was frightened, and ran so close that she could not turn and get away on account of a pile of rocks, and the buggy was upset. The charter of the company did not disclose any authority for propelling its street cars by steam. It was said that even if it did, the franchise would not excuse it from liability from injuries caused by negligence, where such negligence consisted in the mismanagement of the cars or in the character of the motive power. Lincoln Rapid Transit Co. v. Nichols, 37 Neb. 332, 20 L. R. A. 858.

A railway company was held liable where a horse was injured by a collision, caused by an electric car coming at a high rate of speed where the roadway was very narrow, and as soon as the car came in sight the horses began to rear and jump, and the conductor saw or ought to have seen, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, the team, and that they were frightened, and in view of the narrow road should have slowed up the car. Gibbons v. Wilkesbarre & S. Street R. Co. supra.

And where horses driven alongside of a car track were frightened by the car, although there was no negligence in starting the car, but the presence of the car prevented the plaintiff from seeing a mass of snow which had been accumulated contrary to an ordinance by the railroad company, in cleaning its track, and which caused his buggy to upset and injure him, a recovery was allowed. It was a question for the jury whether the negligence in piling the snow was not the cause of the accident, although the company was not liable for the frightening of the horse when there was no negligence in that part of it. It was said that if plaintiff's horses had shown indications of fright before the car had started, and this had been seen by the servants of defendant, it might be submitted to the jury whether to start the car under such circumstances would not be negligence, if plaintiff was injured by being thrown out of his vehicle by the frightened horse. McDonald v. Toledo Consol. Street R. Co. 74 Fed. Rep. 104, 43 U. S. App. 73.

And the court refused to set aside a verdict for plaintiff, where the evidence was conflicting as to whether there was not room for a car to pass without hitting a wagon, and the motorman disregarded the signal to stop until the horse could be unhitched, and collided with the wagon and injured the horse, or whether there was room to pass, and the horse became frightened and turned the wagon so as to strike the car. Kestner v. Pittsburgh & B. Traction Co. 158 Pa. 422.

A recovery was allowed where a person with horses was riding one and leading the other, and the street car touched one of them and excited them, and the evidence was conflicting as to whether or not the horses were so agitated by the subsequent use of the street-car driver's whip as to cause them to fall near the car on the ice, injuring the rider. Berke v. Twenty-Third Street R. Co. 22 N. Y. S. R. 432.

And where a person was injured by her horse becoming frightened from the noise, steam, and smoke of a steam engine on a street railway. Whether the horse was fractious or skittish, or whether the party injured was a proper driver, were questions for the jury. The court held that if the negligence of the company was the proximate cause, the fact that the horse was fractious or she a poor driver would not relieve the company from liability. Lincoln Rapid Transit Co. v. Nichols, 37 Neb. 332, 20 L. R. A. 858.

So, where a woman was injured by her horse becoming frightened at the gong of a street car, the question as to whether or not the horse was a proper one for her to drive was held to be a question for the jury. The mere failure to look, by a woman driving a horse, where she was injured by reason of the horse being frightened by the gong of the car not at a crossing, will not prevent a recovery by her. Benjamin v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 3.

2. By bells, gongs, and whistles.

A street-car company was not held liable for injuries caused by frightening a horse by a bell where the motorman had reason to suppose that the horse was under control. (See subdivisions 1 and 4 for fuller statement of facts in these cases.) Steiner v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 134 Pa. 199.

So, where plaintiff was guilty of gross negligence. Philadelphia Traction Co. v. Bernheimer, 125 Pa. 615 rush upon it. The motorman was the servant of the quasi corporation, which enjoyed privileges granted to it by the legislature in consideration of its duty to transport passengers safely and more speedily than they are ordinarily carried in vehicles drawn by horses. People who pay their money in the reasonable expectation of being carried expeditiously are not to be delayed by every person who ventures to test the nerve of a horse or a mule by driving it along the same street on which a company runs its street cars by electricity. Where persons subject themselves to such risks, and no collision with the moving car ensues, injuries caused by the conduct of frightened animals are deemed in law to be due directly to their own want of care. Where the animal rushes upon the track in front of the car, the company is answerable for the consequences of a collision only where, by proper watchfulness on the part of the motorman, the danger might have been foreseen, and the injury avoided by using the appliances at his command to stop the car. Where there is apparent danger of running over or coming in contact with persons or animals, either the principle announced in Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (decided at this term) 117 N. C. 616, 30 L. R. A. 257, or that laid down in Wilson v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. supra, may be applicable. But it does not appear that the plaintiff was on or very near to the track. The car, according to the undisputed testimony, was stopped 15 feet distant from the place where his mule had stopped. There was error in refusing to charge the jury that in no aspect of the evidence could they find in response to the issue that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant.

For this error a new trial must be awarded.

And the same was held in cases of fright to horses by use of a gong, where the motorman could not reasonably have anticipated that injury would result. East St. Louis & St. L. Electric Street R. Co. v. Wachtel, 63 Ill. App. 181; North Side Street R. Co. v. Tippins (Tex. App.) 14 S. W. 1067; Galesburg Electric Motor & P. Co. v. Manville, 61 Ill. App. 490.

So, where it was not shown that the gong was the cause of the bad behavior of the horse. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Harms, 59 Ill. App. 375.

But the company was held liable for injuries caused by the gong of the street car, where the man in charge of the car was negligent and unnecessarily frightened a horse. Lightcap v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 60 Fed. Rep. 212, Affirmed Philadelphia Traction Co. v. Lightcap, 61 Fed. Rep. 762, 17 U. S. App. 605.

And so where the danger could have been reasonably anticipated. Benjamin v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 3; Ellis v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 160 Mass. 241; Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Lowe, 12 Ind. App. 47.

And the same was held where the fright was caused by the bell or gong. Citizens' R. Co. v. Hair (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 1050.

The street-railway company was held liable for injuries caused from frightening horses, where a whistle was unnecessarily sounded near a team. Lott v. Frankford & S. Pass. R. Co. 159 Pa. 471.

3. By steam.

A street-railway company was not held liable for frightening a team by steam cars where the employees could not reasonably have anticipated and prevented the danger. Rome Street R. Co. v. McGinnis, 94 Ga. 229.

So, where the negligence of the company was not shown to amount to a wilful and wanton disregard of the driver's safety. Chapman v. Zansville Street R. Co. 27 Ohio L. J. 70.

And so where the plaintiff was guilty of gross negligence. Coughtry v. Willamette Street R. Co. 21 Or. 249.

But a city was held liable for the use of steam cars on the streets where such city granted the privilege in the absence of any authority. Stanley v. Davenport, 54 Iowa, 463, 37 Am. Rep. 216.

And a street-railway company was held liable where the engineer could have reasonably anticipated the danger. Muncie Street R. Co. v. Maynard, 5 Ind. App. 372; Lincoln Rapid Transit Co. v. Nichols, 37 Neb. 332, 30 L. R. A. 333.

4. Contributory negligence.

The cases generally hold that a recovery cannot. 84 L. R. A.

be had for injuries caused by street cars, gongs, bells, or use of steam frightening horses, if the plaintiff or driver of the team is guilty of contributory negligence.

So, a street-car company was not held liable where a horse was injured by being frightened at the ringing of the bell on a street car, and jerked away from the owner who was holding him, and ran away and was struck by the car, where the plaintiff was guilty of gross negligence in unhitching the horse with a pile of boxes between the horse and himself, and there was no competent evidence to show that the gripman could have stopped and avoided the collision. The court said it was not negligence to ring the bell at that place. Philadelphia Traction Co. v. Bernheimer, 125 Pa. 615.

And was not held liable where a person was injured in driving a young horse alongside of an electric street railway, where the horse had never been in such a situation before and the driver wanted to see how he would act, and there was ample opportunity for him to have turned into another street, and the car was about 150 feet distant and slowed down and stopped before reaching the point where plaintiff stopped his horse, got out of the buggy and let his horse into an open field, where he ran away, and there was no excessive speed. Cornell v. Detroit Electric R. Co. 82 Mich. 495.

So, where the driver of a carriage was not holding to the lines of his team but standing by the door of the coach reading a newspaper, and the team was frightened by a snow plow of a street-railway company and ran away, injuring one of the horses and the carriage, the court held that the negligence of the driver prevented a recovery. But a verdict of 6 cents for splashing the lining of the carriage with mud by the snow plow was allowed to stand, although plaintiff claimed that it was too small as the evidence showed damages to the amount of $50 if the lining had been renewed. It was questioned whether even this verdict should be allowed to stand. Gray v. Second Ave. R. Co. 2 Jones & S. 519, 65 N. Y. 551.

And the company was not held liable where a team of horses was injured by a collision and the plaintiff had allowed the team to linger by the track fastened together only with lines, until it became unmanageable and got upon the track and was struck by the engine, and it was not shown that the motor could have been stopped after the engineer saw that the horses were on the track. Coughtry v. Willamette Street R. Co. 21 Or. 249.

COMMISSIONERS OF OXFORD, Appts.
(119 N. C. 214.)

1. Constitutional requirements as to the style of acts or the manner of their passage are mandatory, and not directory.
2. Certificates of speakers that an act is ratified, although conclusive of the fact that it was read three several times in each house and ratified, do not show that an act was read three several days in each house and that the yeas and nays were entered on the Journal as required by Const. art. 2, § 14, when the act authorizes the creation of indebtedness by a town.
3. Failure to enter the yeas and nays on legislative journals, as required by Const. art. 2, § 14, on the second and third readings of an act authorizing the creation of indebtedness by a town, renders the act void.
4. A consent judgment entered into by town authorities cannot bind the town to a subscription to a railroad unless the power to subscribe or donate has been legally granted by the legislature.
5. Mandamus to compel the levy of a tax to pay a consent judgment entered into by town authorities will not be granted if it appears that there was no authority to issue the bonds for which the judgment was rendered.
6. The payment of interest on town bonds which were void because issued without authority does not ratify them.

(Patricloth, Ch. J., dissents.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Granville County in favor of relators in a mandamus proceeding to compel the levying of a tax to pay certain railroad aid bonds. Reversed.

On March 14, 1891, a proposition was made to submit the question of subscribing $40,000 to the stock of a railroad company to the voters at a coming election in the town of Oxford. The election was held and the result declared in favor of the issuance of the bonds. Subsequently the town refused to issue the bonds and an action was instituted to compel them to do so. Pending the action a settlement was agreed upon between the town and the railroad company, and a judgment was drawn and approved by the judge requiring the issuance of $20,000 of the bonds. These bonds were issued and delivered to the railroad company for sale and purchased by the plaintiff. The town having refused to recognize their validity, this action was brought to compel it to do so.

Further facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. V. Lanier, R. O. Burton, W. A. Guthrie, and Edwards & Royster for appellants.

Messrs. William J. Leake, J. Crawford Biggs, Manning & Foushee, and Shepherd & Busbee, for appellee.

The only question open for discussion is whether so much of the charter as confers authority on the town of Oxford is valid; in other words, whether that part of the act is utterly void by reason of alleged noncompliance with the provisions of § 14, art. 2 of the Constitution.

Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 232, 28 L. R. A. 737, conclusively settles this question.

The court held that it had no jurisdiction to look behind the record, and investigate by inquiry and proof the manner in which this record was established by the legislative branch of the government, for any of the causes alleged in the complaint.

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 202.

The principle is followed in reference to constitutional provisions similar to that relied upon by the defendant.

A judgment is none the less effective as a bar, because its merits were determined, in whole or in part, by the agreement of the parties. A judgment by default or upon confession is in its nature just as conclusive upon the rights of the parties before the court as a judgment upon demurrer or verdict.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was here before (116 N. C. 339) the court set aside the nonsuit taken below, and held that the plaintiff could maintain an action as the case was then presented. The court did so upon the ground that, there being apparently a valid liability of $40,000 against the town of Oxford, the compromise thereof for the sum of $20,000 was not necessarily void, and that the court below erred in nonsuiting the plaintiff. The case had been tried upon the view that the charter of the town of Oxford authorized the election under which the $40,000 indebtedness was contracted. The judge below held that this was not so, and hence that the compromise was not binding. This court sustained the view taken below that the town charter did not authorize the contraction of the indebtedness, but held that on its face the act chartering the railroad (Acts 1891, chap. 315, § 10) authorized the election. The question as to the efficacy of that act had not been questioned below, as the plaintiff had rested its claim upon the authority of the town charter to sustain the election. The questions decided before need not be called in controversy. We must take it that our former opinion settles that the town had authority to compromise a valid liability for a smaller sum, and that Act 1891, chap. 315, on its face authorized the election. When the second trial was had below, the point was taken for the first time that, conceding, as this court had held, that Act 1891, chap. 315, by its terms, authorized the election, that act was invalid, because not passed as required for all acts empowering counties, cities, and towns to issue bonds. Const. art. 2, § 14. This section of the Constitution is imperative, and not recommendatory, and must be observed; otherwise this wise and necessary precaution inserted in 84 L. R. A.

the organic law would be converted into a nullity by judicial construction. It was intended as a safeguard, and has been held mandatory in all other courts in which that question has been presented, as will be seen below. This point was not raised below in the former trial, nor in this court, as the plaintiff was then relying upon the charter of the town, which we held invalid for that purpose. On the second trial, when the plaintiff offered for the first time Act 1891, chap. 315, as authority to show a valid election authorizing the indebtedness of $40,000 as a basis to authorize the compromise (for, except as a compromise, the judgment would be void on its face, being ultra vires), the defendant contended that Act 1891, chap. 315, while valid as a railroad charter, was unconstitutional and void so far as authorizing the creation of an indebtedness by the town, because not enacted in the manner required by Const. art. 2, § 14. The journals were put in evidence, and showed affirmatively that the act was not read three several days in each house, and that the yeas and nays were not entered on the readings in the house, as required by the Constitution for acts authorizing the creation of public indebtedness. The point, therefore, thus arises for the first time in this case, and was not presented, and could not be presented, in the former appeal, for the reasons above given. The point is one of transcending importance, and is simply whether the people in their organic law can safeguard the taxpayers against the creation of state, county, and town indebtedness by formalities not required for ordinary legislation, and must the courts and the legislature respect those provisions? This safeguard is § 14 of art. 2 of the Constitution. It provides: "No law shall be passed to raise money on the credit of the state, or to pledge the faith of the state, directly or indirectly, for the payment of any debt, or impose any tax upon the people of the state, or to allow the counties, cities, or towns to do so, unless the bill for the purpose shall have been read three several times in each house of the general assembly, and passed three several readings, which readings shall have been on three different days, and agreed to by each house respectively, and "unless the yeas and nays, on the second and third reading of the bill, shall have been entered on the journal." The journals offered in evidence showed affirmatively that "the yeas and nays on the second and third reading of the bill" were not "entered on the journal;" and the Constitution—the supreme law—says that, unless so entered, no law authorizing state, counties, cities, or towns to pledge the faith of the state, or to impose any tax upon the people, etc., shall be valid.

This case has no analogy to Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L. R. A. 737. That merely holds that when an act is certified to by the speakers as having been ratified, it is conclusive of the fact that it was read three several times in each house, and ratified. Const. art. 2, § 23. And so it is here; the certificate of the speakers is conclusive that this act passed three several readings in each house, and was ratified. The certificate goes no further. It does not certify that this act was read three several days in each house, and that the yeas and nays were entered on the journals. The journals were in evidence, and showed affirmatively the contrary. The people had the power to protect themselves by requiring in the organic law something further as to acts authorizing the creation of bonded indebtedness by the state and its counties, cities, and towns than the fact certified to by the speakers of three readings in each house, and ratification. This organic provision plainly requires, for the validity of this class of legislation, in addition to the certificates of the speakers, which is sufficient for ordinary legislation, the entry of the yeas and nays on the journals on the second and third reading in each house. It is provided that such laws are "no laws"—i. e. are void—unless the bill for the purpose shall have been read three several times in each house of the general assembly, and passed three several readings, which readings shall have been on three different days, and agreed to by each house, respectively, and unless the yeas and nays on the second and third reading of the bill shall have been entered on the journals. This is a clear declaration of the nullity of such legislation unless this is done, and every holder of a state or municipal bond is conclusively fixed with notice of this requirement as an essential to the validity of his bond. If he buys without ascertaining that constitutional authority to issue the bond has thus been given, he has only himself to blame. 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 545, and cases cited. It is certainly in the power of the sovereign people, in framing their Constitution, to require as a prerequisite for the validity of this class of legislation these precautions, and the additional evidence of the journals that they have been complied with, over and above the mere certificate of the speakers, which is sufficient for other legislation. That the organic law does require the additional forms and the added evidence of the journals is plain beyond power of controversy. Accordingly, the law is well settled by nearly 100 adjudicated cases in the courts of last resort in thirty states, and also by the Supreme Court of the United States, that where a state Constitution prescribes such formalities in the enactment of laws as require a record of the yeas and nays on the legislative journals, these journals are conclusive as against not only a printed statute, published by authority of law, but also against a duly enrolled act. The following is a list of the authorities, in number ninety-three, sustaining this view either directly or by very close analogy. It is believed that no Federal or state authority can be found in conflict with them. Decisions can be found, as, for instance, Carr v. Coke, supra, to the effect that, where the Constitution contains no provision requiring entries on the journal of particular matters,—such, for example, as calls of the yeas and nays on a measure in question,—the enrolled act cannot, in such case, be impeached by the journals. That, however, is a very different proposition from the one involved here, and the distinction is adverted to in Field v. Clark, 148 U. S., on page 671, 86 L. ed. 308. Constitutional requirements as to the style of acts or the manner of their passage are mandatory, not directory. State v. Patterson, 98 N. C. 660, 663, 665. The thirty days' notice required before the passage of a private act is not required by the Constitution to be entered on the journals, as is required as to the readings on several days, and the ayes and nays on each reading, with bills authorizing the contraction of public indebtedness; and hence it may be that the giving of such thirty days' notice is conclusively presumed as to such private acts (Harrison v. Gordy, 57 Ala. 49; Walker v. Griffith, 60 Ala. 361), though the contrary was intimated in Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119. The history of the country at large and of this state as well has shown the necessity of this safeguard as to acts authorizing the creation of public indebtedness, which has been incorporated also into several other state Constitutions. We have no power nor wish to nullify so plain and mandatory a provision, so carefully and explicitly worded, and which has been held binding by all other courts wherever the question has been presented.

The judgment, on its face, is by consent, and for a railroad subscription. It is therefore, on its face, to be treated as void being ultra vires unless a special authority is shown authorizing the indebtedness for which it was a compromise (Kelley v. Milan, 127 U. S. 150, 32 L. 34 L. R. A.

ed. 83); for, ex virtute officii, town commissioners have no authority whatever to bind the town by submitting to a consent judgment for $20,000 for a matter appearing on the face of the judgment to be not for town purposes. If the commissioners of the town were vested with no authority to create the debt, they certainly could not acquire such power by entering into a consent judgment. The consent judgment entered into by the town authorities could not bind the town to a subscription to a railroad unless the power to subscribe or donate had been legally granted by the legislature. Consent judgments are, in effect, merely contracts of parties, acknowledged in open court, and ordered to be recorded. As such they bind the parties themselves thereto as fully as other judgments; but, when parties act in a representative capacity, such judgments do not bind the cestuis que trustent unless the trustees had authority to act; and when (as in the present case) the parties to the action, the town authorities, had, as appears above, no authority to issue the bonds, their honest belief, however great, that they had such power, would not authorize them to acquire such power, and bind the town by consenting to a judgment. It is not a question of a fraudulent judgment, but a void judgment from want of authority to consent to a decree to bind principals (the taxpayers) for whom they had no authority to create an indebtedness by consenting to a judgment any more than they would have had by issuing bonds. If authorized to create the indebtedness, either the bonds or the consent judgment would be equally an estoppel, but as they had no such authority, neither bonds nor judgment is binding on the taxpayers. It is not their bond nor their judgment. In Kelley v. Milan, supra, Blatchford, J., says: "The declaration of the validity of the bonds contained in the decree was made solely in pursuance of the consent to that effect contained in the agreement signed by the mayor of the town and the officer of the . . . railroad company. The act of the mayor in signing that agreement could give no validity to the bonds if they had none at the time the agreement was made. . . . The adjudication in the decree cannot, under the circumstances, be set up as a judicial determination of the validity of the bonds. . . . This was not the case of a submission to the court of a question for its decision on the merits, but it was a consent in advance to a particular decision by a person who had no right to bind the town by such a consent, because it gave life to invalid bonds; and the authorities of the town had no more power to do so than they had to issue the bonds originally." In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Southern P. Co. 187 U. S. 48, 56, 57 L. ed. 614, 617, Fuller, Ch. J., says: "The decrees were entered by consent and in accordance with the agreement, the courts merely exercising an administrative function in recording what had been agreed to between the parties; and hence holds that the Federal courts in disregarding such decrees were not violating the rule that due effect must be given to the determination of the matter by a state court having jurisdiction. In Laurence Mfg. Co. v. Janesville Cotton Mills, 188 U. S. 552, 34 L. ed. 1005, Fuller Ch. J., again says: "The prior decree was the consequence of the consent [of parties], and not of the judgment of the court, and this being so, the court had the right to decline to treat it as res judicata," citing many cases, among them our own case of Lamb v. Gallin, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 87, infra, and refused to execute a former decree, saying: "As, therefore, if the old company had defended the suit against it, it would have prevailed, the decree of the circuit court being correct upon the merits, is also correct in that the court refused to be constrained by the previous erroneous consent decree to decree contrary to the right of the cause." In Gay v. Purpart, 106 U. S. 679, 27 L. ed. 256, Miller, J., says (page 698, 106 U. S., and page 268, 27 L. ed.). "Such decree as was had, being dependent upon consent, did not operate as a judicial decision by the court." This treatment of consent decrees prevails thus in law as well as equity; Kelley v. Milan, supra, being an action at law to recover judgment on bonds issued in aid of a railroad, and the other cases above cited being in equity. In Brownsville Taxing Dist. Comrs. v. Loague, 129 U. S. 498, 505, 32 L. ed. 780, 784, which is substantially like the present, being an application for a mandamus to compel the levying of a tax to pay a judgment rendered on interest coupons of bonds, Fuller, Ch. J., says: "The court cannot decline to take cognizance of the fact that the bonds are utterly void, and that no such remedy exists. Res judicata may render straight that which is crooked, and black that which is white,—facit ex curvo rectum, ex albo nigrum.— . . . but where application is made to collect judgments by process not contained in themselves, and requiring to be sustained, reference to the alleged cause of action upon which they are founded, the aid of the court should not be granted when, upon the face of the record, it appears, not that mere error supervened in the rendition of such judgments, but that they rest upon no cause of action whatever." So, in the present case, even if the former judgment had not been by consent, it appears that there was no authority to issue the bonds, and the courts will not issue a mandamus to levy a tax to pay such judgment. In Lamb v. Gallin, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 87 (cited and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, supra), Gaston, J., says, as to the effect of a consent judgment by an executor, that it did not bind the beneficiaries of the estate (as here the taxpayers are not bound by the consent judgment entered into by the town authorities), because "it is not in truth a decree rendered in invitum, and by a judgment of the court to which the defendant was compelled to submit, and which, therefore, not only binds him, but those also for whose benefit he held the estate, unless it can be impeached for fraud, but it is a voluntary settlement between the defendant and the persons then claiming, which the parties to that settlement have chosen to invest with the forms of a judicial determination. The decree . . . is avowedly adopted because it was made by the parties. A decree thus rendered as against the present plaintiffs [who were the principals whom the defendant in the consent judgment represented] has no force except so far as it is seen to be just." There are other authorities to the like effect and purport, but the above will suffice. A recital of facts which the corporate officers had no authority to determine, or are cital of matters of law, does not estop the corporation. Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S. 88, 28 L. ed. 860; Northern Nat Bank v. Porter Twp. 110 U. S. 608, 28 L. ed. 258.

The certificate of the speakers is not good for what it certified; i. e., that the bill has been read three times in each house, and ratified. And, ordinarily, that makes the bill a law. But for this class of legislation the Constitution provides that the facts thus certified by the speakers will make no law unless it further appears that the yeas and nays have been recorded on the journals on the second and third reading in each house. The Constitution makes the entry on the journals essential to the validity of the act. If it be conceded that presumption of regularity arises from the publication of the act in this case, it was rebutted, for the journals were offered by the defendant, and showed that no constitutional authority had been conferred to issue the bonds or contract the indebtedness. It is incumbent upon the purchaser of municipal bonds to examine whether the power to issue has been duly granted. Lake County Comrs. v. Graham, 180 U. S. 674, 32 L. ed. 1065; East Oakland Twp. v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255, 24 L. ed. 125; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 545. The bonds, having been issued without authority were absolutely void. Marsh v. Fulton County Supers. 77 U. MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Division 2).

James A. REED and Wife, Respts.,
v.
WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COM-PANY, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A stipulation limiting the liability of a telegraph company for errors and mistakes in the transmission of an unrepeatable message is not valid so far as it applies to mistakes caused by negligence of the telegraph operators.
2. A mistake in the transmission of a telegram makes a prima facie case of negligence, and casts on the telegraph company the burden of disproving negligence.
3. A contract made in Iowa for the transmission of a telegram from a place in that state to a place in Missouri is governed by the laws of Iowa making the proprietor of the telegraph liable for all mistakes in transmission.
4. The difference between the actual market value of a lot and the price received is the measure of damages for a mistake in the transmission of a telegram which is not in cipher to an agent, by which a lower price is named to him than that stated by the principal, and in reliance upon which he executes the contract.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for failure to correctly transmit a telegram. Affirmed.

Statement by Gantt, P. J.:

This action is by a sendee or addressee of a commercial telegram against the telegraph company for negligence in its transmission, whereby the plaintiff or sendee was misled into authorizing her agent to conclude a contract of sale of a tract of land for $1,300 when she believed she was obtaining $1,900 therefor. Plaintiff's agent, Hedges, living in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where her real estate was situated, delivered to the defendant telegraph company, to be transmitted to plaintiff, living in Kansas City, Missouri, the following message:

Cedar Rapids, Iowa, May 25, 1889.

James A. Reed, 806 Nelson Building, Kansas City, Mo.:

Offered thirteen hundred cash, lot two, houses near planing mill. Must hear immediately. Can't get more. George T. Hedges.

The regular tariff rate was paid by Hedges. This message when delivered was as follows:

Cedar Rapids, Iowa, May 25, 1889.

James A. Reed, 806 Nelson Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Offered nineteen hundred cash, lot two, houses near planing mill. Must hear immediately. Can't get more. George T. Hedges.

NOTE.—In overruling a prior decision to adopt the rule which precludes telegraph companies from stipulating against their own negligence, the supreme court of Missouri does the same that was done by the supreme court of North Carolina in Brown v. Postal Tele. Cable Co. 17 L. R. A. 648; see 34 L. R. A.

It will be noted the offer was changed in transmission from "thirteen hundred" to "nineteen hundred" dollars. After requesting the operator and agent of defendant at Kansas City to verify the message on account of its importance, and having been informed by the operator that he had verified it, and she could rely upon it, plaintiff, ignorant of the error in the message received, on the same day, sent Hedges this telegram:

Sell property for amount offered. Will send deed by Monday, 27th.

Armed with this power of attorney, Hedges, the agent, also ignorant of the mistake in his message to plaintiff, and supposing he was authorized to sell the lot for $1,300, received a part payment of the purchaser thereon, and gave a written memorandum of the sale, agreeing to make the deed and deliver possession. On the 27th of May, 1889, plaintiff and her husband joined in the execution of a deed to the purchaser, reciting a consideration of $1,900, and forwarded it to Hedges, who received it on the 29th. When Hedges received the deed, he thought possibly there was a mistake, owing to the insertion of $1,900, instead of $1,300, and suggested to the purchaser that they wait until he could write plaintiff; but, the purchaser threatening a suit, he delivered the deed, and accepted $1,300, which he remitted to plaintiff, less his commission. Upon receiving the letter, and being apprised for the first time of the mistake, plaintiff at once, and within the sixty days limited therefor, made claim for $600 damages, which being refused by defendant, she commenced this action. Defendant offered no evidence whatever to account for the mistake in the transmission of the message. The company relies upon various alleged errors to reverse the judgment recovered by plaintiff.

Meers, Karnes, Holmes, & Kranthoff, for appellant:

The court erred in admitting in evidence the statute of the state of Iowa, and Mr. Stiles's oral testimony as to the unwritten law of that state relative to the liability of telegraph companies.

The telegram in question was sent from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to Kansas City, Missouri. It was therefore an interstate transaction and not subject to the laws of the state of Iowa.

by the supreme court of Missouri, namely that the provision limiting liability for errors and mistakes in unreported messages is valid.

The same rule prevails in actions against telegraph companies that governs the recovery for damages in ordinary cases; the damages must be limited strictly to those which are proximately caused by the negligence complained of, and cannot include those which are remote.

In a legal sense the loss in this case must be attributable to the act of the plaintiffs in voluntarily carrying out and accepting the benefits of a contract which could not have been enforced against them, and in failing to take steps to set aside the delivery of the deed by Hedges to Scott, when ample ground existed therefor.

In such a case the error in transmission was not only a remote cause, but did not even contribute to the injury, upon any just consideration of the transaction.

v. United States Telegr. Co. supra; Smith v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 83 Ky. 104.

The plaintiff's cause of action was complete when the telegram was delivered on May 25, 1889, and defendant did no act afterwards which influenced the conduct of the parties. They acted voluntarily with knowledge that an error had been committed, and their conduct alone proximately caused the loss complained of.

Lowery v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 60 N. Y. 198, 19 Am. Rep. 154; Hart v. Direct United States Cable Co. 86 N. Y. 633.

The plaintiffs were chargeable with Hedges' knowledge of the mistake, and as to this defendant, are responsible for his acts. They must seek a remedy for the result of his acts, if unauthorized, against him.

Proudfoot v. Montefiore, L. R. 3 Q. B. 511.

It was the duty of Hedges to inquire of Reed by telegraph, instead of waiting on the slower process of the mail; and it was Reed's duty, when he received Hedges' letter, to answer by wire, and it certainly was Hedges' duty, after having written to Reed, to await his answer.

Strong v. A Certain Quantity of Wheat ("The Contoy's Wheat"), 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 225, 230, 18 L. ed. 194, 197; Proudfoot v. Montefiore, supra.

The circumstances under which Hedges made his contract with Scott were such that the contract could not have been specially enforced against the Reeds. It would have been a complete answer that its execution had been induced by mistake.

Pom. Spec. Perf. § 245; Waterman, Spec. Perf. §§ 349, 361, 363; Fry, Spec. Perf. 3d ed. pp. 361, 370 and note, 723, 729, 734, and 739; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 18th ed. § 140, and note; Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, pp. 412, 416; Clark v. Maurer, 77 Iowa, 717; Kraft v. Egan, 78 Md. 36.

And if it appear that the plaintiff's property was worth $2,000 at the time the contract was made, specific performance of the contract would have been refused as being unfair and oppressive.

Taylor v. Williams, 45 Mo. 83; Veth v. Gierth, 92 Mo. 97.

Consequently, Hedges consummated a contract which was not binding, and which could not have been enforced. He knew the facts which constituted a complete defense; so that his act was an independent intervening cause, making the error in transmission only the remote cause of the damages complained of.

Hudson v. Wabash Western E. Co. 101 Mo. 13.

On the same ground the plaintiffs could have sustained a bill to cancel the deed and compel a reconveyance.

1 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. §§ 215, 216.

Instead of taking steps to this end, the plaintiffs, with full knowledge of all the facts, accepted the proceeds of Hedges' act, and thereby ratified all that he had done; or, in other words, completely identified themselves with Hedges, and assumed the same responsibility for his acts that would have existed had they been acting in person.

A telegraph company is not subject to the rules governing common carriers.

Leonard v. New York, A. & B. Electro Magnetic Tele. Co. 41 N. Y. 544, 1 Am. Rep. 446.

The limit of liability for negligence is that the defendant shall be under a duty to the plaintiffs. There must be a duty as well as a breach, and that duty must be one to the person sustaining a loss, and not to some other person.

The same rule applies to telegraph companies as to other common carriers.

Whart. Neg. ¶ 762; Loy v. Western U. Tele. Co. 35 Mo. App. 177.

The proposition that a telegraph company can stipulate against every kind of negligence except gross negligence, which was entertained by some of the courts in the early decisions, has been thoroughly exploded by all of the modern authorities, both as to telegraph companies and as to railroads and other common carriers.

Negligence and gross negligence are synonymous terms, and a telegraph company cannot stipulate its exemption from it.

Gantt, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It is earnestly insisted by defendant that its liability is limited by the following stipulation made by it with plaintiff's agent when it received and undertook to transmit the message: "All messages taken by this company are subject to the following terms: To guard against mistakes or delays, the sender of a message should order it repeated; that is, telegraphed back to the originating office for comparison. For this, one half the regular rate is charged in addition. It is agreed between the sender of the following message and this company that said company shall not be liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery or for nondelivery of any unrepeatable message, whether happening by negligence of its servants or otherwise, beyond the amount received for sending the same." It is agreed that this was an unrepeatable message. The position of defendant is that the stipulation limiting its liability for errors and mistakes in the transmission of said message is valid. It goes further, and asserts it is not even liable for the negligence of its operators in the transmission of said message; and that it is only liable upon an averment and proof of gross negligence; and it is supported by most eminent authority in said claim. Primrose v. Western U. Tele. Co. (1894) 154 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 988; Kiley v. Western U. Tele. Co. 109 N. Y. 281; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Stevenson, 128 Pa. 442, 5 L. R. A. 515; and many other cases. Moreover, such is the latest authoritative statement of the law on this subject by this court. Wann v. Western U. Tele. Co. 37 Mo. 472, 90 Am. Dec. 395. At the threshold, then, the question arises: Shall this court adhere to the ruling in the Wann Case? The reasoning of that case, which was the first in which this court was called upon to construe the statute of 1855 (§§ 5 and 6, p. 1521), was that the transmission of messages by electricity was so seriously affected by atmospheric causes, which were uncontrollable, that it would be ruinous to deny telegraph companies the right to limit their liability to any extent short of gross negligence. In other words, if that decision is to stand, it simply means that in this state telegraph companies are not liable for negligence, because all their messages are sent subject to the same stipulation, exempting them from all liability for the negligence of their servants in transmitting messages. Ought such a precedent to be longer followed? Is it not contrary to a sound public policy, which denies to common carriers and other agencies which conduct a public, as contradistinguished from a private, business, the right to stipulate against their own negligence? We unhesitatingly answer in the affirmative. Loth as we are to overrule a decision that has stood so long, we are convinced it cannot be longer maintained on principle. It was rendered when the system of telegraph communication was yet in a crude state. The difficulties which then appeared to the courts to be so serious have largely vanished. The art of telegraphy in the thirty years that have since intervened has been reduced to comparative exactness; and when, as in this case, there is no evidence whatever of atmospheric disturbances or unfavorable conditions, it is very plain that an error by which "thirteen" is distorted into "nineteen" is caused either by careless operatives or imperfect and insufficient instruments and appliances. Since that decision was made, the relation of the telegraph to the commercial and social intercourse of the world has excited the most thorough and critical discussion; and, as might be expected, many contrary views have been expressed, and many conflicting adjudications rendered. It is because the reasons which induced the decision in the Wann Case do not, in our opinion, any longer obtain, that we are constrained to review that decision. It cannot be maintained that the same degree of responsibility should attach to persons or corporations engaged in transmitting intelligence by a system which was as yet crude, their operators untrained, and its appliances only experimental, and by a system which, after fifty years of experience, with all the adventitious aids of modern science, has been perfected in all its parts both as to suitable instruments and the opportunity afforded to employ expert and experienced operators. While it was anticipated that this new method of communication would revolutionize old methods, no one thirty years ago could have predicted how essential and indispensable the telegraph would become to the commercial and social interests of the whole world. It occupies a unique and peculiar place, and all analogies to former agencies fail when we come to apply rules of liability. Thus, at first they were called and adjudged to be "common carriers," but criticisms of this title brought about a complete abandonment by the courts of that appellation. Equally unfortunate was the endeavor to class them as "private bailees." They are not bailees in any proper legal sense. What, then, is their legal attitude? When this question is correctly answered, just legal principles can be applied. They are corporations created for public benefit, endowed with special privileges, such as the right of eminent domain, and perform the most important functions of commerce, supplanting, in cases where celerity and rapid transmission of intelligence are necessary, the postal service of the government. Their business intimately concerns the public, and on this account the government assumes and has the right to regulate their business, so as to insure impartiality of service, and prevent the exaction of unreasonable tolls. Many and varied interests are dependent upon them. From their exceptional position, it is in their power by a corrupt use of their knowledge and information, to reap unconscionable advantages in the marts of trade, or, by their negligence, entail ruin and disaster upon individuals and communities. Having these exceptional advantages, and enjoying a practical monopoly, every reason exists why they should be held to a rigid accountability for the negligence of their servants and employees. Without rendering them liable as insurers, or holding them for the action of the elements, over which they have no control, sound judicial reasoning does demand that they should be required to perform their duties in a careful and diligent manner, and that they should respond for the negligence of their servants.

Why not? Such a rule entails no hardship. It is less onerous than that exacted of common carriers of goods, and no greater than is required of carriers of passengers, to whose care are committed the lives and limbs of the public. Their duty springs, not alone, as a private bailee's does, from contract, but is the result of the character of their business and the laws regulating them. They voluntarily engage in the business. They solicit and receive the confidence of the public, and their occupation requires small outlay compared to the profits realized. Having undertaken to transmit the message, why should they not be held to a careful performance of that duty, and be liable for a negligent disregard thereof? Why should they be permitted to demand an extra half toll for the faithful performance of a duty for which they have already charged a reasonable price? They have absolute control of their employees, select their own instruments, own their own wires, and invariably demand pay in advance.

Notwithstanding our respect for the learned courts which have held that they are not liable for negligence, we cannot concur in that view. In the language of the supreme court of Tennessee in Marr v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 85 Tenn. 529, we hold that this stipulation "constitutes but an artful arrangement and device by which the consequence of their own negligence is thrown upon the shoulders of their customers, and they are [thus] enabled to conduct business with no responsibility beyond that of the most trivial character for their own want of due care." We hold it utterly unreasonable and contrary to all the analogies of the law and sound public policy to allow such companies to thus stipulate against liability for mistakes caused by their own negligence. Moreover, we hold that the distinction between negligence and gross negligence, contended for by defendant, does not exist in this state. It was pointed out by the learned judge who wrote the Wann Case, in the subsequent case of McPheters v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 45 Mo. 22, that "there is no difference between negligence and gross negligence, the latter being nothing more than the former, with the addition of a vituperative epithet." Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. 12 Jur. N. S. 727; Lemon v. Chanstor, 68 Mo. 858, 30 Am. Rep. 799; Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W. 113; Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q. B. 646; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 494, 23 L. ed. 876; Beven, Neg. § 16; Gray, Communication by Telegraph, p. 86; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Griswold, 37 Ohio St. 301. Many of the courts of this country adopted the view pronounced in the Wann Case in the earlier stages of the discussion, but the tendency of judicial decision at present is that these companies should be held to the exercise of ordinary care; that is to say, they are bound to have suitable instruments and competent servants, and see that the service rendered to their patrons is performed with the care and skill requisite to their peculiar undertaking. Their reasons for so holding are entirely satisfactory to us. Ayer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 79 Me. 498; Tyler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 60 Ill. 421, 14 Am. Rep. 38; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Illinois & M. Teleg. Co. 27 Iowa, 433, 1 Am. Rep. 285; Harkness v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 73 Iowa, 190. In Sweetland v. Illinois & M. Teleg. Co. 27 Iowa, 433, 1 Am. Rep. 285, Judge Dillon criticises the Wann Case in these words: "There is a dictum in MacAndrews Case—the first case which arose (17 C. B. 8, 1855), to the effect that by regulations the companies may protect themselves from liability for mistakes in unrepeatable messages, except those caused by their gross negligence, and this expression has been incautiously copied and used arguendo by other courts, as, for instance, in Wann v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 37 Mo. 472, 90 Am. Dec. 395." MacAndrews Case was an English case, and based upon an English doctrine that a common carrier may contract against his own negligence,—a doctrine repudiated by all American courts, except, perhaps, New York. See also Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fontaine, 58 Ga. 433; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 299, 45 Am. Rep. 480; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cohen, 78 Ga. 522; Gillis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1889) 61 Vt. 461, 4 L. R. A. 611; Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 64 Wis. 531, 54 Am. Rep. 644; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Short, 53 Ark. 434, 9 L. R. A. 744. Because we think that both reason and the weight of authority are against the decision in the Wann Case, and as no rule of property is involved, that case is overruled.

2. Having reached the conclusion that the defendant was bound to exercise ordinary care in transmitting the message to plaintiff, the next inquiry arises, Was there sufficient evidence to justify the verdict? Did plaintiff establish a prima facie case? It was established beyond peradventure that the message was not transmitted as it was delivered to defendant; that plaintiff acted upon it as received by her. When this was shown, a prima facie case of negligence was established, and the burden of disproving the negligence was cast upon defendant, and it made no explanation whatever. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 299, 45 Am. Rep. 480; Gray, Communication by Telegraph, § 77, and authorities cited; Tyler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 60 Ill. 421, 14 Am. Rep. 38; Smith v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 57 Mo. App. 259; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Griswold, 37 Ohio St. 801-813; Bartlett v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 62 Me. 209, 16 Am. Rep. 437; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Carew, 15 Mich. 525.

3. There was no error in admitting in evidence § 1329 of the Statutes of Iowa (which provides that "the proprietor of a telegraph is liable for all mistakes in transmitting messages made by any person in his employment, and for all damages resulting from a failure to perform any of the duties required by law"), and the testimony of Judge E. H. Stiles, who for many years was the official reporter of the decisions of the supreme court of Iowa, and who was first qualified as being familiar with the unwritten law of Iowa. The objection was simply that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the message was not governed by the laws of that state. The contract was made in Iowa, and, according to its terms, it was to be partially performed in that state. Indeed, it is quite evident that its breach occurred in that state. Does the circumstance that it was to be partially performed in Missouri exempt it from the laws of Iowa? We think most clearly not. Like a contract of affreightment, its validity and interpretation ordinarily are to be governed by the law of the state in which it was made. The statute of Iowa in no sense attempts to regulate interstate communication by telegram. Both parties to this agreement for the transmission of the message resided in Iowa. The tariff was paid and defendant entered upon the performance of the contract in that state. The statute and laws of Iowa were therefore pertinent and admissible, and determined the effect of said contract. McDaniel v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 24 Iowa, 416; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 457, 32 L. ed. 797.

4. But it is urged that, even if defendant is liable for negligence under the circumstances, still the loss of the difference between the price received and the actual market value of the lot is not the proximate result of that negligence,—in other words, is not the natural and reasonable consequence of defendant's mistake; and the principle is invoked that no one can recover damages which he can avoid by diligent effort upon his own part. Let us examine this view of the case. This message was not in cipher. The defendant was fully advised of its importance on the face of the message, and, after being so advised, its agent assured plaintiff that it had been repeated, and she could rely upon its correctness. In this way plaintiff was led to believe she was offered $1,900 for her property. Being willing to part with it for that sum, she wired acceptance of the proposition made. The proposal was only $1,300, but in this way she was made to accept that proposal. Her agent was clothed not only with apparent, but actual, authority to sell for $1,300, so far as he was advised. Being thus empowered to sell, he made a binding contract, and accepted a part of the purchase money. The deed was forwarded, and he delivered it. All this was done upon reliance on the correctness of defendant's action. Could a more natural consequence ever follow a transaction than this loss did upon the mistake of defendant? Does it lie in defendant's mouth to speculate how plaintiff or her agent, by the exercise of care, which it failed to exercise, might have avoided her contract with the purchaser? Has the defendant the right to require plaintiff to enter upon a long and doubtful litigation to rescind the contract, which was fully executed by delivery of her deed and the receipt of the purchase money? We most clearly think not. The cases cited by learned counsel do not meet this case. Here the damages are the direct result of defendant's negligence. Moreover, they had fully accrued when plaintiff discovered the mistake. There were no means of avoiding them except to sue the blameless purchaser or the negligent company. She chose the latter course, and we think properly. Plaintiff's agent received her instructions by means of defendant's wire and acted in good faith, and it would seem he ought not to be mulcted in damages for so doing. The purchaser dealt, not by means of the telegraph, but directly with the agent, apparently clothed with full power to sell. His vendor had selected the telegraph as the means of communication, and, as between vendor and vendee, the vendor should bear the loss occasioned by that means, in the absence of any evidence of fraud or knowledge of error on part of the vendee. In this case the question does not arise as to whether plaintiff was bound by the acts of the telegraph company as her agent. She was bound by the act of her own agent, who entered into a binding contract in her name with the vendee. We think the proper measure of damages under the circumstances was the difference between the actual market value of the lot and the price received by the mistake occasioned by defendant's negligence.

5. As to interest, as it was conceded on the trial that interest was recoverable, and defendant's counsel named the amount at $100, it is clearly no ground for reversing the case. While the jury might or might not give it, when both parties act upon the presumption that, if a recovery is justifiable, interest should follow, it presents no ground of substantial error.

The judgment is affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Ohio, ex rel. Warner M. BATEMAN et al.,

v.

August H. BODE et al.

(.....Ohio.....)

"The act of April 17, 1896 (22 Ohio Laws, p. 186), which prohibits the name of any candidate for office from being placed upon the official ballot more than once, is a valid law.

(November 13, 1896.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants, constituting a board of election supervisors, to print certain names in a certain manner upon ballots to be used at a coming election. Denied.

Statement by Burket, J.:

The defendants constitute the board of elections of Hamilton county, and are ex officio deputy state supervisors of elections in said county. The proceeding is a petition in mandamus to compel said board to place the names of Alexander B. Huston and Alfred B. Benedict upon both the "Democratic judicial ticket" and upon the "Lawyers' judicial ticket," said two persons having been duly nominated by the parties representing both of said tickets. The board refused to place said names upon both tickets, but offered to place them upon such tickets as the persons might respectively designate, and, upon failure to so designate, to place them upon the Democratic ticket, as that nomination was first certified to the board.

placing an unequal tax upon inheritances, as being in violation of this section.

State, Schwartz, v. Ferris, 53 Ohio St. 314, 30 L. R. A. 218.

And, in the same volume, it denounced a law imposing a burden upon a certain class of litigants for violating the same provision.

Hocking Valley Coal Co. v. Rosser, 53 Ohio St. 12, 29 L. R. A. 886.

Equality of right in the exercise of the elective franchise is not less important, nor less secured by this article of the Bill of Rights, than equality of right to exemption from an unequal tax, or from a partial imposition of costs in the course of the administration of justice.

All elections shall be by ballot.

Const. art. 5, § 2.

In adopting a system for voting the legislature of Ohio has no right to deprive the voter of any material and substantial right or safeguard that was intended to be secured to him by the requirement that the election should be "by ballot," as that word was understood when the Constitution was framed.

The consideration which must, of necessity, in the great majority of cases, determine the electors' choice, is knowledge of who has selected and indorsed the several candidates for whom he is called upon to vote.

A law which provides for furnishing information to one party, upon the ballots themselves, of this controlling fact, and denies the same means to another class; and a law which enables the former class to vote by a single mark for all the candidates of their choice, thus determined, and denies this privilege to another class,—denies equality of right in the exercise of the elective franchise.

equally the exercise of the right by every voter.

Messrs. Thomas McDougal, Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., J. W. Worthington, G. H. Wald, H. D. Peck, and Philip Rootinger also for relators.

Mr. August H. Bode, for defendants:

When the power of the general assembly is drawn into question, the proper inquiry is whether such an exercise of legislative power is clearly prohibited by the Constitution.

The grant of power being general, the question is as to the existence of a limitation arising from special prohibition.

Such prohibition must either be found in express terms, or be clearly inferable by necessary implication from the language of the instrument, when fairly construed according to its manifest spirit and meaning.

Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 592; Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 607; State, Evans, v. Dudley, 1 Ohio St. 487.

In all cases where the Constitution has conferred a political right or privilege, and where the Constitution has not particularly designated the manner in which that right is to be exercised, it is clearly within the just and constitutional limits of the legislative power to adopt any reasonable and uniform regulations, in regard to the time and mode of exercising that right, which are designed to secure and facilitate the exercise of such right.

Copen v. Foster, 12 Pick. 485, 23 Am. Dec. 682.

In order to hold such laws unconstitutional they must be clearly so, and if they will bear a construction consistent with the Constitution, they will receive that construction, and be upheld.

Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 665; Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 592; Cooley, Const. Lim. § 602, Paine, Elections, § 801; People v. Morris, 80 Mich. 687, 8 L. R. A. 685.

The Constitution of Michigan is similar to our own. The same proof is required in Michigan as in Ohio to find a statute unconstitutional.

Under such similar circumstances a decision of the supreme court of Michigan is entitled to especial consideration, and the case of Todd v. Elections Comrs. 104 Mich. 474, 29 L. R. A. 380, would almost seem decisive.

Messrs. F. S. Spiegel and Fredrick Hertenstein also for defendants.

Burket, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded by counsel for the relators that § 6a of the act of April 17, 1896 (92 Ohio Laws, p. 185), prohibits the printing of said names twice on the same ballot, but it is insisted that said section, in that regard, is unconstitutional. The only question, therefore, to be determined in this case, is whether the general assembly has the power to pass an act providing, as this one does, that the name of a candidate for office shall appear but once upon the ticket or ballot prepared by the board of elections. Full legislative power is vested in the general assembly, by § 1 of art. 2 of our Constitution, and the power in question is included in that grant of power, unless taken away by some other provision of the Constitution. The only limitations upon this general grant of power cited by counsel for the relators in this case are § 2 of art. 1, which reads: "All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit, . . ." and § 2 of art. 5, which reads: "All elections shall be by ballot." The relators seek to compel the board of elections to place the names of the two candidates upon both the Democratic and upon the Lawyers' judicial tickets. This necessarily concedes that those tickets are ballots, within the meaning of the Constitution, because, if they are not ballots, there is no right to have these or any other names placed thereon. If they are ballots when the names of certain candidates are on twice, they are equally ballots when the names are on but once. As the Constitution is silent as to the number of times a candidate's name shall appear on a ballot, the matter is open to be regulated by the general assembly. The ballot now authorized by statute is different in form from that in use at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, but it is nevertheless a ballot. No form of ballot is prescribed by the Constitution, and therefore the general assembly is free to adopt such form as, in its judgment, shall be for the best interests of the state. The election must be by ballot, but the form of the ballot, so long as it is a ballot, is left to the sound discretion of the general assembly. The ballot or ticket in question is clearly a ballot, and therefore does not contravene the 2d section of the 5th article of the Constitution. By the 2d section of the 1st article of the Constitution it is provided, in substance, that government is instituted for the equal protection and benefit of the people. It seems clear that the placing of the name of each candidate upon the ballot once, and only once, would be equal protection and benefit to all the candidates. To place the name of one on the ballot in two places, and the name of his opponent in only one place, would not be exactly fair. It would give the candidate whose name appears twice an advantage over the candidate whose name appears but once. So that the statute, instead of being in conflict with this section of the Constitution, is in harmony with it, and may have been passed for the purpose of doing away with this advantage which existed under the former statute. It is a proper regulation of the elective franchise, well calculated to avoid and prevent corruption and fraudulent practices, as well as undue advantage to one candidate over another.

But it is argued that the voters have a right to have the names appear upon both ballots, so that they may more easily vote for the candidates of their choice. No legislature and no court can know in advance how the electors desire to vote, and if an opportunity is given them to vote for the candidates of their choice, by placing the names once, in plain print, upon the ballots, it is all that can in fairness be required. The ballot is the same for all, and gives equal protection and benefit to all. There is no discrimination against or in favor of any one; and, if any inequality arises, it arises, not from any inequality caused by the statute, but by reason of inequalities in the persons of the voters, and such inequalities are unavoidable.

It is always much more difficult for some electors to cast their ballots than for others. Distance, bad roads, means of transportation, bad health, and many other considerations may and do render it much more difficult for some men to cast their ballots than others. But these difficulties inhere to the men themselves, and not in the law. Before the law all stand equal, with equal protection and equal benefit; and, if their condition becomes such as not to enable them to enjoy the protection or reap the benefit, it is their fault or misfortune, and not the fault of the law. The act in question was passed to secure purity in our elections. Certain evil practices had grown up by reason of placing the name of a candidate upon the same ballot more than once, and the general assembly attempted to prevent such practice by providing that the name of each candidate should appear on the ballot but once. This is a reasonable regulation of the elective franchise, and not in any sense a destruction thereof. But grant, as it is urged by the relators, that some voters may be somewhat inconvenienced, by reason of the name of each candidate appearing but once upon the ballot; yet such voters are not thereby deprived of any protection or benefit in casting their ballot. The inconvenience is only that which is experienced by everyone who votes other than a straight ticket. Such slight inconvenience to the voter should be endured, rather than permit the advantage which one candidate has over another when the name of one is placed upon the ballot twice, and the name of the other but once.

The subject is clearly within legislative discretion, and that body has the power to provide that the name of each candidate shall appear but once upon the official ballot, or it may permit the name to appear more than once. Whatever inconvenience there may be to either the candidate or voter in such cases does not rise to the importance of a failure of equal protection or benefit, and therefore does not conflict with the provisions of the 2d section of our Bill of Rights. When rights secured by the Constitution seem to conflict when applied to the practical affairs of men, the general assembly is at liberty to so adjust the matter as to cause the least injury to the conflicting interests, and thereby protect the rights of the community as a whole. The equal protection and benefit guaranteed by the Constitution does not cover every little inconvenience which may be distorted or reasoned into a seeming inequality, but has reference rather to cases in which it is attempted by statute to grant rights or privileges to some which are withheld from others in the same substantial situation or relation. The case of Fisher v. Dudley, 74 Md. 242, 12 L. R. A. 586, is cited by the relators, and relied upon, to show that the names of candidates may appear more than once on the official ballot. In that case the power of the legislature to pass the act was not questioned, but the case involved the construction of a statute, which did not prohibit the name from appearing more than once on the official ballot; and the court held that, not being prohibited, it might properly appear as many times as nominations of the same person had been made by different parties. Such was the practice in this state, under a similar statute, before the enactment of the present statute. The Maryland case would therefore be an authority to show that our practice was right under the former statute, but it can have no bearing upon the question as to whether the general assembly has the power to prohibit the names from appearing more than once upon the official ballot. The case of Todd v. Election Comrs. 104 Mich. 474, 29 L. R. A. 330, and 104 Mich. 480, 29 L. R. A. 334, is very much like the present case, and fully supports the conclusions here reached.

We regard the act in question as clearly within the power of the general assembly, and therefore a valid law.

Writ refused.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

v.
Mary Abby TEFFT.

(.....R. L.....)

An adopted child is the "lawful issue" of a person within the meaning of a will making a gift to such person with remainder to his "lawful issue," under Pub. Laws 1866, chap. 627, making an adopted child for all purposes of inheritance and all other legal consequences and incidents a child of the parents by adoption the same as if born in lawful wedlock, except that he shall not take property expressly limited to "the heirs of the body or bodies" of such parents.

(November 21, 1896.)

BILL for the construction of the will of Dexter Thurber, deceased, which sought to ascertain the construction of a provision which defendant claimed to be in her favor Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bassett & Mitchell, for complainants:

The rights of an adopted child are purely statutory, and are to be strictly construed.

The act, being in derogation of the common law, is to be strictly construed as against any person claiming any rights under it in contravention of the general laws of inheritance, founded upon natural relationship.

Keegan v. Geraghty, 101 Ill. 83; Re Jessup's Estate, 81 Cal. 408, 6 L. R. A. 594; Ex parte

Rep. 506; Fankee v. Thompson, 51 Mo. 234; Mueller v. Kassmann, 84 Mo. 323.

Statutes of adoption should be strictly construed as against the adopted child.

Keegan v. Geraghty, Ex parte Chambers, Wallace v. Rappleye, and Re Jessup's Estate, supra.

The adopted child cannot take from the ancestor of the adopting parent.

24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 424; Meador v. Archer, 65 N. H. 214; Sunderland's Estate, 60 Iowa, 732; Helms v. Elliott, 89 Tenn. 446, 10 L. R. A. 635; Keegan v. Geraghty, 101 Ill. 26.

The rules of construction of wills must manifestly leave the question whether or not the word "children" or "issue" or other words shall be held to include adopted children, very much dependent upon the circumstances of the case and the context of the will in question.

Where the words "issue" or "children" or "heirs" were used in the will, a child adopted after the execution of the will could not take under these words.

Jenkins v. Jenkins, 64 N. H. 407; Russell v. Russell, 84 Ala. 48; Barnum v. Barnum, 42 Md. 251; Schafer v. Eneu, 54 Pa. 804; Bowdlear v. Bowdlear, 112 Mass. 184.

And this principle has been carried so far as to refer, not only to the will of the ancestor, but to the will of the parent by adoption also.

Bowdlear v. Bowdlear and Russell v. Russell, supra.

Mr. Willard B. Tanner, for respondent:

In Sevall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 263, the court said that the words "child," "issue" and "lawful issue" do not mean heirs of the body, and the adopted daughter took the whole estate under the settlement.

The language of the decision is broad enough to cover a case where the adopted child would take from an ancestor.

Whitmore, Law of Adoption, preface, p. 4.

The testator must be held then to have made his will in view of the statutory meaning of the word "issue," and the power of the granddaughter to give to an adopted child all the rights and status of issue, and therefore to have contemplated that an adopted child might take under his will.

Johnson's Appeal, 88 Pa. 346; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 801.

The section in the law of descent which uses the word "child" must be understood as merely laying down the general rules of inheritance, and not as completely defining how the status is to be created which gives the capacity to inherit.

Power v. Hasley, 85 Ky. 671; Fosburg v. Rogers, 114 Mo. 123, 19 L. R. A. 201.

An adopted child has the status of a child if he is not in fact a child.

2 Austin, Jur. 3d ed. 706, 709, 712, 974.

Warren v. Prescott, 84 Me. 483, 17 L. R. A. 435, is the same in principle as the case at bar.

The court held that the adopted child would take as a lineal descendant of the legatee,—not as a lineal descendant by birth, but as a statutory lineal descendant, and as lawfully in the line of descent as if he were placed there by birth.

Re Newman's Estate, 75 Cal. 218; Johnson's Appeal, 88 Pa. 346; McGunnigle v. McKee, 77 Pa. 81, 18 Am. Rep. 428; Humphries v. Davis, 100 Ind. 274, 50 Am. Rep. 788; Pace v. Klink, 51 Ga. 220; Loring v. Thorndike, 5 Allen, 257; Rowan's Estate, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 461.

In Reinders v. Koppelman, 94 Mo. 338, the court observes that the words "heirs at law" and "lawful heirs" mean in common language those upon whom the descent is cast by law, not an heir by adoption, and that the testator would have used the words "adopted heir" or "heir by adoption," if he had meant to include the adopted child of the wife.

But see Buckley v. Frazier, 153 Mass. 525; Power v. Hasley, and Fosburg v. Rogers, supra.

In the case at bar the only indication of intention outside of the use of the words "lawful heirs" are the provisions that the property shall go to lawful issue agreeably to the laws of descent. The latter words would indicate an intention in accordance with the logical result of the statute of adoptions, which places the adopted child in the place of lawful issue under the statute of descents.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The will of Dexter Thurber, late of Providence, left a fund to trustees, to pay the income, in stated proportions, to children and grandchildren, and upon their death to pay their respective portions to their lawful issue; and, if any of them should die without leaving lawful issue, then a gift over. The testator left a granddaughter, Emma Thurber Brown, who married Lyman B. Tefft. She died leaving no issue of her body, but after the death of the testator, she joined her husband in a petition to the municipal court of Providence for the adoption of the respondent, Mary Abby Tefft, the child of her husband by a former wife, as their child, pursuant to R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 164, which petition was granted, and a decree entered. Mrs. Tefft having died, this bill is filed to ascertain whether the fund goes to her adopted daughter, under the bequest to her lawful issue.

Our statute for the adoption of children (Pub. Laws 1866, chap. 627) says: "A child so adopted shall be deemed, for the purposes of inheritance by such child and all other legal consequences and incidents of the natural relation of parents and children, the child of the parents by adoption, the same as if he had been born to them in lawful wedlock, except that he shall not be capable of taking property expressly limited to the heirs of the body or bodies of the parents by adoption, nor property from the lineal or collateral kindred of such parents by right of representation." The argument for the complainant is, that in using the word "issue," the testator had in mind "heirs of the body" of his granddaughter, and so the case is really within the exception of the statute. The argument is based both upon a strict construction of the word "issue," and the fact that the will was made in 1858, before the statute for the adoption of children. A codicil was added in 1865, another in 1867, and a third in 1869. The last two codicils were after the statute, and as they do not revoke the will, but expressly declare that they are to be a part and portion of the will and codicils, they are a republication of the will as of the later date. A part of the argument is thus disposed of, although the fact remains that the adoption did not take place until after the testator's death. It was, however, in his lifetime, and before the last two codicils to his will, a possibility which is presumed to have been known to him, and in view of such possibility his will must be construed.

The meaning of the word "issue," in a will, where, as in this case, nothing appears to limit its legal import, was carefully considered in Pearce v. Rickard, 18 R. I. 142. Following the well-settled current of authority, it was held that the word, so used, includes all descendants; and as the statute gives to an adopted child the status of a descendant, and all the legal consequences and incidents thereof, the same as though he were born in lawful wedlock, there could be no question in such a case as this were it not for the exception of a limited estate. The question then is whether this fund is within the exception. In Maine, under a statute similar to ours, it was held in Warren v. Prescott, 84 Me. 488, 17 L. R. A. 485, that the exception relates only to an inheritance as an heir of the body. The reasoning is that, where an estate is limited to one and the heirs of his body, it must go to those to whom it is expressly limited, and that an adopted child, although he is to be regarded as a child and heir and a lineal descendant of his adopting parents, does not answer the description of an heir of the body, and so he cannot take the property out of the line to which it was limited. An adopted child is out, by the statute, into the status of a child, issue, or lineal descendant, but not that of an heir of the body. Hence, as to a legacy, when a legatee dies before a testator, leaving an adopted child, such child answers the description of a lineal descendant, who may take the legacy under a statute which prevents legacies from lapsing when the legatee leaves lineal descendants. The reasoning seems to be conclusive. It is the same result that was reached in Sewall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 262, although the reasoning in the latter case is not so fully and clearly set forth as in the former. The court holds that the words "heirs of the body" are used in the exception in their primary, technical sense, with which the words "children" and "issue" are not equivalent terms. See also McGunnigle v. McKee, 77 Pa. 81, 18 Am. Rep. 428. Several cases have been cited which appear to take a different view, but we think they are clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. For example, in Jenkins v. Jenkins, 64 N. H. 407, under a similar devise and statute, the court said that the property was not expressly limited to the heirs of the body or bodies of the parents by adoption, but being a devise of land, and the statute of adoption of children not having been passed until after the death of the testator, he must have intended an heir in fact, and not one created for the purpose by subsequent legislation and judicial proceedings. A statute of New Hampshire defined the word "issue" to mean the lawful lineal descendants of the ancestors, and so the statute for the adoption of children could not operate to act retrospectively upon the will already effectual, so as to turn a devise into a different channel from that selected by the testator. Here the statute was passed before the death of Dexter Thurber. In Keegan v. Geraghty, 101 Ill. 26, the question was whether an adopted child could take by inheritance from a child of one of the adopting parents by a subsequent marriage, the adopted child not being a sister in fact. It was held that she could not. The statute of Pennsylvania is very different from ours. It provides that an adopted child shall have all the rights of a child and heir of the adopting parent. Hence in Schafer v. Eneu, 54 Pa. 304, it was held that, in a devise of land to one and her children, an adopted child could not take, especially in view of the fact that the will took effect in 1851, and the statute of adoption was not passed until 1855, when vested interests had attached. These cases will suffice to show the distinctions. But even upon the assumption that the words are sufficient, if they had related to realty, to create an estate tail, the result would be the same in this case, because the gift was of personality, which, under such conditions, becomes an absolute gift. Bailey v. Hawkins, 15 R. I. 578; Albee v. Carpenter, 12 Cush. 382.

An absolute gift of a fund to Emma Thurber Brown would, of course, now go to her adopted child. Our opinion is that the case is not within the exception of the statute, and that the adopted daughter, having the same status as a child born in lawful wedlock, and hence the same as "lawful issue," is entitled to take the fund under the bequest.

ILLINOIS STEEL COMPANY, Resp.

(.....Wis.....)

1. A citizen of one state may maintain in the courts of another state a transitory action arising at his residence against another citizen of the same state found in the other state, under the provision of the United States Constitution guaranteeing to the citizens of each state all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, which the courts of the latter state have no discretionary power to dismiss.
2. A "carpenter gang" whose duty it is to replace the planks about a machine called the "bloom rolls" after their removal for the purpose of attaching new rolls, are not fellow servants of one employed to oil the machine, and their negligence in replacing the planks is chargeable to the master.
3. The mere existence of a slight variance of view, not amounting to a fundamental difference of policy, in the state in which a cause of action under the common law arose, and that in which it is sought to be enforced, does not deprive the court of the latter state of jurisdiction of the subject-matter.
4. The law of the forum prevails as to the form of the remedy, the conduct of the trial, and the rules of evidence in an action upon a transitory cause of action arising in another jurisdiction.
5. The statute of limitations of the state in which a cause of action arose is not available in an action in another state for the enforcement of such cause of action, unless it is offered in evidence.

(October 12, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

This is an action to recover for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff on the 4th day of September, 1891, in the respondent's rolling mill, in the city of Chicago, Illinois, the plaintiff being at that time and now a citizen of the state of Illinois, and the defendant being an Illinois corporation. The answer set up as a defense the citizenship of the parties in Illinois, and the fact that the accident had occurred in the state of Illinois, and that a law of the state of Illinois limited the time in which actions for personal injuries might be brought to two years after the happening thereof, and, therefore, that this action was barred by said statute. Upon the trial, after the plaintiff's evidence had been introduced, a peremptory nonsuit was granted. It appeared by the evidence that at the time of the accident, and for some time prior thereto, the plaintiff was employed by the defendant in its rolling mill, and that his particular business was to oil a machine called the "bloom rolls." This was a large, heavy machine, standing 8 feet or more high from the floor, operated by steam power, and having upon one side a series of cogwheels meshed into each other. It appeared by the evidence that at intervals a section of the floor at the side of this machine, close to the series of cogwheels, had to be removed in order to put in new rolls. It further appears that this removal of the floor was done by a separate gang of workmen, called the "sailor gang," and that, after the replacing of the rolls, the floor was put down again by another gang of workmen, called the "carpenter gang." Each of these gangs worked under a separate foreman. The evidence tends to show that plaintiff had nothing to do with either the taking up or the putting down of the floor, or with the work of either the sailor gang or the carpenter gang. The plaintiff testifies that at the time of the accident he was about to oil the part of the machinery near the cogwheels; that he stepped upon the end of a loose plank in that part of the floor which had to be removed when the rolls were changed, and the plank tipped up, thus throwing his right hand into the cogs, and severing it. The plaintiff's version of the transaction was to a certain extent corroborated by other employees who testified to seeing the loose board immediately after the accident. It appeared by the evidence that this section of the floor had been taken up, and the rolls changed, and the floor relaid, two or three days before the accident happened; that plaintiff was one of a night crew, working from 6 o'clock in the evening until 7 o'clock in the morning; and that he had to oil the machine every fifteen minutes or so, and was obliged to walk over this portion of the floor where the plank was loose every time, but that he had not noticed that the plank was loose. The accident happened just before 7 o'clock in the morning. The plaintiff also offered in evidence the following decisions of the supreme court of the state of Illinois: Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hessons, 150 Ill. 546; Lanark v. Dougherty, 153 Ill. 185; Wenona Coal Co. v. Holmquist, 152 Ill. 581; Lobby, McN. & L. v. Scherman, 146 Ill. 540; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack, 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215. At the close of the evidence, a motion for nonsuit was granted, and judgment was rendered dismissing the complaint upon the merits, for the following reasons: "First. Because it appears from the evidence that the occurrence out of which the alleged cause of action arose took place in the state of Illinois, and not in the state of Wisconsin; that both the plaintiff and defendant were at the time of such occurrence, ever since have been, and now are, residents of the state of Illinois, and not of the state of Wisconsin; that the alleged cause of action depends upon peculiar rules laid down by the courts of Illinois which do not prevail in Wisconsin, and never have done, and which are hostile and obnoxious to the law of the state of Wisconsin, as interpreted by the courts thereof; and that this court, therefore, in this action, is called upon to administer the laws of the state of Illinois, which it has no jurisdiction to do. Second. Because the plaintiff has wholly failed to show by evidence any negligence whatever on the part of the defendant which caused or contributed to the injury which is the basis of the action." From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

Mr. C. H. Van Alstine, with Mr. J. W. Wegner, for appellant:

The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

An action for a personal injury is a transitory action, and when the cause of action arises in one state, the action may be brought in another state, provided, of course, jurisdiction of the person can be obtained.

Whether there was negligence on the part of the defendant was a question for the jury.

The cause of action having arisen in Illinois, the law of that state governs the right and the law of Wisconsin governs the remedy. The common-law duty incumbent upon every employer and which he cannot delegate to others in such manner as to relieve himself from the consequence of his nonperformance, is to furnish his employee a reasonably safe place in which to work, and to use proper diligence to keep such place in a reasonably safe condition. The failure of the defendant to keep the place assigned to the plaintiff for the performance of his work in a safe condition is of the very gist of the action.

Libby, McN. & L. v. Scherman, 146 Ill. 541; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack, 143 Ill. 243, 18 L. R. A. 215.

The court can say, as matter of law, that the injury was not caused by the negligence of a fellow servant.

The law of Illinois respecting contributory negligence, as proved on the trial, is as follows:

The doctrine of comparative negligence as announced in the earliest cases is no longer the law of Illinois. The doctrine announced 84 L. R. A.

in the later decisions requires as a condition of recovery by the plaintiff that the person injured must be found in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, and that the injury resulted from the negligence of the defendant.

Messrs. Van Dyke, Van Dyke & Carter, for respondent:

The courts of this state are not bound absolutely to take jurisdiction in such cases, but they are vested with the sound discretion to take or refuse jurisdiction according to the circumstances of the case.

The plaintiff was the fellow servant of the person or persons who failed to nail or fasten the board, to the tipping of which he attributes his accident, and because such negligence was the negligence of the fellow servant, as that term is understood and construed in this state, the plaintiff could not, if the cause of action had arisen here, recover against the defendant.

Morrill*, 62 Mich. 386; Killea v. Faxon, 125 Mass. 485; Quincy Min. Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 84.

Upon the question of how far the courts of one state will, in suits brought in them upon causes of action arising in another state between citizens of such other state, and depending for their existence upon peculiarities of the laws of such latter state, enforce such peculiar laws, there is a very wide and irreconcilable difference of opinion.

The decisions seem to range themselves in three principal divisions. First, those which hold that a transitory cause of action arising in one state under its laws will be enforced in any other state, although, as between her own citizens and the events from which it arose happening within her own borders no cause of action would arise which her courts could recognize.

Dennick v. Central R. Co. 108 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771.

The second class of cases lays down the rule that a right of action arising at the common law, or under a statute of another state than that in whose courts it is sought to be enforced, will be sustained, if such latter state has a similar though not identical statute, so that if the occurrence out of which it arose had happened in the state of the forum, a right of action would also have arisen from it there.

Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. 84 N. Y. 48, 38 Am. Rep. 491; Lower v. Segal (N. J.) 34 Atl. 945; Wooden v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 10, 18 L. R. A. 458; Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. 108 Pa. 250, 56 Am. Rep. 200; Morris v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 727, 54 Am. Rep. 89.

The third class of cases holds that no action will lie in one state upon a right of action arising upon a statute of another state.

Anderson v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 87 Wis. 321; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Richards, 68 Tex. 375; Richardson v. New York C. R. Co. 98 Mass. 85; Woodard v. Michigan Southern & N. I. R. Co. 10 Ohio St. 121; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. McCormick, 71 Tex. 660, 1 L. R. A. 804; Belt v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 4 Tex. Civ. App. 281; Buckles v. Ellers, 72 Ind. 220, 87 Am. If this were an action based upon an Illinois statute, it could not be maintained in this state.

But it is not such an action but depends upon the common law, which is, theoretically, at least, the same wherever it exists at all. And what it is, one court has as much right to determine as another.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two important questions arise in this case, viz.: (1) Whether the court could, in its discretion, dismiss the case because the parties were both residents of the state of Illinois, and because the cause of action arose in the state of Illinois, jurisdiction of the person of the defendant having been obtained within this state; (2) if the court could not dismiss the case for this reason, then whether the evidence of the plaintiff was sufficient to entitle him to have the case submitted to the jury upon the merits. These questions will be considered in the order indicated.

This is an action to recover damages for injuries to the person. It is therefore purely a transitory action, and the principle that the courts of this state have jurisdiction to entertain such an action, although the cause arose in Illinois and the parties are residents of Illinois, is unquestioned. Curtis v. Bradford, 33 Wis. 190. A court of this state would even have jurisdiction of a transitory action of this nature where it arose in a foreign country, or on the high seas, and both parties to the action were aliens, provided jurisdiction of the person could be obtained. Gardner v. Thomas, 14 Johns. 184, 7 Am. Dec. 445; Johnson v. Dalton, 1 Cow. 543, 13 Am. Dec. 564; Great Western R. Co. v. Miller, 19 Mich. 312. But while it is held that a court has jurisdiction and may administer relief in an action between aliens brought upon a cause of action arising in foreign lands, it is also held that there is a certain discretion which may be used by the court in entertaining such actions, and that the court may dismiss such an action if, for any reason, it seems improper to take jurisdiction. In the present case it is practically claimed by defendant that this rule applies to such an action as the present; in other words, that citizens of another state of this Union are to be treated in the courts of this state precisely as if they were aliens, and that a cause of action arising in another state is to be treated as though it arose in a foreign country; and this really is the first question to be settled.

It is provided by the Constitution of the United States (§ 2, art. 4) that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." The first attempt at a comprehensive definition of this clause of the Federal Constitution seems to be made in the case of Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, where Mr. Justice Washington, referring to this section of the Constitution, says: "The inquiry is, What are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental, which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several states which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. . . . They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one state to pass through or to reside in any other state, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the state; to take, hold, and dispose of property, either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes and impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the state, — may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental." The subject was again considered in Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449.

where it is said by Mr. Justice Clifford, who wrote the opinion in that case, referring to the words "privileges and immunities" in this section: "Beyond doubt, those words are words of very comprehensive meaning, but it will be sufficient to say that the clause plainly and unmistakably secures and protects the right of a citizen of one state to pass into any other state of the Union for the purpose of engaging in lawful commerce, trade, or business, without molestation; to acquire personal property; to take and hold real estate; to maintain actions in the courts of the state; and to be exempt from any higher taxes or excises than are imposed by the state upon its own citizens." In referring to the same subject in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357, Mr. Justice Field, in the opinion of the court, after defining the object of the constitutional provision in question in quite similar terms, very aptly says: "It has been justly said that no provision in the Constitution has tended so strongly to constitute the citizens of the United States one people as this." These decisions are all referred to with approval in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394. See, on this same subject, the following cases, which are in harmony with the cases just quoted; Lemmon v. People, 20 N. Y. 608; Campbell v. Morris, 3 Harr. & McH. 535. A case almost identical in its facts with the case before us is the case of Cofrode v. Gartner, 79 Mich. 332, 7 L. R. A. 511, where this provision of the Constitution of the United States is directly construed as guaranteeing the right to a citizen of another state to bring suits in the state of Michigan in any case where a citizen of Michigan was entitled to bring such suit. Indeed, we have been referred to no cases holding the contrary of this proposition, except, possibly, the case of Morris v. Missouri P. R. Co. 78 Tex. 17, 9 L. R. A. 849, where it was held that a Texas court might refuse to take jurisdiction of an action between a Choctaw Indian and a resident of another state, founded upon a cause of action accruing in another state. We do not, however, regard this case as of value as authority on this question, because it was held to be a local action, and not transitory. If this was the case, of course the courts of Texas could not entertain it, whatever the citizenship of the parties. Therefore, what is said at the close of the opinion with regard to the power of dismissing the case on account of the residence of the parties is obiter. Moreover, the question of the rights of a citizen of another state under the Constitution could hardly arise in a case where the plaintiff was a member of an Indian tribe, and consequently not a citizen of any state. We are entirely satisfied that one of the "privileges and immunities" referred to in the constitutional provision is the right to bring and maintain an action in the courts of the state. Any citizen of this state may bring an action in the circuit court of this state upon a transitory cause of action arising in another state, and against a citizen of another state, provided he can obtain jurisdiction of the person of the defendant in this state. This is one of the rights guaranteed him under our Constitution and laws. If the words "privileges and immunities" in the constitutional clause in question refer to the right to maintain actions, then a resident of another state has the same right to bring an action in the courts of this state upon a cause of action arising in another state, and against a citizen of another state, that a citizen of this state has, because the Constitution guarantees him the same right as a citizen of this state. We entirely approve the doctrine held by the supreme court of Michigan in Cofrode v. Gartner, supra, and therefore hold that the trial court could not dismiss this action merely because the parties were both citizens of Illinois, and the cause of action arose in Illinois.

The question then arises whether the court was right in dismissing the case on the merits, either because no cause of action was proved, or on account of the supposed conflict of the laws of Illinois and Wisconsin. This court has held, as we have seen, that an action to recover for personal injuries negligently inflicted in another state is a transitory action, and is triable in the courts of this state, provided jurisdiction of the person is obtained. Curtis v. Bradford, supra. This doctrine is in accord with the decisions everywhere, and it is unnecessary to cite authorities. Another rule has been applied, however, by some of the decisions, with regard to actions founded on a statute of another state where such statute is inconsistent with the law of the forum. Thus, it has been held by this court in Anderson v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 37 Wis. 321, that the courts of this state will not enforce a cause of action arising in Iowa under a statute of that state making an employer liable to his employee for injuries suffered by reason of the negligence of his fellow servant, because it was the settled law of this state at that time that such an action would not lie. For cases holding similar doctrine, see Story, Conf. L. 8th ed. p. 844, § 625, note a; Richardson v. New York C. R. Co. 98 Mass. 85. This doctrine has been consistently disapproved by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by some other courts. Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 489; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771. The question, however, does not arise in this case, and hence it is unnecessary to consider upon which side the weight of reason and authority preponderates. The present action is not founded upon any statute of one state not existing in others, but upon certain fundamental and well-settled principles of the common law which prevail in most states of the Union. The principles involved are, briefly: (1) Ordinary negligence by one person, proximately causing personal injury to another, to whom the first owes a duty of care, raises a right of action in the person injured. (2) In order to recover for such injuries, the injured person must himself have been in the exercise of ordinary care at the time of the injury. (3) A servant cannot recover damages of his master for injuries caused solely by the negligence of his fellow servant. (4) When the master undertakes to furnish the servant a place to work, with the preparation of which place the servant has nothing to do, then it is the master's duty to furnish a reasonably safe place to work, and this duty cannot be delegated; and the servant who prepares such place for work is not, in the eye of the law, a fellow servant with the other. These principles are well established in this state, and the decisions of the supreme court of Illinois offered in evidence on the trial show that they are recognized in that state. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Heasions, 150 Ill. 546; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack, 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215; Libby, McN. & L. v. Schervan, 146 Ill. 540. Now, the complaint in the present case clearly states a cause of action under the common law for negligence, and the plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to go to the jury under the foregoing principles of the common law, recognized alike in both states. The evidence, in brief, tended to show that the floor upon which the plaintiff tripped was a place for him to work in, with the preparation of which he had no duty to perform. If this was so, then, under the principles laid down in Cadden v. American Steel Barge Co. 88 Wis. 409, and Libby, McN. & L. v. Scherman, 146 Ill. 540, we think the "carpenter gang," whose duty it was to replace the planks, were not fellow servants of the plaintiff. If they were not fellow servants, but were simply discharging a duty of the master, then, if they left the plank in question loose, and the plaintiff, without contributory negligence, suffered injury thereby, their failure was failure of the master, under the principles settled in the last-named cases.

We are not to be understood as attempting in advance to lay down rules for the retrial of this case. We have proceeded thus far in the discussion of certain fundamental principles of the law of negligence for the purpose simply of showing that upon these questions, which are the leading and important questions in this case, the law as expounded by the courts of last resort in both states is in substantial accord. The case, then, is this: A transitory cause of action arose and became vested in Illinois, under the principles of the common law recognized in both Illinois and Wisconsin alike; and the question is, Can it be prosecuted to judgment in the courts of Wisconsin, jurisdiction of the person having been obtained? We are clearly of the opinion that there can be but one answer to this question, and that in the affirmative. It is said, however, that there are some differences in the law as administered in the two states with reference to the question of whether a person employed by the same master is a fellow servant or a vice principal, and that in this respect the laws of Illinois are more favorable to the plaintiff than those of Wisconsin. Upon this basis the trial court held that the case depended upon principles of law which are obnoxious to the law of this state, and that it had no jurisdiction to administer the law of Illinois. It is well known that courts are frequently called upon to administer and enforce the laws of another state. Doubtless, upon the trial of this case the plaintiff's right of action will depend upon the law of Illinois as it shall be shown to be. There is no inherent difficulty in finding out or applying the legal principles governing the cause of action in Illinois when the accident happened. The same objection was made in the case of Walah v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 160 Mass. 34 L. R. A.

571, and was overruled. We fully agree with what was there said by Holmes, J., in the opinion of the court: "As between the states of this Union, when a transitory cause of action has vested in one of them under the common law as there understood and administered, the mere existence of a slight variance of view in the forum resorted to, not amounting to a fundamental difference of policy, should not prevent an enforcement of the obligation admitted to have arisen by the law which governed the conduct of the parties." Thus far we go in the present case, and, going thus far, we hold that the trial court should have entertained and tried the case. As to the form of the remedy, the conduct of the trial, and the rules of evidence, the law of the forum would unquestionably prevail.

An Illinois statute of limitations was set up in the answer as a defense, but the statute was not offered in evidence. Consequently the question as to its effect upon the plaintiff's cause of action in this suit was not before the court below, is not before us, and hence is not decided.

Judgment reversed, and action remanded for a new trial.

Cassoday, Ch. J., concurring:

I fully concur in the reversal of the judgment in this case, and much that is contained in the opinion of my Brother Winslow. The only question I desire here to consider is as to whether the plaintiff has the absolute right to bring and maintain this action under the clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." § 2, art. 4. The only case cited by counsel, or which any of us have been able to find, so holding in a case similar to this, is Osgrode v. Gartner, 79 Mich. 832, 7 L. R. A. 511, and in that case Mr. Justice Campbell dissented. Besides, that was a proceeding by mandamus to compel the court to entertain a case arising under a contract for the construction of a railroad in Michigan. That case was decided after Mr. Justice Cooley had left the bench. According to that learned author, the precise meaning of "privileges and immunities" is not as yet very concisely settled. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 490. The Supreme Court of the United States (the final arbiter) has not, it would seem, determined the precise question suggested, although that court has many times considered the clause of the Constitution mentioned. Mr. Story says: "The intention of this clause was to confer on them [citizens], if one may so say, a general citizenship, and to communicate all the privileges and immunities which the citizens of the same state would be entitled to under the like circumstances." 2 Story, Const. § 1806. Mr. Hare says "that the clause in question adds nothing to the rights given and restraints laid by the other articles of the Constitution, except that the rules made by each state with regard to the citizens of her sister states must be the same as those which she imposes on her own citizens." 1 Hare, Const. Law, 513. In Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 180, 19 L. ed. 360, Mr. Justice Field said: "But the privileges and immunities secured to citizens of each state in the several states, by the provision in question, are those privileges and immunities which are common to the citizens in the latter states, under their Constitution and laws, by virtue of their being citizens. Special privileges enjoyed by citizens in their own states are not secured in other states by this provision. It was not intended by the provision to give to the laws of one state any operation in other states. They can have no such operation except by the permission, express or implied, of those states." The definition thus given was sanctioned by Mr. Justice Miller in the Slaughter-House Cases, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394, and he there added: "The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the states. It threw around them in that clause no security for the citizen of the state in which they were claimed or exercised. Nor did it profess to control the power of the state governments over the rights of its own citizens. Its sole purpose was to declare to the several states that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other states within your jurisdiction."

Many similar expressions have emanated from the same tribunal. In addition to the enforcement of the criminal laws and police regulations as to persons and property within the state, the principal functions of a state government would seem to be to make and enforce laws for and against its own citizens, and for and against property and rights of property located or having a situs therein. The party to such a controversy, although a nonresident and a citizen of another state, undoubtedly has the same "privileges and immunities" as a party who is a citizen of the same state; otherwise the administration of the law would be partial and unjust. But, in my judgment, the case at bar does not come within the letter or spirit of the constitutional guaranty mentioned. Since this state has no power to authorize an action to be commenced and maintained by one of its own citizens against another of its own citizens, in the courts of another state, in respect to a tort committed in this state, it necessarily follows that the courts of this state are not arbitrarily bound, by the constitutional provision quoted, to entertain jurisdiction of a suit commenced by one citizen and resident of Illinois against another citizen and resident or corporation of Illinois, when the only controversy is in regard to a tort committed in Illinois, unless that clause requires this state to grant "privileges and immunities" to citizens of other states which it has no power to grant to its own citizens "under the like circumstances." This, as shown, would be contrary to the authorities cited. To avoid such an anomaly, according to Mr. Story, the wording of the corresponding clause in the old Articles of Confederation was purposely changed to its present form. 2 Story, Const. § 1805. Actions like the one at bar are generally governed by the principles of interstate comity. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 150, 151. This court 31 L. R. A.

has recently not only recognized, but sanctioned, such principles of interstate comity, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Pinney. Gilman v. Ketcham, 84 Wis. 60 23 L. R. A. 52. Thus, in National Teleph. Mfg. Co. v. Du Bois, 165 Mass. 117, 80 L. R. A. 628, it is held that "to a foreign corporation having a place of business here and suing a citizen of another state, the courts of equity in this commonwealth are not open as matter of strict right, but as matter of comity." In Smith v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 14 Allen, 336, it was held that "this court will not entertain jurisdiction of a bill in equity brought by a citizen of Alabama, who has never lived here, against an incorporated mutual life insurance company of New York, seeking to restore him to his rights under a policy issued by the defendants in New York upon his life, he having failed to pay the premiums required by the terms of the policy, although the defendants transact business in this commonwealth, and have appointed an agent resident here upon whom all lawful processes against the company may be served." To the same effect, Bank of North America v. Rindge, 154 Mass. 208, 18 L. R. A. 56; Kimball v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 157 Mass. 7; Renier v. Hurlbut, 81 Wis. 24, 14 L. R. A. 562. Numerous other cases might be cited to the same effect. It may be conceded that an action for a tort to the person may generally be maintained in any jurisdiction in which the defendant can be legally served with process. It seems to be essential, however, that the wrong complained of, although actionable according to the law of the state where the action is brought, should also be actionable according to the law of the state or country in which it occurred or was committed. Dicey, Conf. L. 667, and cases there cited. In actions at common law this identity or similarity of law is assumed to exist in the absence of reasons to the contrary. Id., citing Walsh v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 160 Mass. 571. In statutory actions it is held that "if the foreign law is a penal statute, or if it offends our own policy, or is repugnant to justice or to good morals, or is calculated to injure this state or its citizens, or if we have not jurisdiction of parties who must be brought in to enable us to give a satisfactory remedy, or if, under our forms of procedure, an action here cannot give a substantial remedy, we are at liberty to decline jurisdiction." Higgins v. Central, N. E. & W. R. Co. 155 Mass. 180, and cases there cited.

In considering § 1 of art. 4 of the Constitution of the United States, Fuller, Ch. J., speaking for the majority of the court, said: "The Constitution did not mean to confer any new power on the states, but simply to regulate the effect of their acknowledged jurisdiction over persons and things within their territory." (Cole v. Cunningham, 183 U. S. 112, 83 L. ed. 541, affirming 142 Mass. 47, 56 Am. Rep. 657. He then said: "The intention of § 2 of art. 4 was to confer on the citizens of the several states a general citizenship, and to communicate all the privileges and immunities which the citizens of the same state would be entitled to under the like circumstances, and this includes the right to institute actions. The fact of the citizenship of Butler and Hayden did not affect their privilege to sue in New York, and have the full use and benefit of the courts of that state in the assertion of their legal rights; but, as that fact might affect the right of action as between them and the citizens of their own state, the courts of New York might have held that its existence put an end to the seizure of their debtor's property by Butler, Hayden, & Co., in New York. If, however, those courts declined to take that view, it would not follow that the courts of Massachusetts violated any privilege or immunity of Massachusetts' own citizens in exercising their undoubted jurisdiction over them." The learned chief justice then goes on at great length, and shows by the citation of numerous adjudications that since the litigants were both citizens of Massachusetts, and subject to the jurisdiction of its courts, one of them might be restrained from prosecuting an action previously commenced in New York to collect a debt by garnishment therein. The opinion is replete with learning and authorities to the effect that, where both parties to the controversy are citizens and residents of the same state, one may restrain the other from prosecuting a suit against him in some other state, and in fraud of the laws of the state where they both reside. If the Constitution of the United States gives to every party to a transitory action the absolute right to commence and maintain the same in any state of the Union where he can get service on the defendant, then it is difficult to perceive upon what theory they can be restrained from exercising such constitutional right. In several of the states a nonresident is required by statute to give security for costs as a condition precedent to commencing or maintaining a suit, when no such requirement is made of a resident plaintiff; and the validity of such statutes have been sustained. Reno, Non-Residents, pp. 44, 45. If such authorities are sound, then it is difficult to perceive how the right to bring and maintain the suit can be regarded as an absolute constitutional right. If the constitutional clause in question gave to the plaintiff the absolute right to commence and maintain this action, then it would seem that the state courts have generally, and for a century, labored under a grave misapprehension in holding that jurisdiction in such cases was governed by the principles of interstate comity.

This hasty expression of opinion is merely to indicate the grounds on which I differ from the opinion filed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

G. F. B. HOWARD, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES of America.

(75 Fed. Rep. 986.)

1. An omission in a copy of the mittimus furnished under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1022, by a marshal to the warden of a penitentiary, when it is a mere clerical error and no such omission exists in the original mittimus or sentence, does not entitle the prisoner to his release on habeas corpus.

2. Cumulative and successive sentences are within the power of a court to impose at common law, and they may be imposed by Federal courts without any express authority, by act of Congress.

NOTE. Reduction of prisoner's term by allowance for good behavior.

I. Constitutionality of statutes providing therefor.

II. Construction and effect of statutes.

a. In general.

b. Federal cases.

I. Constitutionality of statutes providing therefor.

There is some conflict among the decisions as to the validity of the statutes upon this subject, but most of them hold that the legislature may constitutionally provide for good-time credits, or deductions from the sentences of prisoners on account of good conduct.

Different objections are raised against the validity of such statutes. One is that they infringe upon the governor's pardoning power. But this objection is not sustained by most of the courts that have considered it. Thus, the case of Com. Johnson, v. Hallaway, 43 Pa. 446, holds that such a statute does not infringe upon the pardoning power, although the court regards it as subject to another objection.

So, in Ohio the provision for a system of credits whereby the term of a sentence may be diminished which is given by the Ohio act of March 24, 1884, as amended May 4, 1885, § 7, is held not to be an interference with the pardoning power of the governor. State, Atty. Gen., v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 629.

And in California a statute providing in express terms that certain credits or deductions from a term of imprisonment shall be allowed for good conduct, without requiring any action on the part of the governor for this purpose, is held not to be unconstitutional as an infringement of his power to pardon, as it does not take away or interfere with such power in any way. The court says the statute simply fixes the term of imprisonment in certain cases and upon certain conditions, and that this provision enters into and becomes a part of the judgment of the court below. Ex parte Wadleigh, 82 Cal. 518.

But as applied to persons who were in the penitentiary at the time of the passage of the act, it is held in Tennessee that the act of 1885 (Acts Ex. Sess. p. 87), allowing good time to convicts, is an attempted exercise of the pardoning power which is vested alone in the governor under the Constitution, and therefore void. State v. McClellan, 87 Tenn. 52.

As to the claim that the Ohio act providing for parole of prisoners and giving a system of good-time credits is retroactive, and therefore unconstitutional so far as it affects past sentences, the court says, in State. Atty. Gen., v. Peters, supra, that the only party who could object is the prisoner, and he cannot where it is clearly for his benefit; and that the question whether a case might not possibly arise in which the personal rights of the prisoner would be infringed need not be considered until such a case does arise.

3. The possibility of a deduction by good-time credits, although contingent on the conduct of the convict, does not render a sentence so indefinite or uncertain that a successive sentence to begin on the expiration of the former will be invalid.
4. A consolidation of separate indictments charging definite offenses for the purposes of trial does not make them one offense so as to permit but one sentence.
5. The question of error in an order consolidating indictments cannot be re-examined by writ of habeas corpus, as error in that respect would not make the judgment and sentence void as without jurisdiction and authority.

(July 2, 1893.)

APPPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio denying a petition for habeas corpus to release petitioner from custody to which he had been committed under a sentence for using the postoffice department in execution of schemes to defraud. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Lurion, Circuit Judge, and Searens and Clark, District Judges.

Another objection raised to such statutes is that they infringe upon the province of the judiciary.

But while the courts are usually given a discretion as to fixing a sentence between the maximum and the minimum penalty, or between alternative penalties, it is said by the supreme court of Ohio that this may be taken away without infringing upon the exclusive power of the judiciary. State, Atty. Gen., v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 620.

This was decided in upholding the Ohio act of March 24, 1884, as amended May 4, 1885, providing for a system of merit and demerit accounts and deductions from sentences for good conduct (as well as for a parole of convicts and also for indeterminate sentences under which the prisoner must serve at least the minimum term provided by law, and cannot be held longer than the maximum term so provided, leaving the termination of the sentence within those limits to the board of managers). The court says: "It marks a new experiment in the management and discipline of prisoners, whether serving under fixed or indeterminate sentences. It is evidently prompted by a desire to reform as well as to punish, to make better those under sentence as well as to protect society." The court proceeds to say: "Whether this legislation is widely adapted to that end, or whether it is practicable, it is not the province of this court to determine."

But, on the other hand, the Pennsylvania act of May 1, 1861, providing for a graduated deduction from a term of imprisonment in the state penitentiary as a reward for good conduct, is held, in Com. v. Johnson, v. Holloway, 42 Pa. 444, to be unconstitutional as interfering with judgments of the judiciary, although the court does not regard it as an infringement on the governor's pardoning power. The court says: "From what judicial sentence may not the legislature direct 'deductions' to be made if this act be constitutional? What they may do indirectly they may do directly. If they may authorize boards of inspectors to disregard judicial sentences why may they not repeal them as fast as they are pronounced and thus assume the highest judicial functions?" Further on the court says: "In respect to one of the relators who was convicted and sentenced before the law was passed,

Mr. J. D. Brannan for appellant.

Mr. Harlan Cleveland, for appellees:

Relator was not detained or required to be detained by virtue of any warrant. He was detained by virtue of the judgment of the court, and that judgment was a sufficient authority for his detention.

People, Trainor, v. Baker, 89 N. Y. 460; Church, Habeas Corpus, § 128.

If the second mittimus will not hold the petitioner, the third one, No. 1, 729, would immediately become operative, and after it No. 1, 730, and so on to the end.

Blitz v. United States, 158 U. S. 808, 33 L. ed. 725; Gregory v. Queen, 15 Q. B. 974.

Clark, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Eight indictments were returned against petitioner, Howard, in the district court of the United States for the eastern division of the western district of Tennessee, charging him with violations of § 5490 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in the use of the postoffice establishment of the United States in the execution of schemes to defraud. The docket numbers of the cases were 1,727, 1,728, 1,729, 1,730, 1,731, 1,732, 1,758, and 1,759, respec-

it is considered very clear that it is a legislative impairing of an existing legal judgment. But is it not equally so in respect to him who was sentenced since the date of the act? The court could not have taken the act into account in measuring the sentence because they could not know how many days of abatement the prisoner would earn." It should be said, however, that the judges were not all agreed on this point, and that the decision was rested also on other and independent ground.

As to the parole of prisoners, see People v. Cummings (Mich.) 14 L. R. A. 285, and note.

The right of a convict to a prescribed reduction from his sentence upon compliance with the rules of the prison, which is given under 2 How. Stat. (Mich.) § 9704, is one of which he cannot be deprived, and the act of 1893, the effect of which is to deprive a person sentenced under the prior statute of this right in part by reducing the amount of his credits, is to that extent an ex post facto law, because its effect is to increase, and not to mitigate, his punishment. Therefore the prisoner is entitled to credit upon the basis of the statute under which he was sentenced. Re Canfield, 98 Mich. 644.

II. Construction and effect of statutes.

a. In general.

Independently of any constitutional objection, the Pennsylvania act of May 1, 1861, is construed as evidently meant to give the inspectors a measure of discretion by conferring upon them power and authority to discharge, without expressly enjoining the duty, and as in the exercise of that discretion they had declined to discharge the relators, and, indeed, to execute the law, the court said: "We will not overrule their reasons nor control their discretion." Com. v. Johnson, v. Holloway, 42 Pa. 446.

So, by the Pennsylvania act of May 21, 1863, it is held that large discretionary power in the matter of discharge for good behavior is given to the inspectors, the discharge in such cases not being a matter of strict right, but rather of favor. Reinhart v. Vaux, 10 W. N. C. 222.

No executive pardon is held necessary to the discharge of a prisoner at the expiration of his term as reduced by allowances for good conduct under tively. These cases were, by order of the court, consolidated, and tried at the same time before the same jury. The trial resulted in a verdict of guilty on each of the indictments, and judgment and sentence were pronounced against the petitioner in each of the cases. The sentence in the first case was to eighteen months' imprisonment in the Ohio penitentiary and a fine of $500, and, in each of the seven cases following, thirteen months' imprisonment and a fine of $100 were imposed, the same to be applied to the indictments in their numerical order. The sentence in the second and each following case took effect at the expiration of the one next preceding. Mittimus issued, regular in form, under each judgment and sentence, directed to the marshal of the western district of Tennessee, and commanding him to commit the petitioner, Howard, to the Ohio penitentiary at Columbus, in the state of Ohio, to be there imprisoned for the terms fixed in the eight sentences. The defendant was ordered to stand committed until the several fines imposed and the costs of the prosecution were paid. When the defendant had served out the term of imprisonment imposed by the first sentence (the statutory deduction for good time being made), application was made to the circuit court of the United States for the eastern division of the southern district of Ohio for a writ of habeas corpus. The petition for the writ alleged as grounds for the prisoner's discharge from custody: (1) That cumulative sentences, as imposed by the court, were without authority of law and without power in the court. (2) That the sentences, except the first, were too uncertain and indefinite, in that they were made each to take effect upon the expiration of the preceding sentence, which itself was made uncertain, because the question of allowing credit for good time under the statute was discretionary, and not absolute. (3) That the consolidation of the indictments against the prisoner, and his trial on all of them at the same time, was a proceeding unauthorized by law, and the sentences for that reason void.

Due return was made to the writ, with the answer of the warden of the penitentiary. The writ was discharged upon the trial, the petition dismissed, and the petitioner, Howard, remanded to the custody of the warden of the Ohio penitentiary to complete his terms of imprisonment, in accordance with the sentences of the United States district court for the western district of Tennessee. On appeal to this Mass. Stat. 1867, chap. 284, 1868, chap. 77, and 1869, chap. 108. Opinion of the Justices, 13 Gray, 618. This case turns on the construction of the statutes rather than upon any question as to their validity, holding that the statutes give a right to the deductions and do not provide for a mere favor.

A convict discharged under the three-fourth's rule may be given a certificate of discharge by the warden of the penitentiary without any pardon from the governor, under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 7273, and therefore such a certificate may be put in evidence to show the fact of the discharge. State v. Austin, 118 Mo. 528.

It is for the officers of a prison to determine, in the first instance at least, whether an offender is being confined in prison for the first time or not, for the purpose of determining, under the Michigan act of 1883, his right to a good-time allowance. Re Canfield, 98 Mich. 644.

A prisoner cannot earn good time when out on parole under Ind. Acts 1888 (Elliot Supp. § 2025), providing for an allowance to a penitentiary convict "who shall have no infractions of the rules or regulations of the prison or laws of the state recorded against him, and who performs in a faithful manner the duties assigned him." Woodward v. Murdock, 124 Ind. 439.

But the time that he is out on parole is to be counted, and the good time that he earned while in prison is to be considered, although during another part of the time he is out on parole. He is entitled to his discharge when the time of the sentence expires as reduced by his good-time credits, although he has been out on parole part of the time. Ibid.

Under How. Stat. (Mich.) §§ 9708, 9704, governing debits and credits for good conduct or misconduct of convicts in prison, it is held that the rules to be established on the subject should be plain, certain, and specific, and known to the inmates of the prison, and be adopted by the board of inspectors, and made a matter of record; also that the convict's record should be made known to him monthly, and the reports investigated by the inspectors each month at a regular meeting and a record made of their action, so that the convict's standing shall not rest upon any computation of the warden's clerk, but may be shown at once 34 L. R. A.

from the record, and that the convict should be given, if he desires, an opportunity to be heard upon the matter of his report. Re Walsh, 87 Mich. 466.

But while the rules on this subject ought to be written, yet an unwritten rule or custom which has been in force for twenty years or more, to deduct for each infraction of a prison rule, whether trivial or serious, as many days of good time as the prisoner would be earning under the law each month in the year of such infraction, should be held operative and binding on the prisoner, and also upon the board of inspectors until the rule is changed. Ibid.

A commutation by the governor of a sentence of imprisonment for life to one of "nine years of actual time," providing for a discharge "when he shall have served nine years actual time in the said penitentiary," is not subject to Neb. Crim. Code, § 560, providing for good-time reductions. Re Hall, 34 Neb. 206. This decision is based on the construction of the governor's commutation which is said by its terms to show that he intended the reduced sentence to be for nine years of service within the penitentiary.

The failure of the superintendent of the penitentiary to keep a "good-time account" of the prisoners, as required by Mill. & V. Code (Tenn.) § 6383, and by the act of 1869-70, T. & S. Code, § 5559a, sub. 7, is held, in State v. McClellan, 87 Tenn. 52, to raise a presumption that a convict is entitled to the good time, and the want of the register or good-time account cannot be supplied by oral evidence, although such evidence might perhaps be heard to corroborate or to contradict such a record.

One sixth of the time of the sentence is to be deducted from the whole term when it does not exceed two years, and no charge is recorded against the prisoner under Neb. Crim. Code, § 560, and the term of imprisonment is to be dated from the time of sentence and not from the time the prisoner is delivered to the warden of the penitentiary, although the officer has thirty days in which to deliver him. Re Fuller, 34 Neb. 581.

The denial of good-time allowance to a third-term prisoner under Mich. Pub. Acts 1893, No. 118, § 33, applies to a prisoner in the state prison at Marquette who has previously served two terms in court, the judgment of the court below was affirmed; whereupon a second application by petition was made to the same circuit court for the writ. Objections to the sentences were again set out in the petition as grounds for the second application. The only ground for the writ stated in the second petition which is not also contained in the first is based on an objection to the copy of the mittimus in case No. 1,728, which is the second in numerical order of the several mittimuses issued pursuant to the judgment and sentence of the court. What purport to be copies of the original mittimuses are attached to and made part of this petition, and also a copy of the transcript of the judgment of the court is attached to petition. These copies, it is evident from the petition, are not copies of the originals, but copies of papers in possession of the warden of the penitentiary, which the petition designates as "commitment papers," and which papers are themselves only copies of the originals. So the copies attached to the petition, and made part thereof, are copies of copies, and not of the originals. The objection to the mittimus in case No. 1,728 is that "from date of" is omitted after the words "for the term of thirteen months;" these words being contained in each of the other mittimuses issued, and from which the sentence is clearly made to take effect from date of expiration of the sentence imposed in the case immediately preceding. The position taken is that this omission leaves the period of imprisonment under the sentence in 1,728 without a date for its commencement, and therefore uncertain and void, and that, as the prisoner has served out the first sentence, he is therefore entitled to be released from custody. The petition does not contain any statement that the copy of the mittimus attached thereto is a correct copy from the paper in the possession of the warden of the penitentiary, and, of course, no statement that the same is a correct copy of the original mittimus issued to the marshal, and under which the prisoner was in fact committed. Whether the failure to make the usual statement that the copy is a correct one of the original is entirely due to an oversight would, of course, be matter of conjecture. One or two other minor grounds are alleged as a basis for the application, but they are entirely without the prison at Jackson, as the former is merely a branch of the other prison. Re Prisoners, 3 Det. L. N. No. 84.

One imprisoned for less than three months is held entitled to no reductions of sentence under Utah Comp. Laws 1888, vol. 2, § 5268, §§ 2, 3, 4, specifying an allowance of reductions for those imprisoned for three and six months and longer periods. Ex parte Nokes, 6 Utah, 106.

Two sentences cannot be aggregated or treated as one for the calculation of an allowance for good behavior, but are in law and in fact separate and distinct, so that the commutation is to be calculated on each one separately and successively. Reinhart v. Vaux, 10 W. N. C. 222.

But the California statute, which says that good-time credits shall be deducted from "the entire term of penal servitude to which he has been sentenced," means that they shall be deducted from the aggregate of the sentences when two or more of them are imposed at the same time. The deduction is to be taken from the end of the entire term. Ex parte Dalton, 49 Cal. 463.

The New Jersey statute, providing that where a prisoner is convicted and sentenced after a sentence and conviction under which a remission of time has been made for good behavior the remission shall be vacated, and he may be held under the later sentence to serve out the number of days remitted from the previous term, does not apply or authorize such time previously remitted to be added to the later imprisonment, where the term upon which the remission of time was made was between the time of conviction and the later sentence, sentence under the earlier conviction having been suspended and not pronounced until the expiration of the sentence under the second conviction. State v. Patterson, 14 N. J. L. J. 229.

b. Federal cases.

The good-time allowance of five days per month, provided by the act of Congress of March, 3, 1875, for prisoners sentenced under the law of the United States when in any "prison or penitentiary of any state or territory which has no system of commutation for its own prisoners," does not apply to persons imprisoned in county jails. Re Deering, 80 Fed. Rep. 265; United States v. Schroeder, 14 Blatchf. 344; United States v. Goujon, 39 Fed. Rep. 773; Re Terry, 37 Fed. Rep. 649. 34 L. R. A.

For the same reason this statute does not repeal that part of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5543, 5544, which allows a deduction of one month per year for good behavior to persons imprisoned in "any state jail," where no credits for good behavior are allowed by state laws in such jails, although the other part of those sections relating to penitentiaries is repealed. Re Deering, supra.

But in Re Terry, supra, after holding that the act of 1875 does not apply to county jails, the court says the only other provision of an act of Congress under which credits can be properly claimed is found in U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5544, which gives the same rule of credits applicable to other prisoners in the same jail or penitentiary, and therefore does not apply to prisoners in a county jail when the state law giving credits does not apply to such jail. The court ignores in this case § 5543, which is held in Re Deering, supra, to be still applicable to jails in which state laws do not allow credits.

The case of United States v. Goujon, supra, was one in which the deduction was claimed under the act of 1875, and this was denied, but nothing seems to have been clearly decided in that case as to the right to an allowance under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5543, 5544.

In a similar case, in which the right to credits under the act of Congress of 1875, was denied to a prisoner in a county jail, the court says: "The act supersedes the similar provision in §§ 5543, 5544, Rev. Stat., in which the words 'jail or penitentiary' are used. This change in the language is significant and indicates an intention to limit credits to those state prisons and penitentiaries properly so called." Yet as no claim seems to have been made to any credits under the Revised Statutes, this language may be taken to refer to the act of 1875, and not to hold that the Revised Statutes are altogether repealed. Re Corcoran, 47 Fed. Rep. 211.

A sentence to imprisonment under both the first and the third counts of an indictment, the term of imprisonment under the latter to commence on the expiration of the judgment under the former, may stand and be operative, as to the third count, making the imprisonment thereunder begin on the date for the commencement of the term under the first count, when the sentence on the first count is reversed on writ of error. Blitz v. United States, 158 U. S. 308, 88 L. ed. 725.

merit, and were not insisted upon by the petitioner's counsel on the argument in this court. This petition, which is signed, and sworn to by petitioner alone, was, on motion, dismissed by the circuit court, and the case is here again by appeal. The judgment of the court denying the petition is as follows:

"This cause coming on to be heard on the petition of G. F. B. Howard for a writ of habeas corpus, upon consideration, the court finds that the petition shows the prisoner to be in lawful custody, and does not state a case for the issuance of a writ. Wherefore it is ordered that the petition be denied, at the costs of the petitioner. Whereupon the petitioner applies to the court for an allowance of an appeal to the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit from the order denying the petition, which appeal is accordingly allowed, and the clerk is directed to issue a citation upon such appeal to the United States attorney for the southern district of Ohio, as the representative of the United States, who will be the appellee in the proceedings on appeal in the circuit court of appeals."

It will be seen that the judgment is based on the petition alone and what appears therefrom. The objection based on the omission in the mittimus in 1,728 will be disposed of first.

By § 1028 of the Revised Statutes it is provided: "Whenever a prisoner is committed to a sheriff or jailer by virtue of a writ, warrant, or mittimus, a copy thereof shall be delivered to such sheriff or jailer, as his authority to hold the prisoner, and the original writ, warrant, or mittimus shall be returned to the proper court or officer, with the officer's return thereon."

The contention is that under this statute the copy of the mittimus furnished by the marshal to the warden of the penitentiary is made the warden's only authority for detention of the prisoner, and that, the copy in possession of the warden being void on account of the defect mentioned herein, the prisoner's restraint is unlawful. Omitting the direction and proper teste of the mittimus, the body thereof is as follows: "You are hereby commanded to commit the defendant, Joseph Leger, alias G. F. B. Howard, to the Ohio penitentiary at Columbus, Ohio, there to be imprisoned for the term of thirteen months, the expiration of his term of imprisonment under indictment No. 1,727, in accordance with a sentence of this court pronounced against said defendant on this the 4th day of January, 1894, for the crime of violating the laws of the United States in unlawfully using the mails with intent to defraud."

This contention does not require extended treatment. The warrant or order of commitment is simply an authority and direction to the marshal to take the prisoner to the penitentiary named. The copy furnished by the marshal or clerk to the warden is merely evidence, and evidence only, of the judgment and sentence of the court and the mittimus issued thereunder. The statute makes this evidence of a regular court judgment and mittimus sufficient authority and protection to the warden, and the warden is not required to go beyond this copy in satisfying himself of the existence of a valid sentence against the prisoner. This is the purpose and effect of the copy, and nothing more. The prisoner is not committed by virtue of the copy, but by virtue of the judgment of the court, and the mittimus issued pursuant thereto; the real valid authority under which the mittimus is issued being the sentence of the court.

In People, Trainor, v. Baker, 89 N. Y. 461, Earl, J., said: "But the relator was not detained, or required to be detained, by virtue of any warrant. He was detained by virtue of the judgment of the court, and that judgment was a sufficient authority for his detention. The warrant of commitment is simply an authority and direction to the sheriff or other officer to convey the prisoner to the penitentiary. That need not necessarily be left with the keeper. If he has no other evidence of his authority to detain the prisoner he should have that. But, if the officer who brings a prisoner to the penitentiary furnished the keeper with a certified copy of the judgment of the court, then that is sufficient evidence of the keeper's authority and he needs to have no other. A prisoner who has been properly and legally sentenced to prison cannot be released simply because there is an imperfection in what is commonly called the 'mittimus.' A proper mittimus can, if needed, be supplied at any time; and, if the prisoner is safely in the proper custody, there is no office for a mittimus to perform."

This ruling is supported by the previous case of People v. Nevins, 1 Hill, 154, followed and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 422, 29 L. ed. 91.

And so in Sennott's Case, 146 Mass. 489, Knowlton, J., giving the opinion of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, and answering a similar formal objection to the mittimus, observed: "Besides, we have the judgment before us. The imprisonment rests upon the judgment, and the mittimus is important only as a direction to the officer, and as evidence of the authority which the judgment gives. People, Trainor, v. Baker, 89 N. Y. 460. See also Ex parte Gibson, 81 Cal. 620, 91 Am. Dec. 548; Ex parte Kellogg, 6 Vt. 511."

Moreover, as will be seen, the copy of the mittimus under No. 1,728, attached to the petition, refers to the sentence on indictment No. 1,727, and to the sentence of the court pronounced in No. 1,728, giving the character of the crime. The judgment of the court is not only thus referred to, but, as we have seen, a copy of the transcript of the judgment is attached to the petition, and made a part thereof. The judgment appears from this transcript to be regular in all respects, and makes the period of imprisonment, as well as the time of its commencement, clear, and shows that the sentence of the court contains no such defect or omission as that pointed out in the copy exhibited with the petition; and that the omission in the copy furnished by the marshal to the warden is a mere clerical error by the marshal or clerk in making such copy. For each and all of these reasons, we are of opinion that the defect pointed out in the petition furnishes no ground whatever for the writ, and is entirely without merit. A petition which does not impeach the judgment or original mittimus, directed to the marshal, under which petitioner was actually committed, states no case for the writ. On the trial of the first petition, a full transcript of the record in the court of original jurisdiction was introduced, and was on file in the court below at the time of the judgment on the second petition, and a copy is also on file in this court. From this it fully appears that the original sentences and the original mittimus issued thereunder are in all respects regular; and it is argued that the court below might look to that transcript, and that, in support of the judgment below, this court may also inspect the transcript on file in this court. The disposition thus made of the objection, based on the defective copy, renders it unnecessary to decide this point. As has been seen, the action of the court below was based upon the petition alone and the papers attached thereto; and, in reviewing the judgment of the court below, we do not think we are at liberty to dispose of the case on matter appearing in a record different from that on which the judgment below was based.

This brings to us the question of the right and power of the court to impose cumulative and successive sentences. This question may arise in a given case upon a conviction on different counts in the same indictment charging distinct offenses, or upon conviction at the same term on separate indictments for distinct offenses. The principle involved is, however, the same as the right to join distinct offenses in different counts in the same indictment and is to avoid, to both parties, the burden and expense of two or more separate trials. If this question depended upon the law of the state where the petitioner was tried, there is a statute expressly authorizing cumulative sentences. Tenn. Code, § 5228; Mitchell v. State, 92 Tenn. 672.

In the absence of an act of Congress upon the subject, however, the courts of the United States in the administration of the criminal law are governed by the rules of the common law. United States v. Nye, 4 Fed. Rep. 888; Erwin v. United States, 87 Fed. Rep. 468, 2 L. R. A. 229; United States v. Maxwell, 8 Dill. 278. And there can be no question of the power of the court to impose cumulative sentences for separate offenses, according to the very decided weight of authority at the common law. Re v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2578; Castro v. Queen, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 241 (Tichborne Case); 1 Chitty, Crim. L. 718; Clark, Crim. Proc. 495; United States v. Patterson, 29 Fed. Rep. 775; Re Remond, 42 Fed. Rep. 427; Blitz v. United States, 153 U. S. 308, 317, 38 L. ed. 725, 728.

In Blitz v. United States the defendant was convicted on an indictment containing three separate counts, in which he was charged, in the first count, with personating and voting in the name of another; in the second, with voting at a precinct where he was not lawfully entitled to vote; and, in the third, with voting for the same candidate more than once; and a verdict of guilty was returned upon each count of the indictment. A motion in arrest of judgment was sustained as to the second count of the indictment, and overruled as to the first and third counts, and the defendant was sentenced on the first count to imprisonment in the penitentiary for one year and a day, and on the third count for a like period, beginning upon the expiration of the sentence on the first 34 L. R. A.

count. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the motion in arrest of judgment should have been sustained also as to the first count in the indictment, and affirmed the judgment as to the third count, and directed that the term of imprisonment under the third count should be held to commence on the day named for the commencement of the first term. As judgment was pronounced on both the first and third counts in the court below, the imprisonment under the third count commenced upon the expiration of the judgment on the first count. The contention of the plaintiff in error was that the cause should be remanded, with directions for a new trial. In answering this question, Mr Justice Harlan, giving the opinion of the court, said: "In Kite v. Com. 11 Met. 581, 585, it appeared that the accused was sentenced for a named period to confinement at hard labor, to take effect from and after the expiration of three previous sentences specified. The judgment was objected to as erroneous and void, because there were not three former sentences, legal and valid, and therefore no fixed time from which the punishment on the last sentence should begin. Chief Justice Shaw, referring to this objection, and delivering the unanimous judgment of the court, said that it was not error in a judgment in a criminal case to make one term of imprisonment commence when another terminates. 'It is as certain,' he said, 'as the nature of the case will admit, and there is no other mode in which a party may be sentenced on several convictions. Though uncertain at the time, depending upon a possible contingency that the imprisonment on the former sentence will be remitted or shortened, it will be made certain by the event. If the previous sentence is shortened by a reversal of the judgment or a pardon, it then expires; and then, by its terms, the sentence in question takes effect as if the previous one had expired by lapse of time. Nor will it make any difference that the previous judgment is reversed for error. It is voidable only, and not void; and, until reversed by a judgment, it is to be deemed of full force and effect; and, though erroneous and subsequently reversed on error, it is quite sufficient to fix the term at which another sentence shall take effect.' See also Dolan's Case, 101 Mass. 219, 223. In these views we concur."

Not only in Blitz v. United States were cumulative sentences imposed, but such was also the judgment of the court in Re Henry, 123 U. S. 872, 31 L. ed. 174, and in Re Mills, 135 U. S. 263, 34 L. ed. 108, and in other cases that might be referred to. And, while the authority to pronounce such judgment was not made a specific question in the cases, it was perfectly apparent in the cases that such practice had been pursued, and the Supreme Court of the United States, according to its own rules, reserves the right to "notice a plain error not assigned or specified." And, if the courts of the United States be without authority to pronounce cumulative sentences upon convictions of separate offenses, the error was so vital and so obvious in the cases that the court would certainly have felt called upon to notice it in the interest of the accused. Montana R. Co. v. Warren, 137 U. S. 848, 34 L. ed. 681.

And in Williams v. State, 18 Ohio St. 47, the supreme court of Ohio said: "To hold that, where there are two convictions and judgments of imprisonment at the same term, both must commence immediately, and be executed concurrently, would clearly be to nullify one of them. To postpone the judgment in one case until the termination of the sentence in the other would, if allowable, be attended with obvious inconvenience and expense, without any correspondent benefit to the convict. There is nothing in the statute requiring this, and it is not to be construed so as to defeat or impede the execution of its own provisions as to the punishment of crimes. We think, both upon principle and the weight of authority, that we are required to hold that it is not error, upon a conviction in a criminal case, to make one term of imprisonment commence when another terminates. There is but little force in the objection that the term of the commencement of the second term is contingent and uncertain. It is true that the first term may be ended by a pardon or a reversal of judgment, but its termination will be rendered certain by the event, and then the second sentence, by its terms, takes effect."

And the supreme court of Nebraska, answering a similar objection, and referring to certain cases cited as supporting the objection thus expressed its view: "But in our opinion the great weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that upon conviction of several offenses charged in separate indictments, or in separate counts of the same indictment, the court has power to impose cumulative sentences. See Whart. Crim. Pl. § 910; Bishop, Crim. L. § 953; Kite v. Com., 11 Met. 581; Mims v. State, 26 Minn. 498; State v. Smith, 5 Day. 176, 5 Am. Dec. 132; Re McCormick, 24 Wis. 492, 1 Am. Rep. 197; Re Fry, 8 Mackey, 135; Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 421; State v. Robinson, 40 La. Ann. 780; Parker v. People, 13 Colo. 155, 4 L. R. A. 803; Mills v. Com., 18 Pa. 631; Brown v. Com., 3 Serg. & R. 273; Russell v. Com., 7 Serg. & R. 489; Williams v. State, 18 Ohio St. 46; Eldredge v. State, 37 Ohio St. 191; Bolun v. People, 73 Ill. 488." Re Walsh, 37 Neb. 454.

It is true that cases are to be found holding a contrary doctrine. How far the decisions in such cases may have been influenced by legislation in the particular state we need not now stop to inquire. It is certain that such cases find little or no support in the common law, and certainly none in sound reason. The cases are practically agreed that separate offenses may be included in separate counts of the same indictment. Ingraham v. United States, 155 U. S. 434, 39 L. ed. 213; Pointer v. United States, 151 U. S. 396, 38 L. ed. 208.

It is also a recognized method of procedure to consolidate separate indictments and try them at the same time as one case; and it is not an uncommon thing that the same defendant is convicted of more than one offense at the same term, upon separate indictments and trials. And a rule which denies the court the power to impose cumulative sentences turns the trial and conviction on all the indictments except one into an idle ceremony. It is hardly necessary to say that a rule which leads to such results as this is unsound in principle, and can be supported by no consistent process of reasoning. Under such a doctrine, a defendant convicted of two or a dozen crimes would suffer no greater punishment than a person convicted of one offense, except such difference as the statutory maximum and minimum limits on the sentence might justify. Such a rule finds no justification in law or morals. The other cumbersome and uncertain methods suggested for dealing with the subject would in effect result in complete failure.

Counsel for the petitioner relies with much confidence on People, Tweed, v. Liscomb (Tweed's Case), 60 N. Y. 559, 19 Am. Rep. 211, and authorities cited therein. The doctrine of this case, however, has met with universal disapproval. Mr. Bishop speaks of it as "a doctrine elsewhere never heard of before and generally rejected since." And in a note the author further says: "On the other hand, I have looked into all the cases cited from the books of reports in Tweed's Case and into such others as seemed to afford any promise of instruction, and I find no one, English or American, ancient or modern, which furnishes a precedent, or an authority, or even a dictum, for the conclusion arrived at by the court." 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1327.

And the supreme court of Colorado, in Parker v. People, 13 Colo. 155, 4 L. R. A. 803, said: "The doctrine announced in the Tweed Case has called for the severest criticism from our ablest criminal-law writers, and is contrary to the weight of authority both in England and in this country."

The Tichborne Case was one much considered by the English courts. The writ of error in the case was allowed by the attorney general out of respect to the ruling by the New York court in Tweed's Case. The case went first before the court of appeals, and on further appeal before the house of lords. The question of the soundness of the decision in Tweed's Case was therefore directly before the English courts. The decision was regarded by those courts as somewhat startling, and it was said, in effect, that, while the case might be good as American authority, the law of England was certainly otherwise. The English judges seem to have considered Tweed's Case only, and not to have been aware at that time that the weight of American authority was also against the ruling in that case.

We think the power thus to pronounce cumulative sentences exists in regard to felonies, as well as misdemeanors, although in the case at bar we are dealing with the misdemeanor grade of offense only. Reagan v. United States, 157 U. S. 303, 39 L. ed. 710; Bannon v. United States, 156 U. S. 464, 39 L. ed. 494.

We now come to the question of whether all of the sentences except the first were void for uncertainty. So far as this objection may be rested upon the ground that the second and subsequent sentences do not fix the date of commencement more definitely than as beginning at the expiration of the preceding sentence, the cases already referred to contain a sufficient answer. The real point of objection, however, as we understand counsel for petitioner, is this: That the sentences, except the first, are rendered uncertain by reason of the provisions of § 5544 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1875 (13 Stat. at L. 479), providing for a good-time credit on the sentences of convicts who are chargeable with no misconduct during the time of their imprisonment. The contention is that, as this may or may not be allowed, the precise time when the first or any subsequent sentence will expire, and the sentence next in order begin, cannot be certainly known. This objection is hardly thought to deserve elaborate consideration. There is no uncertainty by reason of this in the judgment and sentence. That is for a definite fixed time; and the statute is mandatory, giving the convict a right to the credit for the good time, provided his conduct has been such as to deserve it; and it is made the positive duty of the warden of the penitentiary, if the conduct of the convict has been good, to enter a certificate on the warrant of commitment showing the fact. The time fixed by the sentence of the court remains just as fixed until the time expires, less the deduction for good time, when the fact whether the sentence is to be cut down is determined by inspection of the certificate on the warrant of commitment. There is practically no uncertainty in this to the ordinary apprehension, except such uncertainty as may exist by reason of doubt as to what the conduct of the convict will be.

The justices of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in answer to a question calling for their opinion by the governor upon a statute similar to the one now in question, said: "The first question is whether this act gives a right to the convict to have his term of imprisonment reduced and shortened by such a scale; or, in other words, whether these provisions of law bear upon the sentence, and shorten the term of imprisonment. We think they do. They afford an assurance of the highest character that, upon condition of good behavior, the convict shall have the promised benefit of an earlier release. We are aware that the words are not explicit that the term of imprisonment shall be reduced, but we think they are equivalent. The words are, 'There shall be a scale of deduction from the term of such convict's sentence.' It appears to be equivalent to an express provision that there shall be a deduction from the term of imprisonment, according to the scale so to be formed. According to this construction, the sentence, which is imposed by force of one law, is modified by the present law; so that, prior to the present, the time of imprisonment would be computed according to the words of the sentence, and be discharged at its termination by lapse of time; under the present, it will terminate by the time declared in the terms of the sentence, diminished by the number of days for which the convict will be entitled to deduction. Such a deduction, especially in the case of the long sentences, when it is one-sixth part of the whole, becomes an essential legal element in the sentence itself by which the convict is held; and the convict, by complying with the terms of the law in maintaining his good conduct, thereby earns a right to the promised benefit. If it be objected that this will render the subsistence of the sentences uncertain, we think not, if the provisions of the act are rightly understood and observed. The scale of deduction is not to depend on any varying or capricious notions which any officers or superintendents of the prison may entertain of the good behavior or good disposition of a convict; it is made to depend upon a fact ascertained by a fixed rule, entered on the journals of the prison, recorded each month, that is, entered in a book permanent in its character, fixed and unchangeable when once entered; these books of record are always accessible, and, although the officers may all change, the record is there." 13 Gray, 619 (Supp.).

And in Re Walsh, supra, the supreme court of Nebraska said: "This court has held that, where a person has been convicted of several distinct misdemeanors, it is proper for the court to impose a separate sentence upon each offense of which the defendant is found guilty (Burrell v. State, 25 Neb. 581); and we know of no reason why the same rule should not apply in convictions for felonies. Where a cumulative sentence is imposed in case a person is convicted of several distinct offenses, the judgment should not fix the day on which each successive term of imprisonment should commence, but should direct that each successive term should begin at the expiration of the previous one (Johnson v. People, 83 Ill. 431); and this for the obvious reason that the prior term of imprisonment may be shortened by the good behavior of the defendant, by executive clemency, or by a reversal of the judgment. In which event the succeeding sentence would then take effect, in case it provided that the term of imprisonment should commence at the termination of the previous one."

If the prisoner's argument were good, it would result that a statute enacted from motives of kindness to him would have the practical effect, to a very large extent, of defeating the administration of the criminal law. The courts must not be expected, upon suggestion of merely speculative difficulties, to announce a rule which would lead to such surprising results as this. So, without further observations upon this branch of the case, we pass to the contention made upon the last clause of § 5480 of the Revised Statutes, upon which the indictments in this case are predicated. The clause is in this language: "The indictment, information, or complaint may severally charge offenses to the number of three, when committed within the same six calendar months; but the court thereupon shall give a single sentence, and shall proportion the punishment especially to the degree in which the abuse of the postoffice establishment enters as an instrument into such fraudulent scheme and device."

The prisoner's argument is that as only three separate offenses may be included in one indictment within the same six calendar months, and in case of conviction only one sentence, the consolidation of the eight indictments had the effect to make but one case, and in effect one indictment, and that the court could, under this provision of the act, pronounce but one sentence upon a conviction in the consolidated cases, and that all the sentences except the first are therefore absolutely void. The petition, with the papers attached thereto, does not state or suggest that any such question was made or decided by the court of original jurisdiction in which the cases were tried and the sentences pronounced. The objection seems not to have been taken by motion to quash, to compel an election, by plea, request for instruction, or otherwise; and the question is apparently attempted to be raised for the first time in this collateral proceeding. It is well settled that the writ of habeas corpus cannot be made to perform the office of a writ of error, and that the inquiry in such proceeding is not whether there is error in the proceeding and judgment, but whether the judgment is a nullity. It would seem that, in any view of this question, the court has jurisdiction to pronounce such sentence as the law authorized; and, if the judgment of the court was erroneous, it could only be corrected in a direct proceeding by writ of error. The proceeding involved merely an interpretation of the law and the application thereof to the facts of the petitioner's case, and this included a determination of the question whether the effect of consolidation was as the prisoner insists. As we prefer, however, to rest our judgment on other grounds, we do not find it necessary to make a ruling upon this question. The main point in this contention, that the effect of consolidation was to make but one case of all the indictments, is an erroneous conception of the law.

In Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 427, the court observed: "The act authorizing the joinder of offenses in one indictment, and a consolidation of separate indictments for distinct offenses, was intended to promote the speedy and economical administration of justice in such cases, in the interest both of the government and the defendant, and not practically to merge two or more distinct offenses into one for the benefit of the latter." See also Re Haynes, 80 Fed. Rep. 771; Bishop, Crim. Proc. 4th ed. §§ 421, 1042, 1045; Parker v. People, 18 Colo. 155, 4 L. R. A. 808; Williams v. State, 18 Ohio St. 47.

Indeed, it would seem to require no reasoning to show that if joining separate offenses in the same indictment does not make them one offense, so as to require but one sentence, a fortiori a consolidation, for the purpose of trial, of separate indictments charging distinct offenses, would not have this effect. So, the very basis on which the petitioner's contention in this respect rests falls to the ground. If petitioner's counsel means by the argument to insist that there can be but one punishment for all offenses committed by a person under this statute within one period of six calendar months, the reply is that it was otherwise held in Re Henry, 128 U. S. 374, 81 L. ed. 175. In that case the court said: "We have carefully considered the argument submitted by counsel in behalf of the petitioner, but are unable to agree with him in opinion that there can be but one punishment for all the offenses committed by a person under this statute within any one period of six calendar months. As was well said by the district judge on the trial of the indictment: 'The act forbids, not the general use of the postoffice for the purposes of carrying out a fraudulent scheme or device, but the putting in the postoffice of a letter or packet, or the taking out of a letter or packet from the postoffice, in furtherance of such a scheme. Each letter so taken out or put in constitutes a separate and distinct violation of the act.' It is not, as in the case of Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 80 L. ed. 658, a continuous offense, but it consists of a single isolated act, and is repeated as often as the act is repeated. It is, indeed, provided that three distinct offenses, committed within the same six months, may be joined in the same indictment; but this is no more than allowing the joinder of three offenses for the purposes of a trial. In its general effect this provision is not materially different from that of § 1024 of the Revised Statutes, which allows the joinder in one indictment of charges against a person 'for two or more acts or transactions of the same class of crimes or offenses,' and the consolidation of two or more indictments found in such cases. Under the present statute, three separate offenses, committed in the same six months, may be joined, but not more, and, when joined, there is to be a single sentence for all. That is the whole scope and meaning of the provision, and there is nothing whatever in it to indicate an intention to make a single continuous offense, and punishable only as such, out of what, without it, would have been several distinct offenses, each complete in itself." See also Durland v. United States, 161 U. S. 815, 40 L. ed. 712.

It may be further observed that, if the indictments consolidated for the purpose of trial laid the date of all of the twenty-four offenses as within the same six calendar months, the proof of the offense in the ordinary case need not correspond in day and year with the allegation. Any time within the statute of limitations would be sufficient, and as the statute in its terms, like § 1024, is a mere regulation of procedure, it could hardly be maintained that this rule of the common law is changed or affected by the statute. So, the inquiry whether all the offenses were within the same six months would resolve itself into a question of fact rather than one of law. It was entirely competent, according to the Henry Case, to charge the petitioner with twenty-four separate offenses committed within the same six calendar months in eight separate indictments containing three counts each; and upon conviction the court might pronounce eight sentences, one on each indictment, just as was done in the case at bar, and the judgments would be neither erroneous nor void.

Another and the last objection to be noticed is to the action of the court in the order consolidating the indictments. We think it is clear that this inquiry is addressed to a question of error in the proceeding and judgment, and not to the question whether the judgment and sentence are void, as without jurisdiction and authority. Ex parte Parks, 98 U. S. 18, 23 L. ed. 787; United States v. Pridgeon, 158 U. S. 48, 88 L. ed. 681; Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U. S. 502, 40 L. ed. 787; Re Frederick, 149 U. S. 70, 37 L. ed. 653; Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1410. This question could be examined only on writ of error, and in that mode only after exception duly taken and reserved in the court below. Bucklin v. United States, 159 U. S. 685, 40 L. ed. 806; Logan v. United States, 144 U. S. 263, 36 L. ed. 429.

We conclude, therefore, that there was no error in the judgment of the court below denying the writ, and the same is accordingly affirmed.

ARKANSAS CITY.

George E. HOPPER, Receiver, etc., Appl.,
v.

ARKANSAS CITY et al.

1. A city of the second class in Kansas has power to contract with a private party for the construction and operation of waterworks and for the payment of rent for the use of hydrants, and to grant to such a party the use, not exclusive, of its streets for the purpose of laying pipes to conduct the water.
2. In the construction of the statutes of a state which measure the powers and liabilities of its political organizations Federal courts uniformly follow the interpretation of the highest judicial tribunal of the state, where no question of general or commercial law or of right under the United States Constitution or laws is involved.
3. The invalidity of the exclusive grant by a city of the right to use its streets to conduct water to its inhabitants is no defense to an action for rent which the city has promised to pay the grantee for the use of hydrants after the works have been constructed according to the contract and have been accepted by the city.
4. The remainder of a divisible contract of a municipal corporation may be enforced, although part of such contract is ultra vires, but neither malum in se nor malum prohibitum, unless it appears from a consideration of the entire agreement that it would not have been made independently of the part which is void.
5. No one who does not infringe or threaten to infringe the exclusiveness of a grant of the right to use the streets of a city for water pipes can be heard to allege its invalidity because of its exclusiveness after the works have been constructed and the contract has been substantially performed by the grantee.
6. The rule that the members of the legislative body of a city may not so act or contract as to deprive their successors of the unimpaired exercise of the legislative or governmental power does not apply to the exercise of the business or proprietary powers of the municipality, such as the power to contract for waterworks, but in the exercise of such power the city is governed by the same rules as a private corporation or individual, and may contract for terms longer than the duration of the terms of office of the members of its legislative body.

7. A city of the second class under the power given by Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, § 7185, to contract for and procure the construction of waterworks, may contract for such construction and lease of hydrants for a term exceeding the single year during which the members of its council hold office.
8. A court cannot declare void a contract for the term of twenty-one years, made by a city in the exercise of discretionary power given by the legislature to determine the length of the term of such contract.
9. An ordinance which does not receive the votes of a majority of the members elect of a city council is defeated, under Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, § 765.
10. A contract may be made upon motion or by resolution by a city council under statutes authorizing it to contract, but not requiring an ordinance therefor.
11. The presentation to a city council in open session by a private party named as grantee in a defeated ordinance of a written acceptance of the terms of the ordinance, and a bond to construct waterworks accordingly, the construction of the work and location of the hydrants by such grantee under direction of the city council, the actual acceptance and use of the works by the city when completed, and the passage by the council of a formal resolution accepting such works,—constitute a binding contract for the construction and operation of the works according to the terms of such ordinance between the city and the grantee therein.
12. No one may to the damage of another deny the truth of representations by which he has purposely or carelessly induced the latter to change his situation.
13. A city is estopped to defeat a recovery for rent of hydrants as against bondholders who loaned money on a mortgage of the plant and income of waterworks built under the direction and accepted by formal resolution of the city council and completed according to the terms of a defeated ordinance, where the city has paid rents without protest for fourteen months, either on the ground that there was no contract or that it had no power for the term mentioned in the ordinance to grant the exclusive right to the use of its streets for water pipes. Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

These are appeals from a decree of foreclosure of a trust deed upon the waterworks in the city of Arkansas City, in the state of Kansas. The Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, the trustee in the deed and the complainant in the foreclosure suit, appeals, because the court below adjudged by its decree that the city of Arkansas City was not bound to pay the rentals for hydrants, which it undertook to pay by the terms of the contract with the mortgagor, under which the works were constructed, and in reliance upon which the money secured by the mortgage was loaned. George E. Hopper, the receiver appointed in the foreclosure suit, appeals, because the court below adjudged by this decree that, although the city had used 179 hydrants under this contract during the receivership, it was bound to pay no rental for more than 50 thereof.

The city of Arkansas City is a city of the second class under the laws of the state of Kansas. On December 28, 1885, that city undertook to pass its ordinance No. 27, to induce the construction of waterworks in that city, for the purpose of supplying the city and its inhabitants with water for public and domestic purposes. The statutes of the state of Kansas declare that no ordinance of such a city shall be valid unless a majority of the members elect of the city council vote in favor thereof on a call of the yeas and nays, and their vote is entered on the journal by the clerk. Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, § 765. The city council of this city consisted of eight members, but only seven were present when this ordinance was put to a vote, and only four voted in its favor. It was, however, declared adopted; was approved by the mayor; was accepted by the Interstate Gas Company, to which it granted the franchise to construct and operate the waterworks; the works were constructed under its provisions at an expense of thousands of dollars; the $150,000 secured by the trust deed was loaned by the bondholders, now represented by the bank, in reliance upon this ordinance; and the city paid the rentals it promised to pay by it until October, 1891.

The provisions of this ordinance that are material to the issues in this case are these:

By § 1 the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, are authorized to use the streets of the city to lay pipes for the conveyance of water in and through the city for the use of the city and its inhabitants.

"Sec. 2. That said Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, shall have the exclusive privilege of laying down pipes for conveying water in said city for the use of said city and inhabitants for the term of twenty-one (21) years from the date of the passage of this ordinance; provided that the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, shall within sixty (60) days from the approval of this franchise, establish the best and most suitable place within the western portion of this city for the source of water supply, and submit this selection to the mayor and city council for their approval, and have the said works completed and in successful operation within eight months of such approval, and shall keep and maintain such system of waterworks with all future additions and extensions in successful operation thereafter during the term of franchise, unavoidable accidents or delays consistent with ordinary precaution only excepted.

"Sec. 3. That said Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, shall erect within the corporate limits of the city of Arkansas City, Kansas, a complete system of waterworks of sufficient capacity to furnish at all times all the water necessary for use in said city for the prompt extinguishment of fires and for sprinkling and other public and domestic purposes, and shall at all times make all additions and extensions necessitated by the increased demand.

"Sec. 4. That said Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, shall at the most suitable place erect the necessary buildings and appliances for such system of waterworks, and shall erect and put up a standpipe of the dimensions of ten (10) feet diameter and one hundred and fifteen (115) feet high; there shall be two (2) duplex pumps of the most approved pattern capable of furnishing 1,000,000 gallons of water per day of twenty-four hours, also two boilers of best construction and so arranged and built that they may be fired and used separately or together and each of sufficient power to run both pumps at the same time with easy firing, and provide everything found indispensable and desirable for a complete and successful plant of water supply.

"Sec. 5. Starting from these works the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, shall lay down and maintain standard iron mains of at least three and one-half (3½) miles in length, said pipe to be of such dimensions as hereinafter set forth, and sufficient to secure at all times and at any and all places within said 3½ miles of sufficient water supply, as well for public as domestic use, and the said Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, shall erect without cost to the city, fifty (50) double-discharge fire hydrants or any number of above said amount as may be ordered by the city at such points and places as the proper authorities of the city of Arkansas City may designate and shall connect such fire hydrants with the system of mains, provided that whenever the additional hydrants so ordered shall necessitate an extension of the mains beyond the 3½ miles the number of hydrants so ordered or the private consumption to be secured or jointly are sufficient to justify the additional outlay.

"Sec. 6. That the size of the mains shall be as follows: Starting out from the works there shall be not less than ten (10) inch pipe extending to Summit street, there shall be seventeen hundred (1,700) feet of eight (8) inch pipe laid in Summit street and connecting with the 10-inch main; there shall be twenty-two hundred and eighty (2,280) feet of eight (8) inch main laid as the city council may direct; the balance of the 3½ miles and any further extensions to be of any size not less than 4 inches in diameter laid as the city may direct; all pipes to be of the dimensions stated interior measure, and all the mains to be of standard cast iron and no mains to be laid at any time less than 4 inches interior diameter; the standpipe to be of boiler iron and to be placed on a solid foundation of masonry laid in cement.

"Sec. 7. That the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns shall at the request of any citizens; without unnecessary delay, put down the necessary pipes, and connect them with their system of mains to supply the property of said citizens with water for all domestic purposes under such conditions and at such annual rents as shall be agreed upon between the city council and the Interstate Gas Company before the expiration of the sixty days granted above for the establishing of water source, but the Interstate Gas Company its successors or assigns, may make with large consumers, such as railroads, hotels, mills, breweries, factories and others, special rates as they may deem proper, the cost of the connections to be borne by the respective citizens.

"Sec. 8. The Gas Company shall repair damages to the streets caused by laying or operating its mains.

"Sec. 9. The city of Arkansas City, by its mayor and city council for and in consideration of the obligations imposed on the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, by the foregoing sections, hereby agree to, and contract with the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, to accept the fifty (50) hydrants stipulated in § 5 of this ordinance for the use of the city of Arkansas City as soon as the same are erected, connected with the water mains, and supplied with water, and from that day to pay the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, the sum of sixty dollars ($60) United States currency per annum for each and every such fire hydrant above enumerated as well as for every additional hydrant in excess of said number during the term of this contract; . . . provided, however, that the mayor and the city council of the city of Arkansas City, Kansas, shall not be bound to accept such 50 hydrants for the use of the city before a thorough test is made to prove that the works erected by the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns, under this ordinance are in perfect working order and are able to throw simultaneously four (4) streams of water from any four hydrants to be designated by the mayor and city council through 100 feet of 2½ inch rubber hose and 1 inch ring nozzle at least sixty-five (65) feet high from standpipe alone and eighty (80) feet high by direct pressure of pumps."

"Sec. 17. That the Interstate Gas Company shall execute a good and sufficient bond in the penal sum of $5,000 conditioned for the faithful completion of works as specified in § 2, said bond to be subject to the approval of the mayor and to be void after the acceptance of the works as set forth in § 9."

"Sec. 23. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after its publication once in the Arkansas City Traveler, and its acceptance in writing by the Interstate Gas Company, its successors or assigns."

On February 12, 1886, the gas company, the grantee named in this ordinance, submitted its selection of water supply for the works, pursuant to § 2, to the mayor and council of the city, for their approval, and the council by vote approved the selection. At the same time the gas company presented its written acceptance of the ordinance and the bond required by § 17 thereof, and these were received by the council in open session. On September 12, 1886, the gas company offered to extend the waterworks by the addition of 50 extra hydrants, making the whole number of hydrants 100, at one half the rental named in the original ordinance for two years, and to furnish schoolhouses and city buildings free, and this offer was accepted by vote of the city council. The gas company constructed these waterworks during the summer of 1886, and on September 17 of that year had completed them ready for operation in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance. On January 17, 1887, a committee of the city council made the following report to that body:

To the Honorable Mayor and City Council,
Arkansas City, Kansas—
Gentlemen:

Your committee on waterworks hereby beg leave to report: That the Interstate Gas Company have finished the system of waterworks contracted for with this city under ordinance No. 27, to the full satisfaction of your committee, and that the test required under said ordinance was successfully made. The Interstate Gas Company has, in our opinion, carried out its contract faithfully and conscientiously, and the works are acknowledged to be an ornament and a valuable permanent improvement for our city. We therefore beg leave to submit the following resolution, viz.: That the waterworks erected by the Interstate Gas Company under ordinance No. 27 be, and are hereby, accepted by the city; said acceptance to date from Oct. 1, 1886, the same having been finished and ready for operating since Sept. 17, 1886; and that the Interstate Gas Company, its successors and assigns, be, and are hereby, released from the bond and from all liabilities under such ordinance, as far as the construction of such works is concerned.

[Signed]

C. G. Thompson,
A. A. Davis,
C. T. Thuston.

On the same day the city council adopted the resolution recommended by this report. After the waterworks had been completed and put into operation, the Arkansas City Water Company, a corporation of the state of Kansas, succeeded to all the property, franchises, and rights of the Interstate Gas Company in these waterworks, and thereafter, on November 25, 1887, that company made the trust deed here in suit to the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, to secure the payment of 150 of its bonds of $1,000 each, dated October 1, 1886, payable October 1, 1906, with interest at 6 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually. By this deed the water company not only conveyed all the real estate, water mains, pipes, franchises, and property pertaining to these waterworks, but it assigned to the bank all its claims and demands that should arise during the existence of any part of the mortgage debt against the city of Arkansas City under ordinance No. 27, and authorized the bank to collect, receive, and receipt for all sums of money so accruing from the city of Arkansas City for the rent of fire hydrants; and, in case of default in the payment of the semiannual interest upon the bonds for the space of six months, it authorized and empowered the bank, on the usual terms, to declare the whole debt due, and to "take possession of the property and franchises herein mortgaged or covenanted so to be and by itself and agents, or by a receiver of a court appointed in a suit for the enforcement of this lien, or a suit for such possession, hold, use, and operate the same for the equal benefit of the holders of all of the said bonds, and receive the income and profits therefrom." This trust deed also provided that $100,000 in amount of the $150,000 of bonds secured by it should be used forthwith for the retirement of bonds to that amount, which had already been issued by the water company, and that no part of the remaining $50,000 should be issued except to pay for extensions of water mains and betterments connected therewith; to be made by the water company after September 24, 1887, and then only on the certificate of the president and secretary of the water company, satisfactory to the trustee, to the effect that the extensions and betterments had been made, and "that the revenue of the said water company from the city hydrant rental from hydrants on the said extensions amounts to at least enough to pay the interest upon the amount of bonds to be so issued." On September 12, 1887, the water company made a proposition to the city council to "extend the present system of mains 4½ miles and to erect 50 additional fire hydrants at such prices [points] as may be designated by your waterworks committee provided the city will agree to pay for said 50 hydrants the sum of $30 per annum each for a term of five years, after which time the rentals shall be and remain $60 per annum as provided in the original franchise. Time of rental to date from time said hydrants are erected and connected with the main and supplied with water as provided in ordinance No. 27." And the city council accepted the proposition, and ordered the mains laid and the hydrants erected. On November 21, 1887, the city council ordered that the water main be extended on First street to accommodate citizens on that street, and that a hydrant be located at the intersection of First avenue and Third street, provided the waterworks company would furnish the hydrants on the same terms as those last ordered. On May 21, 1888, the city council by vote accepted 54 hydrants erected under the last two orders. About June 1, 1888, the following certificate, signed by the city clerk and sealed with the official seal of the city, was presented to the bank:

STATE OF KANSAS, }
COUNTY OF COWLEY, } ss.
CITY OF ARKANSAS CITY.

I, J. W. Heck, city clerk in and for said city, hereby certify that 54 city hydrants have been erected since September 24, 1887, and put in, in accordance with the order of the city council of said city made on September 12, 1887, and connected with the extensions of water mains of the Arkansas City Water Company, 34 L. R. A.

and supplied with water and accepted by the mayor and city council of said city, in accordance with the provisions of § 9 of the original franchise of said company, by a resolution passed May 21, 1888, as follows: 'A motion was offered, seconded, and carried, that the city council accept 54 hydrants under the last order, on conditions that six (6) of the double hydrants be redistributed under the directions of the waterworks committee.' And I hereby further certify that from each of said hydrants said water company is now earning and will receive from the said city of Arkansas City a rental of $30 per annum making the total revenue of the said company from the city hydrant rental from hydrants on said extensions, $1,620 per annum. Witness my hand and official seal this 24th day of May, 1888.

[Seal]

J. W. Heck, City Clerk.

Upon the presentation of this certificate, the bank issued 27 bonds under the provisions of the trust deed to which we have referred, and they were sold by the mortgagor, and are now held by the purchasers or their assignees. Under like resolutions of the council further extensions of the mains were made, 26 more hydrants were erected, and accepted by the city council, and on similar certificates of the city, the remaining 23 bonds were issued by the bank, and sold by the mortgagor in like manner. The whole number of hydrants erected was 180. One was afterwards removed, and 179 hydrants have been in use by the city up to the time of the final hearing in this case. The hydrants on the extensions of the original plant were placed on mains 4 inches in diameter, laid as the city directed, pursuant to the provisions of § 6 of the ordinance. These hydrants were all located and erected under the direction of the city council. The city clerk testified that "there was a water committee for that purpose, and, as the people came in and asked for water, it was referred to the water committee to look the matter over, and the hydrants would be located upon the direction of the waterworks committee." On August 1, 1891, the city council of Arkansas City by a unanimous vote passed a resolution to support the proposition to purchase of the water company the waterworks and all its rights and franchises "for the sum of $190,000; to take the property as above, subject to the mortgage of $150,000, and issue and deliver $40,000 of ten-year bonds, at 6 per cent, or $40,000 of thirty-year bonds at 5 per cent, of $1,000 each, with semiannual interest coupons thereto attached. The waterworks to pay the interest on the mortgage of $150,000 to August 1, 1891, and Arkansas City to pay hydrant rental to same date. Waterworks to receive all moneys to said August 1, and city to receive all moneys after that date, less operating expenses." The proposition contained other provisions that are not material here. Those we have recited were accepted by the water company; and pursuant thereto it conveyed the property to the city subject to the mortgage to the bank by a warranty deed, dated September 16, 1891, which expressly described and excepted the mortgage of $150,000, evidenced by the trust deed, from the covenant against encumbrances. On the same date, in consideration of the $40,000 paid to it by the city, the water company executed and delivered to the city a written consent that ordinance No. 27 might be repealed, and that the water company surrendered all "rights in, to, or under said ordinance and said contract to the city of Arkansas City, Kansas." On September 18, 1891, the city council passed ordinance No. 804, which, by its terms, repealed ordinance No. 27. The city issued its bonds for $40,000, delivered them to the water company, and took possession of the waterworks under the latter's deed. No rental for any of the hydrants has been paid by the city since October 1, 1891, and the interest on the $150,000 secured by the trust deed has been in default since April 1, 1892. On October 18, 1892, the bank filed a bill in the court below and subsequently made an amendment thereto. The bill and the amendment contained sufficient allegations to entitle the bank to a foreclosure of the trust deed, to the appointment of a receiver, and to a decree that, as against the trustee and the bondholders, the contract to pay rental according to the terms of ordinance No. 27 is binding upon the city, and that ordinance No. 804, which attempted to repeal it, is void. In this suit the bank made the Arkansas City Water Company and the city of Arkansas City defendants, and on the application of the complainant George E. Hopper was, on December 12, 1892, appointed receiver of the waterworks, and authorized "to operate said waterworks and property, to receive and collect from the various parties using the water from said works, and to receive and collect from the defendant, the city of Arkansas City, the hydrant rental due from said city for the use of said water." To the bill of the complainant in this case the Arkansas City Water Company interposed no answer. The city answered, and interposed several defenses, which were properly overruled by the court below, and will not be noticed. It interposed three defenses that were ultimately sustained by the decree. They were that the original contract between the water company and the city was void, (1) because by it the city attempted to grant to a private corporation an exclusive right to furnish the city and its inhabitants with water; (2) because by it the city attempted to grant to a private corporation the right to furnish the city and its inhabitants with water for twenty-one years, and to bind the city to pay rental for it for that time; and (3) because the ordinance on which the contract was based was not passed, but was rejected, by the city council. On May 21, 1894, after the case had been heard, and after a decree had been rendered that the trust deed should be foreclosed, that the city should pay to the receiver the rental fixed by ordinance No. 27 for fifty hydrants from October 1, 1891, until the further order of the court, and that the complainant or the receiver might make further application for the payment of additional hydrant rentals, the receiver made a motion that the court make an additional order that the city pay to the receiver the rental fixed by the ordinance for all hydrants used by the city from the date of its appointment to that time. A large amount of testimony was taken upon this motion relative to the efficiency of the additional hydrants, from which it fairly appears that these hydrants have all been supplied with all the water that will pass through the pipe on which they were located by direction of the city council, but that, owing solely to the size of the pipe and the location of the hydrants, they will not stand the test prescribed by § 9 of the original ordinance as a condition precedent to the acceptance of the 50 hydrants first erected, although on the average they will throw the streams of water about one half as high as prescribed by that test. The testimony was undisputed that the city had used the water from all these hydrants during all this time, and that the supply was ample for sprinkling and all domestic and public purposes except the extinguishment of fire. Upon this evidence the court below held that the city was not liable to pay anything for the use of the 129 additional hydrants. The court then entered a decree to the effect that the trust deed should be foreclosed, and that the tangible property constituting the waterworks should be sold to pay the mortgage debt; that the city should pay $60 a month rental for each of the 50 original hydrants as long as it continued to use the water from them, but that it was not liable to pay to the receiver any rental for the use of the water from the 129 additional hydrants; that no contract based on ordinance No. 27 was made between the city and the Interstate Gas Company, and that, if it had been made, it would have been void, because it was beyond the powers of the city, and that the city was not liable to pay for the use of the water from any of the hydrants connected with the waterworks for any longer time than it chose to use the same. This is the decree which these appeals challenge.

The common council of defendant city does not possess the power to grant a franchise or make a contract with a private corporation, granting the exclusive right to supply water for public and domestic use for a period of twenty-one years, and it cannot bind subsequent councils to continue to receive the services to be performed by such private corporation and to continue to pay for such services.

The things that made this contract claimed by the appellant invalid are: First, that it was never made; second, that the council had no power to make it; third, that it is unlawful and would be unlawful if executed in form.

No equitable estoppel can ever arise in behalf of one claiming under an unlawful agreement; neither can a contract that never existed and that would be unlawful if it existed, be ratified.

In the attempt to make the contract in question in this case, and grant the franchise, as provided for in so-called ordinance No. 27, the city was not engaged in a purely private enterprise, was not contracting with reference to its own property, but was attempting to engage in a public enterprise through its governmental functions, and the franchise attempted to be granted, the city was without power to grant.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The effect of the decree in this case is that the city is not liable to pay the rental promised by it for the use of the waterworks, constructed by a private corporation, and accepted and used by the city for many years under a supposed contract, (1) because the city had no power to vest in the private corporation the exclusive right to the use of its streets for the purpose of laying pipes to conduct water to itself and its inhabitants, (2) because it had no power to grant the right to use its streets for that purpose for the term of twenty-one years, and (3) because the ordinance which expressed the terms of the supposed contract was not originally passed by the vote of a majority of the members elect of the city council.

May a municipality obtain and accept the use of expensive waterworks under a contract by which it covenants to pay annual rentals therefor, and to grant an exclusive privilege to use its streets for that purpose, and escape the performance of all its covenants, because it was beyond its power to make the privilege which it granted exclusive? This is the first question presented in this case. Paragraph 7185 of the General Statutes of Kansas of 1889, which was in force when the contract here in question was made, provided "that cities of the first, second, and third class of the state of Kansas are hereby granted full power and authority on behalf of such cities respectively to contract for, and procure, waterworks to be constructed for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of such cities with water for domestic use, the extinguishment of fires and for manufacturing and for other purposes."

It is settled by repeated decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of the state of Kansas that under this and other sections of the statutes of that state a city of the second class has authority to grant a franchise to a person or a corporation to establish waterworks to furnish the city and its inhabitants with water, to grant the privilege of using its streets to a private corporation for such a purpose, and to agree to pay rental to it for the use of its hydrants. Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, §§ 787, 817, 1401, 1402, 7185-7190; Wood v. National Waterworks Co. 38 Kan. 596; Burlington Waterworks Co. v. Burlington, 43 Kan. 725; Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, 46 Kan. 686; Manley v. Emlen, Id. 655; Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, 48 Kan. 99, 101, 15 L. R. A. 854. These decisions conclude this question here. When no question of general or commercial law, and no question of right under the Constitution and laws of the nation, are involved, the Federal courts uniformly follow the construction of the Constitution and laws of a state given by its highest judicial tribunal. This rule is adhered to with marked tenacity in the construction of state statutes, which measure the powers and liabilities of political and municipal organizations of a state. Madden v. Lancaster County, 27 U. S. App. 528, 538, 12 C. C. A. 566, 570, and 65 Fed. Rep. 183, 192, and cases cited; Detroit v. Osborne, 135 U. S. 492, 499, 84 L. ed. 260, 262.

This city, then, had the power to grant to the gas company the privilege of using its streets for water pipes, and it had power to rent hydrants of that company, when this contract was made. For the purposes of this discussion, we shall concede that it had no power to make the privilege of the gas company to use its streets exclusive, because such a grant tends to create a monopoly. The general rule is that the legislature alone has the power to make exclusive grants of this character, and that this authority does not vest in the municipality, unless it is expressly granted to it by its charter. It will be further conceded that, if a grant of a similar privilege in its streets, not exclusive, had been subsequently made by this city to another corporation, and that corporation was about to proceed to construct another system of waterworks in this city, neither the gas company nor the city itself could maintain a bill to enjoin such proceedings. Since it was beyond the powers of the city to make the grant of the privilege exclusive, that portion of the grant would not sustain a bill to restrain the violation of its terms. Jackson County Horse R. Co. v. Interstate Rapid Transit R. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 306, 310; Omaha Horse R. Co. v. Cable Tramway Co. 80 Fed. Rep. 824; Saginaw Gaslight Co. v. Saginaw, 28 Fed. Rep. 529, 540; Long v. Duluth, 49 Minn. 280; Minturn v. La Rue, 64 U. S. 28 How. 435, 16 L. ed. 574; Wright v. Nagle, 101 U. S. 791, 25 L. ed. 921. It was upon the principles we have conceded, and upon the authorities just cited, that the court below seems to have based its conclusion that the exclusiveness of this grant would avoid the entire contract. But these principles and decisions are far from sustaining the position that, after this contract has been substantially performed by the gas company, after the waterworks have been constructed according to its terms, and after the city has accepted and used them for years, and has thus secured the substantial benefits of its grant, it can repudiate all the obligations it had the power to assume, because it assumed one that was beyond its power. The conclusion of Judge Brewer in Jackson County Horse R. Co. v. Interstate Rapid Transit R. Co. supra,—a suit to enjoin the railway company from constructing a second street railway in a city,—at page 310, "that so much of the ordinance as purported to give exclusive privileges to the lessor or complainant was beyond the powers vested in the city of Kansas, and therefore void,"—points to the true solution of the question under consideration. If the gas company stood at the initiation of the execution of this contract defending against its specific performance, on the ground that the city had no power to make its right to use these streets exclusive, that defense might deserve some consideration. But now the gas company has constructed the works. It has executed the contract on its part as far as it has been possible for it to be executed. The exclusiveness of its right to the use of the streets of the city was granted for its sole benefit. If it does not receive this benefit, the city suffers no loss. The only effect upon the city is that it gets the waterworks for a less price than it agreed to pay for them. No reason occurs to us why, under this state of facts, the gas company or its successors may not waive the receipt of the exclusive right, and recover the remainder of the consideration which the city promised to pay it. The grant of this exclusive right was neither immoral nor illegal. It was merely ultra vires. We know of no rule of law nor of morals which relieves the recipient of the substantial benefits of a partially executed contract from the obligation to perform or pay that part of the consideration which he can perform or pay, because the performance of an insignificant portion of it is beyond his powers. On the other hand, the true rule is, and ought to be, the converse of that proposition. It is that when a part of a divisible contract is ultra vires, but neither malum in se nor malum prohibitum, the remainder may be enforced, unless it appears from a consideration of the whole contract that it would not have been made independently of the part which is void. Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winzor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 70, 22 L. ed. 315; Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 395, 38 L. ed. 1014, 1022; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Burlington & N. W. R. Co. 11 Fed. Rep. 1, 4, and cases cited in note at page 12; Saginaw Gaslight Co. v. Saginaw, 28 Fed. Rep. 529, 540. There is no such appearance in this case. There is nothing in this contract, or in the situation of the parties to it when it was made, to indicate that the exclusive character of the right to lay pipes in the streets of this city for the purpose of conveying water constituted a material part of the consideration for the agreement. There is nothing to show that the city of Arkansas City was a large or wealthy city, or that corporations or individuals were crowding forward to compete for the privilege of building its waterworks. Its population did not exceed 15,000, and it was probably much less, for the whole number of votes upon the proposition to buy the waterworks in 1891, five years after this contract was made, was only 292. There is but one reference to this exclusive right in the contract itself, and that consists of the mere word "exclusive" before the word "privilege," in the 2d section of the ordinance. It does not appear that this conterstate Rapid Transit R. Co. supra,—a suit to enjoin the railway company from constructing a second street railway in a city,—at page 310, "that so much of the ordinance as purported to give exclusive privileges to the lessor or complainant was beyond the powers vested in the city of Kansas, and therefore void,"—points to the true solution of the question under consideration. There is but one reference to this exclusive right in the contract itself, and that consists of the mere word "exclusive" before the word "privilege," in the 2d section of the ordinance. It does not appear that this contract would not have been made and performed, just as it has been, if this word, or the section in which it stands, had been omitted from the ordinance. On the other hand, the size and character of the city, the situation of the parties at the time the agreement was made, and the contract itself all point unmistakably to the opposite conclusion. The result is that the fact that this city undertook to grant to the gas company an exclusive right to conduct water in pipes through its streets does not avoid the entire contract, and constitutes no defense to a claim for a recovery upon the other covenants made by the city, after it has received and accepted from the gas company the benefits of the substantial performance of the contract.

Moreover, the city is in no position in this case to insist upon the invalidity of the exclusive character of this grant, if that could avoid its entire contract. The city is not endeavoring to construct waterworks or to lay pipes in its streets in violation of its exclusive grant to the gas company, nor is anyone attempting to do so under its license or by its permission. No one seeks to infringe this exclusive grant. In practical effect it stands unchallenged, and may ever continue to be so. Until it is challenged by the act or endeavor of someone who seeks to infringe it, its validity or invalidity is a moot question, on account of which the courts ought not to, and will not, avoid any part of the contract. No one who does not infringe or threaten to infringe the exclusiveness of the grant in a contract made by a municipality can, after the substantial performance of the contract by the grantee, be heard to say that the contract or the grant is void on account of the exclusive character of the latter. Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, 48 Kan. 99, 112, 15 L. R. A. 854; Dodge v. Council Bluffs, 57 Iowa, 560, 566; Bellevue Water Co. v. Bellevue (Idaho) 35 Pac. 693, 695; East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gaslight & C. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396, 406.

But it is insisted that this contract is beyond the powers of this city, and void, because it grants the right to use the streets of the city to the water company, and promises to pay rental for the hydrants, for twenty-one years. The proposition on which this contention rests is that the members of the city council are trustees for the public; that they exercise legislative powers; and that they can make no grant and conclude no contract which will bind the city beyond the terms of their offices, because such action would circumscribe the legislative powers of their successors, and deprive them of the right to their unrestricted exercise as the exigencies of the times might demand. There are two reasons why this proposition cannot be successfully maintained in this case:

First, it ignores the settled distinction between the governmental, or public, and the proprietary, or business, powers of a municipality, and erroneously seeks to apply to the exercise of the latter a rule which is only applicable to the exercise of the former. A city has two classes of powers,—the one legislative, public, governmental, in the exercise of which it is a sovereignty and governs its people; the other, proprietary, quasi private, conferred upon it, not for the purpose of governing its people, but for the private advantage of the inhabitants of the city and of the city itself as a legal personality. In the exercise of the powers of the former class it is governed by the rule here invoked. In their exercise it is ruling its people and is bound to transmit its powers of government to its successive sets of officers unimpaired. But in the exercise of the powers of the latter class it is controlled by no such rule, because it is acting and contracting for the private benefit of itself and its inhabitants, and it may exercise the business powers conferred upon it in the same way, and in their exercise it is to be governed by the same rules that govern a private individual or corporation. In contracting for waterworks to supply itself and its inhabitants with water, the city is not exercising its governmental or legislative powers, but its business or proprietary powers. The purpose of such a contract is not to govern its inhabitants, but to obtain a private benefit for the city itself and its denizens. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 27; Cincinnati v. Cameron, 33 Ohio St. 386, 387; Safety Insulated Wire & C. Co. v. Baltimore, supra, and cases cited under it.

Second, the powers granted to this city by the legislature of the state of Kansas to contract for and procure waterworks are plenary and unlimited save by the duty to exercise them with reasonable discretion, and it is not the province of a court to contract or clip the legislative grant. The words of that grant are, "full power and authority to contract for and procure waterworks to be constructed for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of such cities with water." It cannot but be clear to all who are familiar with the condition of cities of the second class—cities whose population was between 2,000 and 15,000—in the state of Kansas, in 1872, when this grant was made, that it was not the intention of the legislature of that state to limit the terms of these contracts to the single year during which the terms of office of the members of the city councils continued. The cities were young and poor, but they were ambitious and sanguine. They did not have the ready money to construct the waterworks which the health and comfort of their inhabitants required. It is hardly possible that any individual or corporation could have been induced to expend the thousands of dollars required to construct such works as have been built in this city in consideration of the right to use the streets of the city for that purpose, and of the promise of rental for its hydrants for the limited term of a single year. These facts the members of the legislature must have known and they undoubtedly granted this plenary power to contract for the very purpose of enabling the cities to procure a supply of water for their inhabitants by grants of privileges to private parties to use their streets for that purpose for a reasonable term of years, and by covenants to pay rentals for hydrants for a like term. In any event, the legislature made this grant, and it thereby vested in the mayor and council of the city the right to make such contracts for such terms as, in their discretion, they thought proper. There is nothing in this record to show that the mayor and city council of Arkansas City either exceeded their authority or abused the discretion which the legislature gave them when they fixed the term of the contract in this case at twenty-one years. Ample power was granted to cities of the second class of the state of Kansas by § 7185, Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, to grant the right to the use of their streets to lay water pipes and to pay hydrant rentals for reasonable terms longer than the year during which their mayors and councilmen held their offices, and there is nothing in this record to show that twenty-one years was an unreasonable time for the term of such a contract. Wood v. National Waterworks Co. 88 Kan. 590, 597; Burlington Waterworks Co. v. Burlington, 48 Kan. 725, 728; Manley v. Emlen, 46 Kan. 655; Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, id. 666; Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, 48 Kan. 99, 118, 15 L. R. A. 854; Atlantic City Waterworks Co. v. Atlantic City, 48 N. J. L. 378; Fergus Falls Water Co. v. Fergus Falls, 65 Fed. Rep. 586, 591; Long v. Duluth, 49 Minn. 280; Walla Walla Water Co. v. Walla-Walla, 60 Fed. Rep. 957, 960; Indianapolis v. Indianapolis Gaslight & C. Co. 66 Ind. 396, 407; Vincennes v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. 132 Ind. 114, 124, 125, 16 L. R. A. 485.

If, upon general principles, there was any doubt that the defenses of ultra vires, which have been considered, could not be maintained in this suit, the repeated decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of the state of Kansas upon these questions would compel that conclusion. In Burlington Waterworks Co. v. Burlington, supra, the city of Burlington had granted to the waterworks company the right to use its streets for twenty years, but had reserved the right to buy the works at an appraised value at the end of each five years, and had agreed to pay rental for a certain number of hydrants meanwhile. The supreme court of Kansas said: "In our opinion cities of the second class have the right and the power to provide for supplying themselves and the inhabitants of such cities with water in the manner in which such right and power were exercised in the present case, and in various other ways." 48 Kan. 728.

In Manley v. Emlen, supra, the city of Atchison had made a contract in 1860 with one Watts, by which it granted to him the right to use its streets for the purpose of conducting water through them in pipes for twenty-five years, and had promised to pay rental for certain hydrants during that time. In 1887 the city levied a tax to pay these rentals, and one

Manley brought a suit to enjoin its collection. The supreme court of Kansas said: "In 1860, when the city of Atchison, which was then a city of the second class, provided by ordinance for giving to Sylvester Watts, and to his successors and assigns, the right to furnish water to the city of Atchison and to its inhabitants for compensation, and upon certain terms and conditions, the city certainly had the power to do so and to make a valid contract with Watts for that purpose."

In Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, 46 Kan. 666, 667, 678, the city of Columbus made a contract in 1886 with Long and Doubleday and their assigns, the waterworks company, by which it granted to them the exclusive right to construct and maintain waterworks in that city for ninety-nine years, and promised to pay them $60 a year for the use of each of at least 50 hydrants for the term of twenty-one years. The waterworks were built and accepted under this contract, and the city levied taxes for and paid the rental for the years 1888, 1889, and 1890, but refused to levy any taxes or to pay the rental for the year 1891. The waterworks company applied for a mandamus to compel the city to levy the necessary taxes to pay this rental, and the supreme court sustained its petition, and ordered the mandamus to issue. In Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, 48 Kan. 99, 15 L. R. A. 854, the same waterworks company applied to the court to compel the same city to levy the necessary taxes, to pay the hydrant rental under the same contract for the year 1892, and the city answered that it had refused to receive or use any of the water from these hydrants after August 15, 1891. But the supreme court nevertheless issued the mandamus, and compelled the levy of the tax and the payment of the rental. These decisions conclude the discussion of these questions. Madden v. Lancaster County, 27 U. S. App. 529, 536, 12 C. C. A. 566, 570, and 65 Fed. Rep. 188, 193, and cases cited.

Another objection to the validity of this contract is that ordinance No. 27, which contains the terms of the agreement, was never passed, but was, in fact, defeated, by the city council of Arkansas City because that ordinance did not receive a majority of the votes of the members elect of the council. Let it be conceded that the ordinance did not pass, and that it was defeated when it was presented to the council for action on December 26, 1885. Kan. Gen. Stat. § 765. Does this fact establish the proposition that this ordinance does not express the terms of a contract made between these parties? The ordinance was approved by the mayor. It was spread upon the records of the city council, and it was treated as evidence of the contract between the city and the gas company until after the waterworks had been constructed and accepted, until after the mortgage of $160,000 had been placed upon it, and until after the city had paid rentals for the hydrants under it for more than four years. The ordinance provided (§ 17) that the Interstate Gas Company should give a bond for the faithful completion of the works, as specified in § 2, and that it should take effect on its publication and acceptance in writing by the gas company (§ 23). On February 12, 1886, the gas company presented to the city council, and that body received in open session, its written acceptance of the ordinance, and its bond for the faithful completion of the work. On the same day the city council approved the selection of the water supply made by the gas company, and during the construction of the waterworks its committee located the various hydrants upon the mains. The gas company built and put the waterworks into operation, and on January 17, 1887, that body passed this resolution:

"That the waterworks erected by the Interstate Gas Company under ordinance No 27 be, and are hereby, accepted by the city; said acceptance to date from Oct. 1, 1886, the same having been finished and ready for operation since Sept. 17, 1886; and that the Interstate Gas Company, its successors and assigns, be, and are hereby, released from the bond, and from all liabilities under such ordinance, as far as the construction of such works is concerned."

Was there no contract here? A proposition made by one contracting party and accepted by the other constitutes a contract. It evidences the meeting of their minds upon the terms of their agreement, and binds them both. If ordinance No. 27 had been duly passed, it would have been nothing more than an offer by the city to make the grant and contract upon the terms set forth therein. If, after its passage, it had been accepted and acted upon by the gas company, it would have become an irrevocable contract. Chicago v. Sheldon, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 50, 19 L. ed. 594; New Orleans v. Great Southern Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 40 La. Ann. 41; Com. v. Proprietors of New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray, 889; Kansas v. Corrigan, 86 Mo. 67. It can make no difference in the legal effect of such an acceptance whether the one party or the other makes the offer. If the gas company had offered to enter into a contract with the city on the terms contained in the ordinance, and the city had accepted and acted upon that proposition, the contract would have been as binding and irrevocable. But that was exactly what these parties did. The ordinance stood spread upon the records of the council, but it had never been passed by that body. On February 13, 1887, the gas company filed with the council, and that body received in open session its written acceptance of the terms of the contract set forth in the defeated ordinance, and its bond to complete the waterworks as provided therein. That acceptance and bond constituted as perfect an offer on the part of the gas company to enter into a contract on the terms of that ordinance as it could have made. On January 17, 1887, the city council resolved "that the waterworks erected by the Interstate Gas Company under ordinance No. 27 be and hereby are, accepted by the city." That resolution and the actual acceptance and use of the works by the city, were as perfect and complete an acceptance of this proposition of the gas company as it was possible for the city to have made. It was conclusive evidence that the minds of the parties had met upon the terms of a contract set forth in the ordinance, and from that time forth, if not before, the contract became complete and irrevocable. There is no escape from this conclusion on the ground that the city could offer and accept this contract by ordinance only. The legislature granted to the city full power and authority to contract for the construction of these waterworks, and it nowhere prescribed the mode by which the city should authorize or make the contract. It is common learning that where a statute authorizes action by the legislative body of a city, and does not require such action to be taken by ordinance, it may be taken by a vote upon a motion or by the passage of a resolution. Smalley v. Yates, 36 Kan. 519, 524; Atchison Bd. of Edu. v. De Kay, 148 U. S. 591, 595, 598, 599, 87 L. ed. 573-576; Brady v. Bayonne, 57 N. J. L. 379; State, Courter, v. Newark Bd. of Health, 54 N. J. L. 45, 47, 48. There is nothing in Newman v. Emporia, 82 Kan. 456, in conflict with this rule. That case simply held that where a charter requires certain acts to be done by ordinance, they cannot be done by resolution. Atchison Bd. of Edu. v. De Kay, 148 U. S. 591, 598, 599, 87 L. ed. 573, 575, 576. Nor is there any restriction upon the action of the city council of Arkansas City in entering into this contract in the proviso to § 799 of General Statutes, of Kansas, 1889. Carleton v. Washington, 38 Kan. 726. The result is that the city of Arkansas City made an irrevocable contract with the Interstate Gas Company, the terms of which are evidenced by ordinance No. 27, and that none of the provisions of that contract which are in question in this suit are invalid on the ground that the city exceeded its powers in making the contract.

A single question remains. Is the city liable to pay to the receiver any rental for the use of the 129 hydrants located upon the mains of the waterworks and their extensions after September 1, 1886, under the orders of its council? The bank, the complainant in this suit, insists that the court below erred in considering this question at all in this suit upon the application of the receiver without pleadings, and that its findings and decree in this regard should be reversed on this ground. The majority of the court are of the opinion that the court acted rightly in not allowing a recovery in this suit for any of the extra hydrant rentals, and that the question of the liability of the city for such hydrant rentals should be left to be determined hereafter unaffected by any of the proceedings in this suit, if any person shall hereafter demand against the city a right to such rentals. The writer of this opinion is unable to concur in that view, nor do the majority of the court concur with him in the views expressed in the remainder of this opinion. It seems to him that the contention of the bank that the court erred in considering and determining this question at all without pleadings, on a mere motion of the receiver for an order of the court directing the city to pay the rentals should not now be sustained. It is made for the first time in this court. The course of proceedings in the court below was this: On the motion of the bank that court had rendered a decree which provided that the city should pay to the receiver the rental fixed by the contract on the 50 hydrants ordered by the original ordinance, and that the bank and the receiver might apply to the court for orders for the payment of the rental of the additional hydrants. Under this decree the receiver made an application for such an order by motion. No objection was made to this method of presenting the question. A large amount of testimony was taken, a full hearing was had upon the application, and the court decided it upon its merits. It is true that the record does not, in terms, state that the bank appeared at this hearing, but it does show that the receiver was appointed on its application; that the attorneys of the bank were the attorneys of the receiver; that, as such attorneys, they conducted the examination of the witnesses upon this hearing, and that no objection was interposed by them, or by any of the parties to this suit, to the disposition of this matter made by the court, either because no pleadings had been filed, or on any other ground whatever. The court below would undoubtedly have required pleadings and the framing of issues here, if any party in interest had requested it. The record conclusively shows that no one was surprised upon the trial of this issue by the lack of pleadings, that the attorneys and the parties who participated in it perfectly understood the issues, and that the receiver and the city tried the question in dispute out upon the merits, and obtained its decision. The complainant, whose attorneys, as representatives of the receiver, made the motion for this hearing, and pressed it to a decision, was bound to take notice of these proceedings, and to place its objection to them, if it had any, before the trial court. It could not lie dormant until that court had investigated and decided the issue, and then adopt the decision, if favorable, and repudiate it, if fatal, to its claim. It is now too late for it to present this objection for the first time in this court. Moreover, the question decided by the court below was germane to the issue in this suit, and its decision was necessary to a full determination of the rights of the parties to the suit in the subject-matter of the action. The mortgage provided that, in case of default, the trustee, by itself or a receiver appointed by the court, should take possession of the waterworks, operate them, and collect the income thereof. The bill prayed that the receiver should have power to collect of the city the rentals due under ordinance No. 27. The order appointing the receiver directed him to collect all hydrant rentals due from the city for the use of the water. The question as to the amount of these rentals due arose between the defendant city and the receiver. Perhaps the latter might have brought an action against the defendant to recover these rents, but the necessary parties to such an action were already in the court below, and another suit to determine that question was certainly unnecessary. Possibly, the defendant city might have objected to this method of treating this question, but it did not do so. It consented to its trial by the court below, and now demands its decision here upon the merits. The receiver and the defendant very properly tried the dispute upon its merits before the court, which already had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, and that court heard and decided it. The settled rule in equity is that, "having properly acquired jurisdiction over the subject for a necessary purpose, it was the duty of the court to proceed and do final and complete justice between the parties, where it could as well be done in that court as in proceedings at law." Taylor v. Merchants' F. Ins. Co. 50 U. S. 9 How. 380, 404, 18 L. ed. 187, 192.

I turn to the merits of the question. The city of Arkansas City made a contract with the Interstate Gas Company for the lease of hydrants from the system of waterworks to be constructed by the latter company. The gas company agreed to erect the necessary works, to lay $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles of water pipes of specified dimensions, and to connect 50 hydrants therewith, or any number above that amount that should be ordered by the city council, and to place them wherever the city should direct, "provided, that whenever the additional hydrants so ordered shall necessitate an extension of the mains beyond $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles, the number of hydrants so ordered or the private consumption to be secured or jointly are sufficient to justify the additional outlay." Sections 2, 5. The contract provided that the water pipes on the extensions beyond the $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles should "be of any size not less than 4 inches in diameter, laid as the city may direct." Section 6. The city agreed by the contract to pay the sum of \$80 per annum for each of the first 50 hydrants to be erected, "as well as for every additional hydrant in excess of said number during the term of this contract." Section 9. From time to time, after the original works were erected, the city ordered these works extended, and directed additional hydrants to be erected, or duly accepted offers to extend the works, and to erect additional hydrants made by the gas company, or by its successor, the water company, until there were about thirteen miles of pipes and 179 hydrants in the system. The extensions were made with pipes 4 inches in diameter and each of the additional 129 hydrants was located and erected by the order of, and under the direction of, the city council, and every one of them was duly accepted and used by the city. Some of the orders for these additional hydrants provided that the city would pay but \$30 per annum rent for the first three or five years of their service, and the city paid rent for each of them from the time of their acceptance until the 1st day of October, 1891. Since that day it has continued to use the hydrants as before, but it refused to pay any rent for them on the ground that they were not efficient in extinguishing fires. The evidence on which this claim is based conclusively shows that, if they were not efficient, it was not because the waterworks were not maintained in as efficient a condition as when these hydrants were accepted, but it was solely because the mains on the extensions were too small, and the hydrants were badly located. The city is driven by this evidence to this position: To defend against its liability for these rents, it must maintain that if, on account of the size of the mains and the improper location of the hydrants, they cannot stand the test prescribed by § 9 of the ordinance, as the condition precedent to the acceptance of the original plant and the first 50 hydrants, the city is under no obligation to pay for their use. The evidence was, in effect, that streams of water could be thrown from these hydrants to only about half the height required of the first 50 hydrants by § 9, and upon this ground the court below held that the city was not liable to pay for the use of the additional hydrants. Is this the legal effect of this contract? Could this city order the extension of these 4 inch mains of the water company, $\frac{9}{4}$ miles, and the erection of 120 additional hydrants, under the contract evidenced by ordinance No. 27, accept them all as sufficient and efficient, and after acquiring the benefit of the extension, and paying rent for the hydrants two or three years, continue to use them without any liability to pay for their use? It is undoubtedly true that if, after the construction and acceptance of the extension, and the additional hydrants, they deteriorated in value or usefulness, the damage sustained from that fact might be offset against the rental, and, if they became utterly useless, the damage would be more than if the deterioration was small. But, even in such an event, the city could hardly entirely offset the rental by damage, as long as the extensions supplied sufficient water to the inhabitants for domestic and sprinkling purposes. In such a case, as the city would have obtained the benefits of a substantial performance of the contract, it could not make an absolute defense against the payment of the rental. The complainant would be entitled to its rental less the damage sustained by the failure of the water company to completely perform the contract. German Sav. Inst. v. De La Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. 17 C. C. A. 34, 87, 70 Fed. Rep. 146, 150, and cases cited; Wiley v. Athol, 150 Mass. 426, 435, 6 L. R. A. 342, and cases cited. But this question does not arise in this case. The testimony is undisputed that the hydrants are as efficient and the extensions are as sufficient as they were when the city accepted them, and that their inefficiency results from the fact that the pipe used for the extensions was too small to supply the large number of hydrants located upon them under the direction of the city, and that some of the hydrants were located on dead ends of the mains, where it is impossible to drive a forceful stream through them. Now, how can this fact relieve the city from liability for the rent when it was the city itself that directed the laying of the 4-inch pipe, located the hydrants upon it, accepted the hydrants as sufficient, and obtained the use of most of them for some years at half price?

There is another consideration that must not be overlooked in construing this contract. It is not contended that the extensions and hydrants are not sufficient to furnish all the water required for sprinkling and all domestic purposes and for all public purposes except the extinguishment of fires. Now, the extinguishment of fires in a city is not usually the main inducement for, or the chief benefit of, a system of waterworks. Such a system conduces to the health, comfort, and pleasure of the inhabitants of a city a thousand times where it extinguishes a fire once. I venture to say that it was not so much the need of water to extinguish fires on the streets along this $\frac{9}{4}$ miles of extensions as it was the want of water by the residents upon those streets for domestic purposes that induced the city council to order them. Nor can there be much doubt that they never would have been laid without the contract of the city to pay rental upon these additional hydrants. There are generally many streets in a small city where the private consumption of the water will not warrant the necessary expense of extending the mains, and yet the health and comfort of the inhabitants compel the city to make the extension. In such cases it became necessary for the city under this contract to locate and pay for such a number of hydrants as would yield to the water company a sufficient revenue to warrant the expenditure, even though the hydrants were unnecessary for the extinguishment of fires. That this course might be, and probably would be, pursued, was evidently contemplated by the parties to this contract, for it provided, by § 5 of the ordinance, that, in case extensions were directed, the number of hydrants ordered, or the private consumption, or both, should be sufficient to justify the expense. A careful reading of all the testimony in this case points unmistakably to the conclusion that the real objection to the payment of the rental for these hydrants is that the city now finds that it ordered more hydrants than it is now willing to pay for. But it made its own bargain, and it is no defense to its enforcement that it bought too much, or promised to pay too high a price for its lease.

Bearing in mind now how important a part of the consideration for this rental the supply of water for domestic purposes for the residents along these extensions must have been, and the fact that the supply for those purposes was ample, that the extensions and additional hydrants are as efficient for the extinguishment of fires as they were when the hydrants were accepted, and that the only reason they are not more efficient is because the extensions were made with pipe that was too small and the hydrants were improperly located under the direction and with the approval of the city itself, let us inquire what provision of this contract required the water company to maintain a higher degree of efficiency, or relieved the city from paying for the water it used from these additional hydrants. On this subject the contract provides that the gas company is given the exclusive privilege of laying its pipes in the city to conduct water on condition that it maintains its works and additions in successful operation (§ 2); that it shall erect a complete system of waterworks of sufficient capacity to furnish at all times all the water necessary for use in said city for the prompt extinguishment of fires and for sprinkling and other public and domestic purposes (§ 3); that it shall lay three and one-half miles of pipe of the dimensions specified in the ordinance, sufficient to secure at all places within said three and one-half miles a sufficient water supply, as well for public and domestic use, and shall erect 50 hydrants thereon, and as many more as may be ordered by the city under certain restrictions, and shall place them where the city authorities direct (§ 5); that the pipe used on the extensions may be of any size not less than 4 inches in diameter (§ 6); that for twenty-one years the city will pay the sum of $60 per annum for each of the 50 hydrants required to be placed on the original system "as well as for every additional hydrant in excess of said number during the term of this contract; . . . provided, however, that the mayor and city council of Arkansas City, Kansas, shall not be bound to accept such 50 hydrants for the use of the city before a thorough test is made to prove that the works erected by the Interstate Gas Company, its successors, or assigns, under this ordinance, are in perfect working order and are able to throw simultaneously four (4) streams of water from any 4 hydrants to be designated by the mayor and city council through 100 feet of 2½ inch rubber hose and 1-inch ring nozzle at least sixty-five (65) feet high from standpipe alone and eighty (80) feet high by direct pressure of pumps." These are all the provisions of the contract upon this subject. They have all been substantially performed, except that the additional hydrants will not stand the test prescribed in the proviso just quoted. But there is nothing in that proviso, or elsewhere in the contract, which makes the compliance with that test a condition precedent to the acceptance of, or the payment of the rental for, the additional hydrants. On the other hand, the proviso expressly restricts this test to the first 50 hydrants, and by its very terms excludes all others from it. Moreover, it reads that the city "shall not be bound to accept such 50 hydrants," and, even if it covered the additional hydrants, their acceptance by the city would have waived this proviso. It provided only that the city was not bound to accept them unless they complied with the test. But the city did accept them, and that was an end of the matter, and the liability for the rent accrued. It seems clear, however, upon a view of the entire contract, that this proviso had no reference to the additional hydrants. This conclusion is forced upon the mind by the fact that the proviso is expressly limited by its terms to the original 50 hydrants, by the fact that it is practically impossible to extend such a system of waterworks, as that here in question, nine and one-half miles, with mains only 4 inches in diameter, and with as many large hydrants upon them as were ordered in this case, and then to maintain throughout the efficiency prescribed in this proviso by the fact that the city obtained the use of many of these hydrants from three to five years for one-half the rental of the original 50, and a lower price imports less efficiency, and by the fact that the city ordered the extensions so made and accepted the hydrants so constructed, although they never were more nearly able to comply with the test than they now are. The last consideration alone ought to be conclusive of this question. These parties construed this contract themselves before any controversy arose over it. One party constructed, and the other accepted, under the contract, pipes and hydrants which could not stand the test of § 9 of the ordinance. They thereby themselves held that such test had no relevancy to the extended pipes and additional hydrants, and their view was undoubtedly right. "In an executory contract, and where its execution necessarily involves a practical construction, if the minds of both parties concur, there can be no great danger in the adoption of it by the court as the true one." Chicago v. Sheldon, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 50. 54, 19 L. ed. 594, 596; Topliff v. Topliff, 123 U. S. 121, 181, 80 L. ed. 1110, 1114; Leavitt v. Windsor Land & I. Co. 12 U. S. App. 193, 4 C. C. A. 426, and 54 Fed. Rep. 439, 444.

What, then, was the effect of the acceptance by the city of the extensions and additions to these works and its use of the hydrants since 1887 or 1888, upon its defense to these rentals that the size of the pipe ordered to be laid by it was too small, and that the hydrants located by it were improperly placed? It was absolutely fatal to any such defense. The faults in the construction of these extensions and hydrants were patent. They were apparently due as much to the action of the city as to that of the water company. The acceptance and use for years without protest of a building, a system of buildings, or a plant, under a contract for its construction and lease, is a complete waiver of all patent defects in the location or construction thereof. In National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 10 C. C. A. 653, 666, 62 Fed. Rep. 853, 866, 27 U. S. App. 165, 27 L. R. A. 827, Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for this court, said of a claim by the city for damages in that case on account of the inefficiency of the waterworks furnished by the lessor:

"It [the city] has for many years recognized and accepted this waterworks system as having been constructed in full compliance with the demands of the contract, and it is now too late to repudiate such recognition."

In Burlington Waterworks Co. v. Burlington, 43 Kan. 725, the supreme court of that state held that the city could not defend against an action for the rental of waterworks on the ground that the water was not good after it had accepted the works and the water had been used by the city and its inhabitants for about a year without protest. In Comstock v. Sanger, 51 Mich. 497, 502, the supreme court of that state said of a defense to an action for the price of lumber, that the contracted quantity of the special sizes had not been delivered. "Any difference between what they had a right to demand and what they had actually received was waived by the reception without protest. This is a rule of justice as well as of law. Parker v. Palmer, 4 Barn. & Ald. 387; Chapman v. Morton, 11 Mees. & W. 534; Reed v. Randall, 29 N. Y. 358, 86 Am. Dec. 305; Gaylord Mfg. Co. v. Allen, 53 N. Y. 515; Barton v. Kane, 17 Wis. 38, 84 Am. Dec. 728; Watkins v. Paine 57 Ga. 50. The contract in law had been complied with; and though the performance was not exact, it had been accepted."

There is another and a conclusive reason why this city cannot maintain any of the defenses it has interposed in this suit. It is that it cannot accept the benefits and repudiate the burdens of its contract. It is that it cannot be heard to deny the truth of the representations of the existence and of the execution of this contract, which its records and its conduct have constantly made, and in reliance upon which, the gas company and the water company constructed and extended the waterworks, and the bank and the bondholders loaned their money. No principle is more universal in the jurisprudence of civilized nations, no principle is more equitable in itself, or more salutary in its effects, than that no one may, to the damage of another, deny the truth of statements and representations by which he has purposely or carelessly induced that other to change his situation. This principle is equitable, because it forbids the untruthful or culpably negligent deceiver from profiting by his own wrong, at the expense of the innocent purchaser or contractor who believed him. It is salutary, because it represses falsehood and fraud. Paxon v. Broten, 27 U. S. App. 49, 60, 10 C. C. A. 185, 143, and 61 Fed. Rep. 874, 881; Pence v. Arbuckle, 22 Minn. 417; Cairncross v. Lormer, 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 827, 829; Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 582, 25 L. ed. 618, 620; Faxon v. Paxon, 28 Mich. 159; Kirk v. Hamilton, 102 U. S. 68, 75, 26 L. ed. 79, 81; Evans v. Snyder, 64 Mo. 516. This principle is as applicable to the transactions of corporations as to those of individuals. As Mr. Justice Campbell well said in Zabriske v. Cleveland, C. & O. R. Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 881, 400, 401, 16 L. ed. 488, 497, 498, in which the supreme court held that a corporation was estopped to question the validity of its void guaranty; because it had permitted the circulation of the bonds that carried it: "A corporation, quite as much as an individual, is held to a careful adherence to truth in their dealings with mankind, and cannot, by their representations or silence, involve others in onerous engagements and then defeat the calculations and claims their own conduct had superinduced."

Re Omaha Bridge Cases, 10 U. S. App. 98, 188, 190, 2 C. C. A. 174, 289, 240, and 51 Fed. Rep. 309, 326, 327; Butler v. Cockrill, 20 C. C. A. 122, 73 Fed. Rep. 945.

In a business transaction like that of procuring the construction of waterworks and the use of water for itself and its inhabitants, a municipality is subject to this principle to the same extent as a private corporation. The same rules govern its business transactions that govern the negotiations of private individuals and corporations. Safety Insulated Wire & C. Co. v. Baltimore, 13 C. C. A. 375, 377, 378, 66 Fed. Rep. 140, 148, 144, 25 U. S. App. 166; San Francisco Gas Co. v. San Francisco, 9 Cal. 453, 463, 469, 471; Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, 48 Kan. 99, 113, 15 L. R. The city of Arkansas City spread upon the records of its city council an ordinance, approved by its mayor, which purported to be an offer to the gas company to pay the rentals whose recovery is sought in this suit, in consideration that the company would construct and operate these waterworks. The company accepted the supposed offer, and at the expense of thousands of dollars constructed and operated the works according to the terms of the ordinance, under the express direction of the city council. The city accepted the original plant by a resolution spread upon its records, by which the city council enacted that "the waterworks erected by the Interstate Gas Company under ordinance No. 27 be, and hereby are, accepted by the city." By this ordinance the city had promised to pay the gas company and its successors $60 per annum as rental for each hydrant erected thereunder. After 100 hydrants had been erected and connected with the works, and when the city was paying rental for them, according to this contract, the Arkansas City Water Company, the then owner of the waterworks, mortgaged them, and pledged these accruing rentals to secure the $150,000, to collect which this suit was brought. The trust deed which secures this money provided that only $100,000 of the bonds secured by it should issue upon the existing security, but that bonds to the amount of $50,000 more might be issued upon certificates that the works had, subsequent to September 24, 1887, been so extended that the revenues from the hydrant rentals on the extensions would pay interest on the additional bonds. Bonds to the amount of $100,000 were immediately issued and sold in open market, upon the faith of this contract by the city, its performance by the mortgagor evidenced by the acceptance of the city council and by the fact that the latter had paid the rentals under it for fourteen months without protest. How can that city now be heard to say to the holders of these bonds that all these representations were false, that it had no power to make this contract, or that it never made it, or that it was never performed, when it still continues to take and use the water from the hydrants? It cannot. The supreme court of Kansas, in placing its seal of condemnation upon a proposition to sustain a like defense in Columbus Waterworks Co. v. Columbus, 48 Kan. 99, 113, 15 L. R. A. 354, said: "To hold to the latter proposition, when the parties cannot be placed in the same condition they were in before the contract was executed, would be a violation of the plainest rules of good faith."

But this is not all. After this mortgage was made, the city council of this city, by motions duly carried and resolutions properly passed, accepted 75 additional hydrants, erected upon extensions of these works made under its orders, and its city clerk certified over the seal of the city that these hydrants had been erected and accepted by the city upon extensions of the plant made after September 24, 1887, according to the provisions of the original ordinance, and that certain rentals had accrued thereon from the city, which were sufficient in amount to pay the interest on the remaining $50,000 of bonds. These certificates were presented to the trustee under the trust deed, and in reliance upon them, and upon the records of the city council upon which they were based, it issued the remaining bonds, and they have been purchased by their holders. The city has used these hydrants to the present time. How can it be heard to say to these bondholders that it is liable to pay no rent for this use, because the pipe on the extensions was too small, and the hydrants were improperly located? The city and the mortgagor fixed the size of the pipe. The city located the hydrants, and when all was done it induced the trustee and the bondholders to part with the money that was used to pay for them by its representations that they were properly constructed to make it liable for the rentals it agreed to pay for their use. Upon every principle of justice and of equity, it is too late now for it to deny the truth of these representations, while it retains the benefits they procured for it. It must return the $50,000 and interest which its acts and conduct induced the bondholders to part with before it can be heard to say that the representations they made were false.

All the issues presented in this case that are worthy of extended consideration have now been disposed of. The questions presented by the appeal of the receiver have become immaterial, and need no consideration, because the decree must be reversed, and the questions he sought to present have been determined in the consideration we have given to the appeal of the bank. All questions concerning the validity of the mortgage and the title to be acquired under it are foreclosed by the purchase of the property from the mortgagor, subject to the mortgage, by the city. The city now stands in the shoes of the mortgagor as to all the mortgaged property, and is bound in good faith to preserve, maintain, and apply the waterworks and their income as a primary fund sacredly pledged to the payment of the mortgage debt. Kilpatrick v. Haley, 27 U. S. App. 752, 13 O. C. A. 480, 483, 484, and 66 Fed. Rep. 183, 186, 137; Drury v. Holden, 121 Ill. 130; Byington v. Fountain, 61 Iowa, 512.

The ordinance No. 304, by which the city in terms repealed ordinance No. 27, on which the contract for the waterworks was founded, was, of course, void as against the trustee and the bondholders, because it impaired the obligation of a contract.

The court is unanimous in the opinion that the decree below must be reversed, and that, in addition to the ordinary provisions for the foreclosure of a trust deed and the sale of the property covered by it, the decree should adjudge the existence and validity of the contract between the city and the gas company and its successor, the water company, the terms of which are disclosed by ordinance No. 27, the erection by the gas company, the due acceptance by the city, and its liability to pay the rental for the original 50 hydrants, according to the terms of that ordinance. It should adjudge that the receiver is entitled to receive the rents of these 50 hydrants from the city of Arkansas City from October 1, 1891, until he delivers the plant to a purchaser under the decree. It should determine the amount of those rents to the time of the entry of the decree, and should order their immediate payment to the receiver by the city. In accordance with the opinion of the majority of the court, the decree should leave the question of the liability of the city for the rental of the additional 129 hydrants undetermined and unaffected by these proceedings, so that it may be subsequently litigated by the receiver, the purchaser at the sale, or any other person who shall demand of the city the right to these rentals.

Let the decree be reversed, with costs against the city of Arkansas City in No. 672, and against Hopper, receiver, in No. 673, and let the case be remanded, with directions to the court below to enter a decree in conformity with the opinion of the court.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

v.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF JOHNSON CITY et al.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A cash deposit fraudulently received by an insolvent bank after its officers know of its insolvency cannot be reclaimed from its receiver when it went into the general funds of the bank and cannot be identified and separated from other funds on hand when the receiver took charge.

2. Checks and drafts fraudulently received by a bank after its officers knew of its insolvency can be reclaimed if they can be found and are not yet collected and credited when the bank closes its doors.

NOTE.—Trust in deposit in insolvent bank.

Few of the cases upon this subject treat the question as one of trust. It is quite generally recognized that in case the bank is hopelessly insolvent to the knowledge of its directors when it receives the deposit, there is fraud which will entitle the depositor to rescind the contract; and a few of the cases then settle the rights of the parties as though the case was one of trust ex maleficio. But the majority of the cases do not go expressly upon the ground of trust, but simply upon the ground of the right to rescind and recover back the property which may be found. The cases in which the

3. Crediting checks and drafts to a bank which has failed, although done by a correspondent which does not yet know of the failure, cannot prejudice the rights of persons who deposited such paper in the insolvent bank to recover back their paper or its proceeds, when the deposit was received after the officers of the bank knew it to be insolvent.

4. The identical proceeds of a check or draft fraudulently received on deposit by an insolvent bank are sufficiently traced by the depositor when it appears that they are included in a fund paid over to the receiver of the bank by a correspondent as the proceeds of credits made after the bank failed but before notice thereof to the correspondent.

5. Fraud in receiving a deposit of checks or drafts after bank officials know that it is insolvent will not give the depositor a preferential claim against assets in the hands of the receiver of the bank, if the bank before its failure had received the proceeds of such paper or credit therefor from a correspondent, although the bank had on hand when it failed and always after the deposits were made more than the amount thereof in cash.

APPPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals reversing a judgment of the Chancery Court for Washington County in their favor in a suit brought to reach assets in the hands of defendants which were alleged to be impressed with a trust in favor of complainants. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kirkpatrick, Williams, & Bowman, for appellants:

The procurement of credit by false representations as to solvency renders a transaction rescindable for fraud.

Blding v. Frankland, 8 Lea, 67, 41 Am. Rep. 680; Fechheimer v. Baum, 37 Fed. Rep. 107, 2 L. R. A. 153, and notes.

And the rule is yet more rigidly applied to banker was in fact a trustee, as where he held a fund which was to be applied to at particular purpose, which cases will form the subject of a future note, would seem to indicate that if the question was treated as one of trust the fund might be pursued further than it is under the present rule.

Receiving deposit when insolvent a fraud.

If the banker is in an irretrievable condition of insolvency when he takes the deposit of his customer the transaction may involve an implied representation or concealment which characterizes it as fraudulent on the part of the banker. Rochester Printing Co. v. Loomis, 45 Hun, 93.

If the bank is insolvent at the time of receiving the deposit it is guilty of fraud, and the depositor may recover his deposit unless it is in the meantime passed into the hands of a bona fide holder. New York Breweries Co. v. Higgins, 79 Hun, 280.

No knowledge by the officers of the bank of its insolvency is sufficient to avoid transactions between the bank and its customers on the ground of fraud, unless the evidence clearly shows that the directors also had such knowledge. Balbach v. Freilighuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 675.

If the officers of the bank do not know of the insolvency at the time the deposit is made, there will be nothing to prevent its getting title to the deposit. And the mere fact that the bank is soon representations, express or implied, by bankers doing business in a state of hopeless insolvency.

St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683; Cragie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131, 59 Am. Rep. 9; Beal v. Somerville, 50 Fed. Rep. 650, 5 U. S. App. 14, 17 L. R. A. 291; Wasson v. Hawkins, 59 Fed. Rep. 234.

As to deposits made on Monday before the bank's doors closed at noon that day, it will be presumed that they went into the hands of the receiver.

Ex parte Dale, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 772, as construed by Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696; Wasson v. Hawkins, supra.

The relation of trustee and cestui que trust being established, the proceeds of all the pension checks having come to the hands of the receiver after insolvency may be recovered.

Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 148 U. S. 50, 37 L. ed. 863; Lafort v. Carpenter, 91 Hun, 76; Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. Smith, 21 Blatchf. 275.

The New York correspondent had no right to credit and mingle the proceeds of such checks after the hour of insolvency, noon of Monday, whether the condition was known to it or not.

Old Nat. Bank v. German-American Nat. Bank, 155 U. S. 563, 39 L. ed. 262; First Nat. Bank v. Strauss, 66 Miss. 479; Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 553, 2 L. R. A. 699.

Messrs. E. C. Reeves and Robert Burrow also for appellants.

Messrs. W. W. Faw and T. A. Cox for appellee.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill is filed to recover from the defendant, Cox, as receiver of the First National Bank of Johnson City, $1,163.83, balance to their credit in the bank when it closed its doors, November 12, 1894. There was a demurrer to the bill, and it was amended so as to afterwards closed by the bank superintendent is not sufficient to show such knowledge. People v. Saint Nicholas Bank, 77 Hun, 159.

If the officers of the bank do not know that it is insolvent when the deposit is received the depositor will have no equity to be paid in full to the exclusion of other depositors. Terhune v. Bank of Bergen County, 34 N. J. Eq. 367.

If the officers of the bank do not know of its insolvency the relation of debtor and creditor between the bank and its depositor is not altered by the fact that the bank is at the time insolvent. Williams v. Cox (Tenn.) 37 S. W. 232.

The mere fact that the money is received when the firm is insolvent is not such fraud as will prevent the debt being barred by a discharge in bankruptcy if the banker at the time believed that by reason of his experience or otherwise he was able to carry his business through its difficulties. Sheldon v. Clews, 13 Abb. N. C. 40.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 23 Blatchf. 430, 27 Fed. Rep. 243, it is said that if the officers of the bank supposed that they could maintain its credit and surmount its difficulties they were under no legal duty to disclose the state of its affairs to its customers, and that silence in regard to that fact which was not its duty to disclose could not be held to be fraud.

The mere fact that the bank fails soon after recharge that the deposits made November 10 and November 12, 1894, were traceable into, and formed part of, the fund on hand when the bank failed, and that the fund in bank was, all the time after the deposits, more than the amount of these deposits. The chancellor held that the bank officials obtained the deposits through fraud, knowing the bank to be insolvent when they were received. He was of opinion that $276.82 of the deposits could be traced into the funds on hand when the bank suspended, and the remainder, of $886.86, could not be so traced. He gave a decree for the former sum, as a preferred debt, but, as to the latter amount, held that the complainants could only share pro rata in the assets of the bank. Complainants and the receiver both appealed, but, the record failing to show an appeal granted, the appeals were by this court dismissed. Afterwards the cause was brought to this court by writ of error on part of the bank and its receiver, and, errors being assigned, the case has been heard by the court of chancery appeals, and the chancellor's decree reversed and the bill dismissed. The facts, as found by the court of chancery appeals, are that the bank officials were guilty of fraud in obtaining the complainant's deposits now in controversy, in not only withholding knowledge of the bank's insolvency, which was well known to them, but in active misrepresentation that the bank was in a safe and solvent condition. That court also finds that there is no evidence that the checks deposited were on hand when the bank failed, or that their proceeds constituted a part of the cash turned over to the receiver. The question presented in the case is simply whether the complainants can reclaim, as against the receiver and the other creditors of the bank, the amount of the checks deposited on November 10, 1894, of $18, and November 12, 1894, of $30 and $36, aggregating $84, upon the theory that the bank had on hand when it failed, and always after the deposits were made, more than that amount in cash, the deposits having been secured by fraud of the bank officials.

The right of a vendor to reclaim specific personal property from a vendee or his assignee, when it has been obtained by fraud and the property can be identified, cannot be disputed. Belding v. Frankland, 8 Lea, 67, 41 Am. Rep. 630. But does a similar rule apply in a case like the present, when the property is paper or its proceeds, and cannot be identified in kind, and can only be traced into a common fund with which it has been commingled? The deposits made by the complainants, whether of paper or money, were received as cash by the Johnson City Bank, and credited up to complainants as cash; and the paper was remitted to and received by the New York bank as cash, and so credited up by it to the Johnson City bank. As to the actual cash deposited on the 10th and 12th of November, it appears that it went into the general funds of the bank, being credited as cash, and there is no claim that it could be identified and separated from the other funds on hand when the receiver took charge, and the right to reclaim this is lost. Akin v. Jones, 98 Tenn. 353, 25 L. R. A. 523; Sayles v. Cox, 95 Tenn. 579, 32 L. R. A. 715. But it appears that on the 10th of November, 1894, there was deposited a check or draft on the United States treasury for $18, and on the 12th of November, 1894, two other government checks for $30 and $36. These were forwarded, for credit as cash, to the Southern National Bank of New York before the Johnson City bank closed its doors, at noon on the 12th of November, 1894. When they were received by the New York bank they were credited as cash to the Johnson City bank, but the exact date when thus received and credited is not made to appear. It is absolutely certain, however, in the natural course of events, that the checks sent on November 12, 1894, the same day the Johnson City bank ceiving the deposit will not, in the absence of fraud, entitle the depositor to rescind the contract and stop payment of the paper which was deposited. Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 25 Hun. 101.

In Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 90 N. Y. 530, it is suggested that the depositor after the credit was given left the deposit with the bank for his own convenience when he might have withdrawn it immediately, and that therefore it was not necessary to consider whether or not the deposit received by the insolvent bank could be recovered under any circumstances.

In Anonymous, 67 N. Y. 566, the court held that an order of arrest was proper where the banker knowing that he was hopelessly insolvent received money on deposit.

But that was a case of the sale of a bill of exchange, and not the case of a deposit. Roebing v. Duncan, 8 Hun. 507.

In order to sustain an attachment for receiving the deposit with intent to defraud the actual intent must be proved. It is not sufficient that the deposit is received when the bank is insolvent which the statute makes fraudulent. Hughes v. Lake, 63 Miss. 557.

How far trust exists.

In People v. Saint Nicholas Bank, 77 Hun. 159, the court intimates that the receipt of the money when insolvent is not sufficient to create a trust which will be governed by the principles applicable to that relation, saying that in order to do so there should be a specific appropriation of a particular fund for the payment of a particular claim.

In Massey v. Fisher, 62 Fed. Rep. 958, which was a case of payment of money to take up a note, the court distinguishes that case where the bank had no right to use the money but was bound to apply it to the note, from those of a deposit where the understanding of the parties is that it should commingle the money with its own and use it as such.

Although the fact that the deposit was obtained by fraud gives the depositor the right to recover the deposit if he can trace it, does not give him a right to have precedence out of the general fund of the bank over other creditors, nor does it give the bank a right to pay him in violation of the statute forbidding trespasses by a corporation in contemplation of insolvency. Atkinson v. Rochester Printing Co. 114 N. Y. 168.

In Re Bank of Madison, 5 Biss. 515, the court said, in speaking of a case of collection by an insolvent bank, that it is not exacting too much to require that a party dealing with an insolvent bank in the ordinary way should make out a very clear case before a court should sustain a preference in his favor over other creditors.

The tendency of the above cases seems to be to deny the application of the trust doctrine to this class of cases.

failed, could not have reached the New York bank and been credited on the same day; but it is not certain that the check sent on the 10th could not have reached the New York bank and have been credited by it before the Johnson City bank closed its doors, on the 12th at noon. As to these checks a very nice question arises. It appears that the New York bank paid over to the receiver of the Johnson City bank, after he took possession, about $5,000, retaining a further sum of $771.63 to meet certain indorsements upon re-discounts made for the Johnson City bank. This fund embraced the checks referred to, but, they having been entered up to the general credit of the Johnson City bank after its failure, the question is, can the amount be reclaimed out of the money paid over to the receiver by the New York bank? It has been held that when a bank ceases to do business the status of each and every creditor is immediately fixed. After that time a correspondent bank has no power to so deposit or credit funds received for the account of the insolvent bank as to affect the rights of the customers or creditors of the insolvent bank. Unquestionably the complainants, in view of the fraud practiced upon them by the bank, had the right, when it closed its doors, to reclaim the government checks deposited on the 12th, and which were not yet collected or credited, if they could be found. Nor could the New York bank, by afterwards collecting these treasury checks, and depositing their proceeds to the general account of the Johnson City bank, deprive complainants of their right to such proceeds. The New York bank, after the closing of the doors of the Johnson City bank, could make no further credits to it that could or would in any way affect the right of the complainants to the checks or their proceeds. And this is true whether the New York bank had notice of the failure of the Johnson City bank or not when it made the credits. In other words, all checks and drafts received by the New York bank after the Johnson City bank closed its doors should have been kept separate, and accounted for to the receiver, for the true owners, and not credited to the Johnson City bank; and such credit, if given, could not prejudice complainants' right to rescind their contract for fraud, and recover back the proceeds not credited when the insolvent bank failed. It is evident that these identical proceeds were embraced in the $5,000 paid over. This holding is sustained, as we think, by sound reason, and is supported in principle by the following authorities: Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 553, 2 L. R. A. 699; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 138 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 148 U. S. 50, 37 L. ed. 363; Old Nat. Bank v. German-American Nat. Bank, 155 U. S. 563, 39 L. ed. 262; Cragie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131, 52 Am. Rep. 9; Morse, Banks & Banking, §§ 589, 590b, 629-631.

It may be that none of the authorities present the question in the exact shape here presented, but the principles decided are, we think, conclusive in this case.

It follows that the decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals must be reversed, as to the checks deposited by complainants in the Johnson City bank on the 10th and 12th of November, 1894, aggregating $66, and for this amount complainants are entitled to a judgment against the receiver, to be paid as a preferential claim, and the remainder of said decree must be affirmed. There being no proof or presumption that the $13 pension check was not received and credited by the Southern National Bank before the Johnson City bank closed its doors, complainants have not made out their right to reclaim or recover the proceeds of it. The costs of the appeal will be paid by the receiver; the other costs, as heretofore adjudged.

If the money is kept in a separate package the depositor may recover it from the hands of the receiver. Chaffee v. Fort, 3 Lans. 81.

If money is deposited a few minutes before a bank closes its doors, and together with the deposit ticket put to one side, where it remains when the bank closes its doors and so passes into the hands of the receiver, the owner may maintain replevin for it. Furber v. Stephens, 35 Fed. Rep. 17.

If the money is paid in after banking hours, and is put by itself, and the bank never opens for business again, the owner may recover the deposit. Sadler v. Beicher, 3 Moody & R. 439; Threlfal v. Giles, Id. 492.

A deposit of money made in a bank on the day and at the very hour when its suspended payment may be returned to the depositor. Exchange Bank v. Montreal Coffee House, M. L. R. 28 C. 141.

But if the money has not been kept separate the majority of the cases deny a recovery.

If the funds deposited have been commingled with the other funds of the bank, and are incapable of identification, the depositor will not be entitled to recover from the receiver the full amount of his claim in preference to other creditors. Blake v. State Sav. Bank, 12 Wash. 619.

A deposit which cannot be traced is a simple debt, and the depositor is not entitled to a preference. Lotze v. Hoerner, 25 Ohio L. J. 81.

A deposit cannot be recovered if it is passed into the hands of the assignee mingled with other funds of the bank. Wilson v. Coburn, 35 Neb. 580.

Where money was paid after office hours, and on the same evening one of the partners in the bank made a declaration of insolvency which was afterwards acquiesced in by the other partner, and the bank never afterwards opened for business but was adjudicated bankrupt, the money so deposited was held to pass to the assignees. Ex parte Clutton, 1 Foub. N. R. 167.

The rule of the above cases is, however, not universal. In one case, in which the rule of trust ex maleficio is applied, it is held that if money and checks are deposited a few minutes before the doors of the bank are closed, and the checks are subsequently collected so that the specific money deposited and the proceeds of the checks come to the hands of the receiver, the owner may recover them from his hands. The fact that the money cannot be identified will not prevent its recovery if it is still in the mass in the receiver's hands. Wasson v. Hawkins, 59 Fed. Rep. 237. That case was followed in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Indianapolis Nat. Bank, 65 Fed. Rep. 690.

So, it has been stated that in order to recover from the receiver money deposited with an insolvent bank the owner must show that it was held by

(.....Tenn.....)

A credit for a draft given by one bank to another on the same day that the latter failed will not be presumed, in the absence of proof, to have been given after the failure, in order to entitle one who deposited the draft in the insolvent bank after its officers knew it was insolvent to reclaim the proceeds of the draft out of the assets in preference to other creditors who seek to have them distributed pro rata.

(October 31, 1896.)

APP^{EAL} by plaintiff from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals reversing a decree of the Washington County Chancery Court in his favor in a suit brought to recover from the possession of the defendant, receiver, certain assets which were alleged to have gone into his possession impressed with a trust in complainant's favor. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Isaac Harr and Burrow Bros. for appellant.

Messrs. W. W. Faw and T. A. Cox for appellee.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill was filed to recover from the defendant, as receiver of the First National Bank of Johnson City, $316.36, proceeds of a draft or check of the bank on its correspondent bank in Louisville, Kentucky, and the further sum of $41.75 deposited in cash in the Johnson City bank on the day of its failure. The chancellor granted the relief prayed as to the check, but declined to give any relief as to the $41.75 cash. The court of chancery appeals reversed the decree of the chancellor and dismissed complainant's bill, denying him any relief, and he has appealed and assigned errors.

The theory of the bill is that the bank at Johnson City was hopelessly insolvent when it issued its check on the Louisville bank and received the cash deposit of $41.75, and this fact was well known to its president and officers, and constituted a fraud upon complainant, and that he has a right to rescind the transaction and recover back the money from the receiver, inasmuch as there was more than enough cash in the vaults of the bank, which went into the receiver's hands when it failed, to repay the amounts claimed, or that it may reclaim the draft given in exchange for the check on Louisville. The court finds as a fact that the officers of the bank did know of the insolvency of the bank at the time of the transaction. The facts, so far as material to be stated, are that on the 10th of November, 1894, complainant delivered to the Johnson City bank a draft of the United States Leather Company, drawn on a New York bank, for $307.10, and with this and $9.06 in cash it obtained and received from the Johnson City bank its check or draft on the German National Bank of Louisville for $316.36. It immediately transmitted the draft of the leather company to its New York correspondent, and it was placed to its credit in the receiver in specie, or constitute part of the gross sum which went into his hands, or had been invested by the bank in tangible property which came to the hands of the receiver. St. Louis Brewing Assn. v. Austin, 100 Ala. 313.

So, if the bank closes two hours after the deposit is made the depositor cannot recover his deposit unless he shows that it was not paid out during the time the business continued, and that it came to the hands of the receiver. Re North River Bank, 60 Hun, 91.

Right to follow commercial paper.

If a bank receives checks on deposit when it is hopelessly insolvent, it is such fraud that a depositor may recover them from the bank or may recover their proceeds in case they are not collected until after the bank closes its doors. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683.

If checks are received for deposit when the bank is hopelessly insolvent, and not collected until after it closes its doors, the owner may recover the checks or their proceeds. Somerville v. Beal, 49 Fed. Rep. 790, Affirming Beal v. Somerville, 50 Fed. Rep. 647, 5 U. S. App. 14, 17 L. R. A. 291.

If the deposit consists of a check, and is made within thirty days of insolvency, the bank is, under the Illinois statutes, guilty of fraud; and if the check comes to the hands of the assignee it may be recovered back again. American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gueder & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 386, Affirming Gueder & P. Mfg. Co. v. American Trust & Sav. Bank, 51 Ill. App. 349.

A bank which is insolvent and contemplating suspension, and whose assets are far less than its liabilities, acquires no title to a check deposited by one to whom its condition is unknown. Fisse v. Dietrich, 3 Mo. App. 584.

One who deposits paper with an insolvent bank may rescind the transfer and stop payment of the paper. First Nat. Bank v. Strauss, 66 Miss. 479.

If the bank is hopelessly insolvent when it receives paper on deposit, and closes its doors before the paper is collected, the depositor may reclaim it from the hands of the assignee. Cragie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131, 52 Am. Rep. 9.

Or from the hands of a third person who did not give value for it. National Citizens' Bank v. Howard, 3 How. Pr. N. S. 511.

If the bank fraudulently procures possession of a check on deposit neither it nor its assignee with notice can enforce payment of it. Grant v. Walsh, 145 N. Y. 502.

If a national bank is insolvent when it receives a deposit of a check, its proceeds may be recovered by the depositor if they remain distinct from the general funds of the bank. Craigie v. Smith, 14 Abb. N. C. 409.

The paper cannot be followed if it has passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser.

If the check deposited has been turned over to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the fraud it cannot be reclaimed by the depositor. Grant v. Walsh, 81 Hun. 449.

If the checks have been sent to a third bank and credited to the account of the deposit bank they cannot be recovered by the depositor. Hoffman v. First Nat. Bank, 46 N. J. L. 607.

In that case the deposit bank was indebted to its correspondent and the paper was credited on account.

In order to recover the deposit its identity must be traced in the hands of the receiver. If a draft is not paid until after the bank closes its doors, so that the proceeds come to the hands of the receiver, it may be recovered by the depositor. But the New York bank, in its usual course of business, on November 12, 1894, but at what hour does not appear. About noon on that day the Johnson City bank ceased to do business, closed its doors, and went into the hands of defendant as receiver. The draft on the Louisville bank was not paid, but protested. The deposit of $41.75 was made about an hour before the bank suspended. The New York bank was indebted to the Johnson City bank when the latter closed its doors in the sum of $5,644.67, and afterwards paid the receiver $4,873.03 of this amount, retaining $771.64 on account of some redcounts on which the Johnson City bank was indorser. When the draft was drawn on the Louisville bank, November 10, 1894, the Johnson City bank was overdrawn with it $51.55, but on November 12, when the failure occurred, it had to the credit of the Johnson City bank $113.65. The court of chancery appeals finds as a fact that the parties treated the deposit of the leather company's draft and the issuance of the draft on Louisville as cash transactions, and the leather company's draft was remitted by the Johnson City bank to its New York correspondent as cash, and for its credit, and not simply as a collection. The real matter presented and insisted upon in this court and in the court of chancery appeals is that the Johnson City bank was hopelessly insolvent, and known by its officers to be so, when the transaction took place with it; and the contention is made that this constituted fraud, and that complainant is entitled to recover the amount of the leather company's check out of the proceeds which came into the hands of the receiver from the New York bank. Put into other language, the contention is that it was a fraud to receive the check, under the circumstances, and hence the receiver holds the fund in trust, and complainant has a right to follow and reclaim the amount of the check in preference to other creditors. We have held in cases somewhat similar to this that by the transaction as there detailed the relation of debtor and creditor was created between the customer and the bank, and in such cases the customer cannot follow and reclaim the proceeds of the check or the money when it has been collected or credited before the bank closed. Akin v. Jones, 93 Tenn. 353, 25 L. R. A. 523; Sayles v. Cox, 95 Tenn. 579, 33 L. R. A. 715. An earnest argument is made, however, that the question and effect of the fraud practised in making such transaction when the bank was in a known state of utter insolvency was not passed upon or considered in those cases, and that the consequence of such fraud must be to warrant the customer in rescinding the transaction and reclaiming his property. It is likened to the case of a vendor who has been induced by fraud to part with his goods. In such case he may reclaim them in the hands of the vendee, if he can find and identify them (Belding v. Frankland, 8 Lea, 67, 41 Am. Rep. 630), or against an assignee under a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors and to secure pre-existing debts (Id.). This rule obtains upon the idea that the identical goods or property can be traced in kind into the hands of the assignee, and that they have not been mixed or confused with other goods or property of like kind. But does the rule apply in a case like the present? The transaction be-if the proceeds are appropriated by the bank before it closes its doors, the depositor cannot recover them. If the deposit is money it must be identified in the hands of the receiver. Re Commercial Bank, 2 Ohio N. P. 170.

Moreover the paper must have increased the assets of the bank.

In order to entitle the owner to a preference it must appear that the funds in the hands of the receiver were increased or benefited by the proceeds. Hence, if a draft is deposited which is forwarded to a correspondent, and credited to the forwarding bank, the depositor cannot claim a preference out of the funds of the deposit bank in case of its insolvency. City Bank v. Blackmore, 75 Fed. Rep. 771.

So, a person who makes a deposit with a bank after it has suspended, consisting of checks drawn on and accepted by the bank in which the deposit is made, is not entitled to a preference over other creditors of the bank. Ontario Bank v. Chaplin, 20 Can. S. C. 152, Affirming M. L. R. 5 Q. B. 407.

The difference in the result when the trust doctrine is applied, and when it is not, is illustrated by the following cases:

If at the time the check is deposited the bank is hopelessly insolvent the depositor may reclaim the proceeds until they have been mingled with the funds of the bank so that they cannot possibly be traced. And if the check was forwarded to a correspondent for collection and the proceeds placed to the credit of the deposit bank and the general account drawn against, it will be presumed that the funds of the deposit bank were the subject of the drafts; and if the amount of the trust fund was always intact the owner may recover it from the possession of the correspondent. Importers & T. Bank v. Everett Bros. 21 N. Y. S. R. 96.

That case applies the trust doctrine as established in Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 415, 42 L. T. N. S. 421, 28 Week. Rep. 732, where one having trust funds in his hands deposited them in his own account at his banker's, and the court held that the owner could follow them and had a charge on the general balance in the banker's hands, and that it would be considered that the checks afterwards drawn upon the funds were upon his own share, and not upon that of the cestui que trust.

In Tennessee the doctrine of a trust is expressly repudiated in ordinary cases of this kind, and in that state it is held that if the check is forwarded for collection and credited to the deposit bank as cash before it closes its doors the right to follow, and reclaim the proceeds, is lost, although they remain in the hands of the correspondent, and are, together with other funds, turned over by it to the receiver. Friberg v. Cox (Tenn.) 87 S. W. 233.

And in KLEPPER v. COX it is held that if the credit is given the same day upon which the bank closes its doors it will not be presumed in favor of the depositor to have been after the failure. But the depositor must show that such was the fact in order to be entitled to the proceeds. It would seem that Friberg v. Cox, supra, and KLEPPER v. COX carry the refusal to recognize the depositor's rights further than any other case, and are somewhat inconsistent with the rule prevailing elsewhere.

As to trust in proceeds of collection made by bank when insolvent, see note to Sayles v. Cox (Tenn.) 33 L. R. A. 715.

H. P. F.

tween the complainant in this case and the bank was, in effect, that complainant sold to the bank the check of the leather company, and purchased from the bank its own check upon the Louisville bank. At the same time the Johnson City bank became by the same transaction the owner of the leather company's check, and at once remitted it, for credit on its own account, to its New York correspondent, and it was received and credited as cash by the New York bank upon its arrival. There is no question now made as to the real cash passing in the transaction, but the effort is to reclaim the proceeds of the leather company's check out of funds turned over to the receiver by the New York bank after he took charge. There are two determining questions arising under the statement of facts: (1) Whether the proceeds of the check can be traced and identified; and (2) whether the credit was given to the Johnson City bank by the New York bank before the failure of the former. If such credit was entered before the Johnson City bank failed, then the proceeds became mingled with the general funds of the bank, and cannot be reclaimed. Akin v. Jones, 98 Tenn. 358, 25 L. R. A. 528; Sayles v. Cox, 95 Tenn. 579, 33 L. R. A. 715. In such case the proceeds cannot be followed, separated, or identified. The credit in this case was given by the New York bank on the same day the Johnson City bank failed. Which was first in point of time does not appear.

Under this state of facts, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the identification not being made out, and in favor of the other creditors of the bank seeking a pro rata distribution of its assets, we must presume that the credit was given before the Johnson City bank failed; and, this being so, the proceeds of the check cannot be identified or separated, and the right to reclaim them is lost, and the decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals is affirmed.

(.....Tenn.....)

Two members of the court of chancery appeals may hear, consider, confer together, and decide the causes before them in the absence of the other member of the court from sickness or other reason, although the act creating the court makes no provision as to the number which may act or constitute a quorum, but MILL & V. Code, § 56, while not applicable to the court, provides generally that a majority of three or more officers to whom joint authority is given may exercise it, unless otherwise declared.

Mr. W. O. Nums also for appellees.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill was filed to enforce a vendor's lien for judgment on the purchase-money notes, and to set aside a subsequent conveyance of the land covered by the lien, upon the ground of fraud, and notice that the lien of the vendor was outstanding. The chancellor granted the relief prayed, and defendants appealed and assigned errors. The case has been heard by the court of chancery appeals, and the decree of the chancellor reversed so far as it decreed that the conveyance of the land be set aside. The complainants are allowed, however, to sell the lands, and to take the surplus proceeds after the payment of the amounts due to defendants Stead & Carver, the subsequent grantees, which amounts are declared a first lien or encumbrance on the property. Complainants have appealed to this court, and assigned errors.

The court of chancery appeals finds, as facts, that complainants sold the lands to Murch, and made him an absolute conveyance of the same, retaining a lien in the purchase-money notes, but none in the conveyance; that Stead & Carver, without any notice of any lien, on the faith of the absolute deed to Murch, made him a loan of $3,500, and took a deed of trust on the land to secure the same; that complainants knew of this deed of trust, and made no objection to the same until nearly a year afterwards, and when the scheme for which the land was bought proved a failure, and hence they were not entitled to set aside the conveyance in trust, but must take in subordination to it. It follows from the finding of facts that the court of chancery appeals was correct in granting the decree it did, and, if there were nothing else in the case, their decree must be affirmed. It is insisted, however, that only two members out of the three judges composing the court of chancery appeals considered the case, and rendered the finding of facts and final decree in the cause, and this is assigned as error.

It appears that argument of the case was had before the full bench on the 7th of October, 1895; that the cause was kept under advisement until November 5, 1895, when an opinion was filed, signed by two of the judges of the court. A decree was entered in accordance with the opinion, and without exception, on November 6, 1895. On November 8, 1895, complainants filed a petition to rehear the cause, assigning, as one of the grounds for rehearing, that, while the cause was heard by the full court, still it had been considered by only two members of the court, and the opinion rendered had been concurred in by only two members, and it was asked that the cause be reconsidered by the full bench. This petition was presented to the court while only two members were on the bench the third being absent, on account of sickness in his family; and the petition was dismissed November 9, 1895, by the same two judges. At this time, upon entering the decree dismissing the petition, complainants excepted to the action of the court, because only two members had considered and concurred in the conclusion. These facts appear from the recital in the opinion on petition to rehear, and finding of the two judges, and in the decision rendered by them, and in the decree as entered upon the minutes of the court.

The question presented under this state of the record and the assignment of errors is this: Can the decision and findings of the court of chancery appeals be sustained over objection, when the argument of the case has been heard by the full bench of three judges, but only two have conferred and consulted in regard to it, and only two have engaged and concurred in the findings and final determination of the case, the third member being unavoidably absent? It is insisted that the question has been, in principle, virtually settled by the cases of Radford Trust Co. v. East Tennessee Lumber Co. 92 Tenn. 136, and Austin v. Harbin, 95 Tenn. 600. The first of these cases arose in the supreme court, and it was held that, under the constitutional and statutory provisions relating to that court, three members constituted a quorum to transact business. The case further holds, referring to special judges, that objections to the competency of a court or any member of it must be made on the hearing, or when the action complained of is had. Unquestionably, this is so, but is that principle decisive of this case? Here the argument was heard before a full court, and no objection would lie. Neither counsel nor litigant could know in advance whether the deliberation over the case would be made by the full court, or only a portion of it, and hence there was no opportunity for exception. When the finding of facts and opinion of the court were promulgated, neither litigant nor counsel could know whether all or only a part of the members had participated in the consideration of the case until after the opinion was delivered and handed down; for one member of the court may and always does deliver the opinion, even when all deliberate and concur. No objection would have lain to the delivery of the opinion with only two members on the bench if all concurred in the consideration. As a matter of fact, only one could deliver the opinion, and no objection would lie to his doing so if two members were present. Complainant therefore had no alternative but to wait, and no remedy but to petition for a rehearing, so soon as he came into a knowledge of the facts, and cannot therefore be considered as having waived any rights, or as having given his consent to the hearing of the case by a part of the court. In the case of Austin v. Harbin, 95 Tenn. 598, it was held that a majority of the court (or two members) might concur in the findings and opinion, and the decree would not be invalid for that reason, and that it was not required by the act to be signed at all. But the question as to whether the entire court must consider and confer over the case, though a majority concurring might decide it, was not considered or passed upon. We do not therefore understand the question raised in this case to have been decided in either of the cases referred to and relied upon by appellees, and the question is an open one.

It is said that § 56 of Milliken & Vertrees' Code should be considered as indicative of the spirit and policy of our legislation. This section is in the following terms: "All words giving a joint authority to three or more persons or officers give such authority to a majority of such persons or officers, unless it is otherwise declared." This section is by its terms and context applicable only to the Code and the body of laws embraced in it; but it is insisted, and properly so, that it should be considered in the construction of all subsequent statutes, so as to build up a uniform and harmonious system. The act creating the court of chancery appeals does not in terms provide that any number of the members of the court shall constitute a majority or quorum, and that any specified number must concur in the consideration or in the decision of any case. It does provide that, in case of the sickness or incompetency of any one or more of the judges of the court, such vacancy may be filled by appointment of the governor; and unquestionably, the parties might, by consent, fill the vacancy in any case in which it thus becomes necessary, and the party thus selected by consent could act as a judge. The Constitution, in article 6, § 2, provides that "the concurrence of three of the judges of the supreme court shall in every case be necessary to a decision;" and the necessary implication is that a decision may be reached if a majority, or three, of the members concur in the decision, but less than that number cannot reach a decision. Undoubtedly, that decision, when thus reached, may be announced, as has been the invariable rule, by only one member of the court. It was held in Austin v. Harbin, 95 Tenn. 598, that this provision of the Constitution and the act conforming thereto (Mill. & V. Code, § 342) does not apply to the court of chancery appeals, but only to the supreme court, but that a decision and finding by two members, constituting a majority of the former court, would be valid and legal, without the concurrence or over the dissent of the third judge.

It is insisted that it is a general rule of law and construction that, whenever a body is by law constituted for the decision and determination of matters committed to them, in the absence of any provision directing otherwise all must join in the consideration of the matters to be decided, and must confer together over the matters, although a majority may decide after such conference. There appears to be quite a broad distinction in such cases between matters of private and public concern. The rule contended for is tersely stated in the text in 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 645, under the general head of "Arbitration," that in matters of private concern all must concur in the decision, and it is added: "It is different in matters of a public character, because where persons, as a bench of judges, are appointed to discharge public duties, the decision of a majority is generally sufficient, yet then they must all act together in the proceedings prior to the judgment or award." In Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, p. 605, the rule is stated as follows: "An act which empowers two or more justices, or other persons, to do any act of a judicial, as distinguished from a ministerial nature, impliedly requires that they should all be personally present and acting together in its performance, whether to hear the evidence, or to view when they are to act on personal inspection; to consult together, and form their judgment." In Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 890, it is said: "Where any number of persons are appointed to act judicially in a public matter, they must all confer; but a majority may decide." In McCoy v. Curtice, 9 Wend. 17, 24 Am. Dec. 115, and note, which was a case where two school trustees acted and issued a warrant to collect taxes, it was said that when power is delegated to two or more individuals for a mere private purpose, in no respect affecting the public, it is necessary that all should join in the execution of it; thus arbitrators must all unite in an award. But in matters of public concern, if all are present, the majority can act, and these acts will be the acts of the whole. The same principle is announced in Cooley v. O'Connor, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 396, 20 L. ed. 446, which involved the action of two of the commissioners of direct taxes; and in Crocker v. Crane, 21 Wend. 311, 84 Am. Dec. 228, which was a case where commissioners were authorized to distribute stock in a corporation for its best interests. In the latter case it is said: "It has long been perfectly well settled that where a statute constitutes a board of commissioners or other officers to decide any matter, but makes no provision that a majority shall constitute a quorum, all must be present to hear and consult, though a majority may decide,"—citing Ex parte Rogers, 7 Cow. 529, and notes, which was a case of a board of canal commissioners. See also note to Crocker v. Crane, 84 Am. Dec. 235; Grindley v. Barker, 1 Bos. & P. 229, a case of leather commissioners; Atty. Gen. v. Davy, 3 Atk. 212, a case of commissioners to choose a chaplain; Scott v. Detroit Young Men's Soc. 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 119, a case of power delegated to trustees; Downing v. Ruger, 21 Wend. 178, 84 Am. Dec. 298, a case of overseers of the poor; First Nat. Bank v. Mount Tabor, 53 Vt. 87, 86 Am. Rep. 784, which was a case of town commissioners to issue bonds. None of the cases cited are cases in which "courts," strictly speaking, are considered; but they are cases involving bodies, such as boards of school directors, boards of canal commissioners, boards for the issuance of bonds, boards for the distribution of stock, and other bodies exercising judicial or quasi judicial functions. We have been cited to no case involving the power of a majority of a court of judges to consider and decide causes submitted to them, or a majority of them; and we have been able to find none directly upon the point, when there is no statutory or constitutional provision authorizing a majority to act. The case cited of Atty. Gen. v. Davy, 3 Atk. 212, appears to recognize a distinction between individuals exercising judicial functions and a regularly constituted court of judges.

It is insisted that the rule contended for by appellants would place the court of chancery appeals most nearly in harmony with the practice of this court; that three judges of this court must consider every case; and that it would be unwise and incongruous for like cases to be decided by two members of that court. And it is suggested, by way of illustration, that two cases may be upon the same equity docket. One may be assigned to the court of chancery appeals, and be considered and determined by two judges, as to the facts; while the next case, not assigned, must be considered by not less than three members of this court. But this reasoning, if carried out to its end, will result in this: that, while not less than three members of this court must concur in every decision, only two will be required in that court. Another result would be that law cases could be decided only by three members of this court, while chancery causes would be decided by only two members of that court; at least, as to the facts. By parity of reasoning, if all of that court must consider and confer in every case, but two may decide, it would follow that all the members of this court must consider and confer in every case, though three may concur in the decision, and make it valid. It has already been held that the constitutional provisions and act relating to this court do not apply to the court of chancery appeals (Austin v. Harbin, 95 Tenn. 600), and any attempted analogy seen between the courts must fail in many particulars. The courts are different, the powers different, and the jurisdictions different. One is a supreme, and the other an inferior, court, in the legal and constitutional sense. It has never been held indispensable that all the members of this court should confer together in the consideration of every case; but, under this reasoning, the constitutional and statutory provisions do not stand in the way of such construction, inasmuch as they simply provide that three shall concur in the decision, without laying down any rule for the consideration of cases. It was held in Radford Trust Co. v. East Tennessee Lumber Co. 93 Tenn. 186, that a decision of this court, concurred in by three members, would be valid, although it may have been considered by less than the full court of five members, and less than that number had conferred in regard to it.

We are of opinion that in the absence of one member of the court of chancery appeals, from sickness or other reason, the two remaining members may hear, consider, and confer together, and decide, the causes before them. While it is always best to have a full bench at every stage of every proceeding, it will not vitiate the decision if, for any reason, only two of its judges consider and join in the determination of the question. It has been held that two may decide in the absence of the third, or over the dissent of the third; and we can see no valid reason why two may not consider, and reach the decision which two are competent to make. That court does not sit as arbitrator under selection of the parties, and under a power conferred by agreement, for special cases or purposes, but as a court provided by general statutes for all causes properly coming before it. We are of opinion, therefore, that the finding and decision in this case are valid and legal, and, under the facts as found, the proper legal conclusion has been reached; and the decision of the Court of Chancery Appeals is affirmed.

If this court were of the opinion that the finding was not legal, it would only remand, in order that the cause might be considered by the full bench of the court of chancery appeals, when it is evident that the same two judges could reach the same result, and render the same decision, even if the third one should be of a different opinion.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A statute giving a certain county power to issue bridge bonds and levy taxes to pay them does not violate Const. art. 11, § 8, prohibiting the suspension of general laws for the benefit of a particular individual and the granting to any individual of special rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions.
2. Counties are not included among the corporations referred to in Const. art. 11, § 8, prohibiting the creation or increase of the power of corporations by special laws.
3. The limitation on the taxing power of counties by the general revenue law of Tennessee, passed at the extra session of 1895, does not repeal the provision of the special act of 1895, p. 122, chap. 80, relating to the power to tax to pay bridge bonds of Knox county.
4. Power to issue bonds payable in gold coin of the United States of the present weight and fineness is not conferred upon a county by a statute authorizing the issue of bonds without prescribing the kind of money in which they may be paid.

(Snodgrass, Ch. J., and Beard, J., dissent.)

(November 14, 1896.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Knox County in an action to enjoin the issuance of bonds for the erection of a bridge; the plaintiffs appealing from so much of the decision as upheld the power to issue the bonds, and defendants appealing from so much as denied authority to make them payable in gold. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Trent & Ford, for plaintiffs:

The act of the general assembly of April 30, 1895, chap. 80, 1st Sess., is unconstitutional and obnoxious to art. 1, § 8, of the Constitution of Tennessee, which expressly prohibits the passage of "special laws" creating a corporation or increasing or diminishing its powers.

The act of June 15, 1895, 2d Sess. chap. 4, § 14, expressly prohibits counties from levying special taxes, the aggregate amount of which shall exceed the amount limited in said act to them for current expenses.

The holding that the action of the county court attempting to authorize the gold clause in said bonds should be affirmed.

A county is the lowest order of corporate existence.

They cannot borrow money, issue bonds or negotiable paper, except when and in the manner they may be specially authorized so to do.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 382; Taxpayers of Milan v. Tennessee C. R. Co. 11 Lea, 334.

There can be no dispute as to the words of the act. No authority is there given to issue gold bonds.

The court had no discretion outside of the terms of the act, except necessary discretion.

To assume that the power to issue gold bonds was a necessarily implied power is against reason and against public policy.

The rule is:

First, strict construction.

Second, that county courts have no powers in creating county debts like the one in question, except such as are expressly conferred or necessarily implied.

Messrs. Comfort & Spilman, for defendants:

In Lauderdale County v. Fargason, 7 Lea, 153, it was held by this court that the act was constitutional. The same conclusion was reached in Williams v. Nashville, 89 Tenn. 487.

The constitutional prohibition that "no corporation shall be created, or its powers increased or diminished, by special laws," does not apply to municipal corporations.

State v. Wilson, 12 Lea, 246; Ballentine v. Pulaski, 15 Lea, 683; Williams v. Nashville, supra.

The object of the general act was to regulate those taxes only which, by previous general laws, all counties had the right to levy. It will not be presumed to have any reference to the special act passed to meet the peculiar needs of a single county.

All the details not expressly defined must be taken as left to the discretion of the court, with the qualification that the instrument be of such character as to fall within the legal definition of the term "bond," and must contain no stipulations contrary to public policy.

A stipulation to pay a contract in gold is not contrary to public policy, but is legal and enforceable.

A contract having otherwise the essential characteristics of a bond does not lose its legal identity by being made payable in gold.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The legislature of this state, on the 30th of April, 1895, passed an act entitled "An Act to Authorize the County Court of Knox County to Issue Bonds of Said County for Building a Bridge across the Tennessee river at the South End of Gay Street, Knoxville." Acts 1895, p. 123, chap. 80. The 1st section thereof authorized the quarterly county court of Knox county, three fifths of its number concurring, to issue bonds of the county, not exceeding in the aggregate $225,000, and bearing a rate of interest not in excess of 6 per cent, for the accomplishment of the purpose indicated in the caption. The 2d section provided that the interest on these bonds should be payable semiannually, represented by coupons attached to each bond, and maturing at the proper date; and by the 6th section it was made the duty of the quarterly county court "to lay and levy a tax sufficient for the payment of the coupons of said bonds as they matured, and also to create a sinking fund for the retirement of the said bonds by the levy of an additional tax, sufficient to pay the principal of said bonds as they mature, which sinking fund shall be sacredly kept and applied for this purpose." Acting under the authority of this statute, the quarterly court of Knox county, by a vote much larger than three fifths of the whole court, passed a resolution authorizing the construction of the bridge contemplated therein, and subsequently entered into contract with the Youngstown Bridge Company to construct this bridge for the sum of $310,000. On the day of the closing of this contract the county court passed a resolution authorizing the defendant Maloney, as county judge and as county clerk, to issue the bonds of the county in the amounts in the aggregate and of the description found in the statute, the proceeds of which, when sold, were to be used for the erection of this bridge; and at the same time it levied a tax of 5 cents on the $100 on all taxable property in Knox county, for the purpose of meeting the interest on these bonds. Afterwards the court passed a resolution directing the bonds to be made "payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness." All three resolutions were passed by the court, three fifths of its members concurring. The present is an agreed case, made up under §§ 4187 et seq. of Milliken & Vertrees' Code, by and between plaintiffs in error, who are citizens and taxpayers of Knox county, on the one hand, and the judge of the county court, the clerk of that court, and the county trustee, by which certain matters of controversy between them, growing out of this act of the legislature and the proceedings of the county court, were submitted to the determination of the circuit court of Knox county. In the submission the plaintiff's affirming and the defendants denying the following propositions: (1) That the act of the legislature hereinbefore referred to is repugnant to art. 11, § 8, of the Constitution of this state, and therefore void. (2) That the levy of the tax of 5 cents on the $100 of taxable property, to pay the interest on these bonds, was unauthorized, because the quarterly court had previously exhausted its power to levy taxes for the year 1896, as that power was conferred by chapter 4, same session, of the legislature of 1895. (3) That under this act, the quarterly court had not the power to issue these bonds payable, principal and interest, in gold coin. On the trial below, the circuit judge held the first two of these propositions against plaintiffs and the third against the defendants, and entered up a judgment in accordance with this holding. Both parties, being dissatisfied, have appealed to this court, and thus there is opened up for consideration all three of the propositions.

Is the act in question obnoxious to the constitutional objections which plaintiffs make to it? These objections are: First, that it was passed for the benefit of Knox county alone, granting to it a right or power not extending to any other county; and, secondly, that it is an effort to increase the powers of this county by a special law, and it is assumed that they are sustained by § 8 of art. 11 of our Constitution. So much of this section as affects the first of these objections is as follows, viz.: "The legislature shall have no power to suspend any general law for the benefit of any particular individual, . . . nor to pass any laws granting to any individual or individuals rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions, other than such as may be, by the same law, extended to any member of the community who may be able to bring himself within the provisions of such law." This provision, as set out above, corresponds exactly with § 7 of art. 11 of the Constitution of 1834, save that the latter has this as a concluding clause: "Provided, always, the legislature shall have power to grant such charters of incorporation as they may deem expedient for the public good." In the room and stead of this proviso found in the Constitution of 1834, the second clause of § 8 of art. 11 of our present Constitution is as follows: "No corporation shall be created, or its powers increased or diminished by special laws; but the general assembly shall provide by general laws, for the organization of all corporations hereafter created," etc. The objection here raised has been set at rest by this court, and against the contention of the plaintiffs. In the case of Lauderdale County v. Ferguson, 7 Lea, 153, it was considered and determined, the court saying: "It has never been contended by anyone that a municipal corporation could not be authorized by a special law to make contracts and levy taxes to meet them." So it was held in that case that certain acts of the legislature providing that the county court of any county through which the line of the Mississippi River Railroad was proposed to be run, might, under certain conditions, subscribe to the capital stock of the company, were not amenable to § 7 of art. 11 of the Constitution of 1834. This decision has never been disturbed by any subsequent holding. On the contrary, if not by direct reference, yet by necessary implication, it was approved in the case of Williams v. Nashville, 89 Tenn. 487, arising under the present Constitution.

The second of these objections, going to the unconstitutionality of this act is disposed of in State v. Wilson, 12 Lea, 246; Ballentine v. Pulaski, 15 Lea, 623, and Williams v. Nashville, supra.

2. We think that the second assignment of error, on the trial judge's holding that the quarterly court properly exercised its power in levying the tax of 5 cents to meet the interest on these bonds, is equally untenable. We have already set out the 6th section of chapter 80 of the Acts of 1895, under which this special tax was levied. The agreed case shows that at the January term, 1896, this court had levied property taxes for various purposes for the year 1896, amounting to 79 cents on the $100. It will be remembered that these bonds were authorized and this tax was directed by an act passed at the regular legislative session of 1895. Subsequently, and at an extra session of the same legislature, a general revenue bill was passed (p. 579, chap. 4) by the second section of which the counties of the state were limited in the levy of a county tax to a rate not exceeding 30 cents on the $100 of taxable property, "exclusive of the tax for public roads and schools and interest on the county debt, except as hereinafter otherwise provided." Section 14 of the same act is as follows: "Be it further enacted that the aggregate amount of special taxes levied by counties shall not exceed the amount limited to them for current expenses." The contention now is that the effect of this general statute is to fix a limit to the taxing power of the county, and, as the agreed case shows that this had already been reached at the date of the levy of the tax, as provided for in chapter 80 of the special act in question, the action of the county court in making such levy was ultra vires and void. We do not think so. The power to issue these bonds and the duty to levy this tax to meet the interest on them were correlative in character. The act makes them inseparable. The duty to pay this interest as it matures is no more a part of the obligation of the contract than the duty to provide the means of paying it by the exercise of this especially provided taxing power. Knowing that the value of the bonds in the markets of the world depended upon the existence of carefully guarded statutory provisions for the levy of taxes to meet both principal and interest, it is inconceivable that the legislature would, while leaving the act authorizing the issuance of the bonds on the statute books, yet by indirection take from it that which gave it its only vital force. In addition, however, sound and well-settled rules of statutory construction are opposed to this insistence. The purpose of § 6 of chap 80 was special. It was to give Knox county the right, and to make it its duty, to levy a tax for the purpose of providing a fund to meet the interest on these bonds, and this without regard to its right or duty with respect to other taxes. The revenue act, on the other hand, was general in its character, and its provisions relate to and govern the general powers of taxation of all the counties of the state. It will not be presumed that this subsequent general legislation, in the absence of reference to it, was intended to either repeal or qualify the power of taxation given in and essential to the integrity of this special act. "A general later [affirmative] law does not abrogate an earlier special one by mere implication. . . . It is usually presumed to have only general cases in view, and not particular cases, which have been otherwise already provided for by the special act." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 228. Or as is said by the author in Black on the Interpretation of Laws (p. 116): "It has come to be an established rule in the construction of statutes that a subsequent act treating a subject in general terms, and not expressly interdicting the provisions of a prior special statute, is not to be considered as intended to affect the more particular and specific provisions of the earlier act, unless it is absolutely necessary so to construe it in order to give its words any meaning at all. This rule is founded upon or expressed by the maxim, Generalia specialibus non derogant."

8. The defendants assigned for error so much of the judgment of the trial judge as held that the county court of Knox county lacked power, under chapter 80, to issue its bonds payable in gold. While this act defines many of the features of the bonds to be issued under it, and limits their aggregate amount to $225,000, it does not prescribe the kind of money in which the bonds and interest coupon are to be paid. The quarterly court directed that principal and interest be made payable in gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness, and upon this feature the principal contention in this case arises. We have been cited by counsel to some cases claimed to bear upon the subject. The first is the case of Moore v. Walla Walla, 60 Fed. Rep. 968. The report of this case is quite meager, but the court uses this language: "I hold that the authority given by the laws of the state to municipal corporations to provide means for constructing works of public utility by issuing and selling negotiable bonds includes authority to redeem such bonds in money of equal value to that which they shall have received." It is apparent from this statement that the general laws of the state gave municipal corporations authority to issue bonds, but under what restrictions or limitations does not appear. It is fairly inferable from the statement that the city of Walla Walla was authorized to issue bonds, and did issue bonds payable in gold, and sold them for gold, in order to obtain the funds necessary to make the improvements. The next case is that of Illibron v. Cuthbert, 96 Ga. 312, decided April, 1895. In this case, by the charter of the city, the mayor and council were given authority to do all things necessary for the benefit of the city, and all things not in violation of the Constitution and laws of the state. It was very appropriately said by 34 L. R. A.

the court that the "general welfare" clause in this charter was very broad and liberal in its terms. The court in passing upon the question now under consideration, in view of this charter said: "No reason now occurs to us, nor was any stated, why it would be unlawful to make the proposed bonds payable in gold or lawful money of the United States, at the option of the holder." This is the only deliverance given upon the subject. It is evident the question was not seriously considered in the case, and was allowed to go by default. The case of Pollard v. Pleasant Hill, 3 Dill. 197, is also cited and relied on. In that case the bonds were payable in legal-tender notes, and the interest coupons were payable in gold coin. The bonds were issued in payment of a subscription to the Pacific Railroad of Missouri. The bonds were in the hands of an innocent holder for value before maturity of the coupons sued on. The court held that the matter was one purely of contract, and when its terms appeared the court would enforce it. What the provisions of the charter of the city of Pleasant Hill were, or what the provisions of the general law, does not appear. This decision was rendered in 1874. The next case is that of Young v. Montgomery & E. R. Co. 9 Woods, 606. It this case the governor for the state of Alabama indorsed the first-mortgage bonds of the railroad company, and the court held that the act of the general assembly authorized the indorsement of bonds bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, and that the fair construction was that it meant 8 per cent in any legal-tender currency on which the parties might agree. It is well to note that this case does not involve the power or right of a city or county to make such agreement, but the act done and liability incurred were those of the state. None of these are cases well decided by courts of last resort except the Georgia case, and in none of them was the matter fully presented and passed upon.

The case of Judson v. Bessemer, 87 Ala. 240, 4 L. R. A. 742, is also relied on. In that case there was a provision authorizing the city of Bessemer to issue bonds for municipal purposes, and it was held that a general power given the city to issue negotiable bonds in the absence of any legislative restriction carries the implied power to make them payable in currency which is constitutionally a legal tender, as in gold coin. The court held that under the rulings of the courts in that state corporations having power to issue securities might exercise such power in the same mode and manner as natural persons may under similar circumstances, there being no legislative restriction nor specifications of a particular mode; citing University of Alabama v. Moody, 62 Ala. 389. It is distinctly stated in this case that the city had express and general power to issue bonds, and under such express power the city of Bessemer had authority to make them payable in gold. The case of Farrison v. Louisville Sinking Fund Comrs., decided by the court of appeals of Kentucky, reported in 97 Ky. 119, is also cited and relied upon. This was a case where the city of Louisville issued its bonds payable, principal and interest, in gold coin. The act authorizing their issuance did not specify in what currency they were to be made payable. The court quoted approvingly the Alabama case above cited, as well as the other cases cited, and lay down the doctrine that powers must be implied such as are incidental to the powers expressly granted, and that the city must be granted discretion, and would not be restricted to the actual powers granted strictly construed. The court treated the matter of the kind of currency as simply one of contract, and at the discretion of the maker or borrower. The case of Woodruff v. Mississippi, reported in 162 U. S. 292, 40 L. ed. 973, should also be noticed. It was a case of levee bonds issued under act of the legislature of Mississippi by a levee board, which was a body corporate under the laws of that state. The authority given to that board was to issue bonds to be sold in the market, the proceeds to be used in building levees against the Mississippi river. The bond issued was in somewhat peculiar form, and uses this language: The levee board "hereby acknowledges themselves indebted to bearer in the sum of $1,000 in gold coin of the United States," but it contained no express promise to pay the amount in gold, or any other special currency. The coupons, however, stipulated to pay the bearer $20 in currency of the United States, being the semiannual interest. The supreme court of Mississippi held that the bonds were payable in gold coin, and that the board of levee commissioners had no power or authority to make them so payable, and that they were void. The Supreme Court of the United States, Chief Justice Fuller delivering the opinion, held that upon a proper construction of the language of the bond it could not be held that it was payable only in gold; that the bonds were not expressly payable in gold coin. The court continues: "It is true that, as they acknowledged an indebtedness in gold coin, and as the coupons were payable specifically 'in currency,' the argument is not unreasonable that the corporation intended the purchasers to expect payment in the money in which the indebtedness was stated to have been contracted; but the agreement to pay the designated sums did not specify any particular kind of money, and the obligation was to pay what the law recognized as money when the payment was to be made. The bonds were therefore legally solvable in the money of the United States, whatever its description, and not in any particular kind of that money, and it is impossible to hold that they were void because of want of power." That the decision in this case rested upon the ground that the bonds were payable in any legal currency, and not alone in gold, though the bond acknowledged an indebtedness in gold, clearly appears throughout the entire case; and Judges Peckham, Brewer, and White were of opinion the holding of the supreme court of Mississippi was a finality upon this point, and the case presented, therefore, no question of Federal jurisdiction.

The resolution of the county court in regard to the bonds in controversy allows no latitude for construction. It provides that both the principal and interest of the bonds shall be payable in gold coin of the United States of the present standard of weight and fineness. The form of the bond and coupon is also prescribed, and there is an express promise, in unequivocal language, to pay both bond and interest coupon in gold coined money of the United States of the present standard of weight and fineness. There is, as will be seen, no latitude for holding that, if the standard of the gold coin of the United States should hereafter be changed, the county could get the benefit of it, but the identical gold now coined, of the present weight and fineness, must be paid, even if the government should change its standard, and no longer issue coins of the present weight and fineness.

It is proper to call attention to the fact that all of the cases cited involve bonds issued by municipal corporations, except one, in which the power and liability of a state is involved; but none of them involve bonds issued by counties. That there is a wide difference between the powers of municipal and county corporations under similar acts of the legislature is well supported by reason and authority. In the case of Soper v. Henry County, 28 Iowa, 284, Dillon, Ch. J., author of the noted work on Municipal Corporations, said: "Counties owe their creation to the statutes," and the statute confers on them all the powers which they possess, prescribes all the duties they owe, and imposes all the liabilities to which they are subject. . . . Considered with respect to their powers, duties, and liabilities, they stand low down in the scale or grade of corporate existences. It is for this reason that they are ranked among what have been styled quasi corporations. This designation is employed to distinguish them from private corporations aggregate, and from municipal corporations proper, such as cities acting under general or special charters, more amply endowed with corporate life and functions, conferred in general at the request of the inhabitants of the municipality for their peculiar and special advantage and convenience. The decisions of the courts in every state in the Union recognizing this distinction, hold incorporated cities and towns to a much more extended liability than they do counties, etc. In his work on Municipal Corporations he says (vol. 1, 4th ed. p. 596, § 509): "In respect to municipal or chartered corporations, our opinion . . . is that they also have no such inherent power and no power whatever, except so far as conferred expressly or by fair implication. This is an important principle, and it results therefrom that there is no presumption in favor of . . . quasi corporations." In 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 382, it is said counties cannot borrow money, issue bonds or negotiable paper, except when and in the manner they may be specially authorized so to do. A county has been defined to be a local organization which, for the purpose of civil administration, is invested with a few functions of corporate existence. Hamilton County Comrs. v. Mighels, 7 Ohio St. 109. It is again said: "Counties being merely parts of the state government, they partake of the state's immunity from liability. The state is not liable except by its own consent, and so the county is exempt from liability unless the state has consented. Counties are not liable to implied common-law liabilities, as municipal corporations are." Browning v. Springfield, 17 Ill. 143, 68 Am. Dec. 345; Perry v. Worcester, 6 Gray, 544, 66 Am. Dec. 431. Counties do not hold and operate under charters as do cities and other municipal corporations. They have no franchises. They make and can make no by-laws. They have the same powers and duties throughout the state. They do not have to provide waterworks and fire departments and lights and the hundred and one necessities for cities and towns. Their ordinary expenses are met by issuance of county warrants, payable out of a general fund collected for all purposes. The occasions for extraordinary expenditures are few, such as the building of jails, court-houses, bridges, and hospitals; and if it becomes necessary to incur a debt for these purposes, which cannot be at once met out of the usual revenues, they must get their authority to create such debts from an enabling act of the legislature, which at the same time gives them the power to provide for its payment by a special tax; and no doctrine is better settled in this state than that the power thus conferred must be strictly construed and exactly followed. In Taxpayers of Milan v. Tennessee C. R. Co. 11 Lea, 334, it is held that a county court cannot issue bonds unless authorized so to do, and then only in the manner and form authorized. It is further held that the power to issue bonds and incur extraordinary debts can only be derived in the way pointed out in the Constitution and laws of the state, and the powers thus conferred must be strictly construed and clearly followed. See also Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davidson County Ct. 1 Sneed, 681; Grant v. Lindsay, 11 Heisk. 686; Taxpayers of Milan v. Tennessee C. R. Co. 11 Lea, 334; Nashville & K. R. Co. v. Wilton County, 89 Tenn. 604; Colburn v. Chattanooga W. R. Co. 84 Tenn. 50.

And this is the general trend of authorities. Thus it is said: The statute authorizing a county contract must be strictly pursued or the contract will not bind the county, and the requirement of the statute must be fulfilled; and a contract, unless made pursuant to statutory authority, will not bind, and a contract ultra vires may always be defended against. 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 359, and note. As an illustration, in Skinner v. Santa Rosa, 107 Cal. 464, 29 L. R. A. 512, it was held that when the statute provides that bonds may be made payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States, they cannot be made payable in gold coin of the United States of the present standard of weight and fineness. It has been tersely said: "The limits of all powers, therefore, except those necessarily implied from the county entity, must be found within the four corners of the statutory provisions made by the legislature." 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 359. The cases cited from Kentucky, Alabama and Georgia clearly show that in those states the rule of liberal construction prevails, but such does not apply in Tennessee nor generally, and certainly does not apply to county or other quasi corporations.

It may be granted that individuals and private corporations aggregate may make contracts to pay in gold, and it has been so held in this state (Wills v. Allison, 4 Heisk. 386); but it by no means follows that county corporations have the same power. As an original proposition it may well be doubted whether it is consonant with the highest and broadest public policy to allow individuals to make gold contracts, but this question we are not called upon to consider. We are of opinion there is neither express nor implied authority conferred by the act in controversy in this case to make the bonds of the county payable, either principle or interest, in gold coin of the present weight and fineness. The act providing for the issuance of bonds also provides for a special tax for the payment of the bonds, principal and interest. Obviously the act contemplates that the bonds and the special tax shall be paid in the same money, for both are authorized in the same act, in similar language, and without distinction as to the money to be raised in the one case and paid out in the other. The act affords no more authority for the issuance of gold bonds than for the assessment and collection of special gold tax for their payment. It certainly cannot be insisted that gold can be collected from the taxpayer to meet the payments as they fall due, and yet this power may as well be implied as that of making the bonds payable in gold. Where can the gold be had unless collected from the taxpayers? The theory of the law is that the fund collected to pay upon these bonds shall be kept separate and apart from all other funds, and a special tax is authorized and provided for that purpose by the same act which provides for the bonds. While the identical money received may not be kept intact, and paid in kind, still the county can only demand from the banks and other custodians of the fund money similar to that collected and deposited. It will then become necessary for the county authorities to go into the market and buy the gold necessary to meet the payments. It matters not whether gold is at a premium or at par or at a discount. In any event, there must be an exchange of funds collected in order to secure it. There is no authority, under the statute or elsewhere, for the county officials to make such exchange. In the contingency that gold may go to a premium, the county must suffer the burden of obtaining it. It is said that the policy of the general government is to keep all legal tender funds at the same value, and that we cannot presume the different kinds of legal-tender money will ever have different values. But evidently this is exactly the contingency that prompts the gold feature in the bonds. Unless there were some advantage to the purchaser or holder of the bonds in having them payable in gold, then there would have been no occasion for the gold feature. It is apparent that, if an advantage accrues to the bondholder because of this provision, it follows inevitably that such an advantage is gained at the expense of the county and taxpayer. It is evident also that, while the general policy of the government may be to-day to keep all of its legal-tender money at par, and of the same value, such may not be its policy next year, or five years or ten years from now, while the bond is still outstanding. If gold should go to a considerable premium, it would increase the burden of the taxpayer. If Knox county can make her bonds payable in gold, so can every other county in the state or in the United States, and then gold would become the only solvable currency in such transactions, contrary to the general policy of the government and to the broadest public interest. In this case not only is it provided that the bond, principal and interest, shall be payable in gold, but it must be gold of the present standard of weight and fineness. If, therefore, the government shall change its standard, and cease to coin its gold of the present standard of weight and fineness, yet the county must still comply with its bond, and obtain, as best it can, and at its own expense, gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness.

It is said the right to pay in legal tender involves the right to pay in any money that is legal tender, and gold, possessing that quality, can be stipulated for; but the error in this is that requiring payment in gold, and in gold alone, deprives the debtor of the right to pay in other legal tender, and compels him to pay in one thing, discriminating against the others, and thus subjecting the debtor to the danger of being placed in a position of embarrassment and peril.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

Beard, J., dissenting:

Not being able to concur with the majority in their conclusion that under the act of 1895 the county lacked the power to issue its bonds payable in "gold coin of the United States of the present standard of weight and fineness," I think it proper to state very briefly the reasons of my dissent. It is true, as is said in the majority opinion, this act fixes many of the features of the bonds which it authorizes the county to issue, and limits their amount to $225,000, yet it does not prescribe the kind of dollars in which they may be made payable. This seems to have been left to the discretion of the county court, the legislature no doubt assuming that it would be exercised with an eye to the best interest of the public. No satisfactory reason has been suggested why this was not a proper and legal exercise of this discretion by that body in the selection of gold as the money in which these bonds and the interest upon them were solvable. Gold is a part of the circulating medium of business, and, with silver and United States notes, constitutes the legal tender money of the country; so that, if these securities were issued payable in "dollars" generally, there is no doubt but the county would have the right to pay, and the creditor would be bound to accept, either of these three kinds of money so tendered to him. That an individual may legally obligate himself to pay his creditor in gold is unquestionable, and we can see no reason why the county of Knox, in the absence of legislative inhibition, and under the terms of this act, may not bind itself to do the same.

This is a question of power, and not of policy. But, if it was the latter, yet, as it has been the declared policy of the United States government since the resumption of specie payment in 1878, to maintain at an equality all of the various kinds of money, gold, silver, and legal-tender notes, it could not be assumed by the courts that this policy would be reversed, so as to bring about a difference in the value, in these various kinds of money. The diligence of able counsel, aided by the investigation of the court, has been able to discover but a few cases involving this question. In these, however, the holding of the courts has been in accord with the view already indicated. In Judson v. Bessemer, 87 Ala. 240, 4 L. R. A. 742, it is held that a power to make city bonds payable in gold is included in the general power to issue them, as this implies the right to make them payable in any constitutional legal tender. In Moore v. Walla Walla, 60 Fed. Rep. 953. It was held that under municipal authority to issue and sell negotiable bonds they could be made payable "in gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness." Where the governor was authorized to indorse railroad bonds on behalf of the state, it was held that he might lawfully indorse such bonds with interest payable in gold. Young v. Montgomery & E. R. Co. 2 Woods, 606. In a suit to enjoin the issuance of municipal bonds "payable in gold or lawful money of the United States, at the option of the holder," it was said by the supreme court of Georgia, "No reason now occurs to us, nor was any stated, why it would be unlawful" to make the proposed bonds so payable. Heilbron v. Cuthbert (1895) 96 Ga. 812. In Parson v. Louisville Sinking Fund Comrs. (1895) 97 Ky. 119, it was insisted that municipal bonds were void because payable in gold coin of the United States while the act under which they were issued was silent as to the character of the money in which they might be discharged. To this the court of appeals said: "These bonds are to be offered on a market in which there is current more than one circulating medium, but one which is regarded more stable and less subject to fluctuation than any other, which is the recognized standard of value, and which is the equivalent of and corresponds in value with, that which the borrower is to receive from its bonds. Can there be any legal reason why the borrower, in case it should seem, in the exercise of a sound discretion, both prudent and advantageous to stipulate for the payment of the loan in that particular medium of circulation, . . . should not be allowed to so contract? It seems not to us." In Skinner v. Santa Rosa, 107 Cal. 464, 29 L. R. A. 512, while the court avoided the bonds in question in that case on account of an amendatory act passed by the legislature of California in 1893, they held that prior to that act "the power to make the bonds payable 'in gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness,' or in any other kind of coin or currency, could not be controverted. . . . The power to determine that question is as ample as that of a natural person to stipulate in what his personal obligations should be paid." In Woodruff v. Mississippi, 162 U. S. 201, 40 L. ed. 978, while the question upon which that case turned was jurisdictional, yet the one now being discussed was to some extent involved, and the majority opinion quotes fully and approvingly from the Alabama and Kentucky cases already referred to, and I do not think there can be any error in assuming that the whole argument of that opinion on this fact is in accord with those cases.

The force of these concurring opinions cannot be broken by the suggestion that we are not in possession of the statutes and Constitutions prevailing in the jurisdiction where these cases arose. The courts which have met and decided this question have not appealed to any provision of the charter of the municipal corporations claiming the right to issue gold bonds, or to any constitutional provisions peculiar to the particular state, but they have rested their decisions on the broader and more satisfactory ground that the legislative authority to pay in "dollars" generally—that is, in all kinds of legal-tender money—includes the right to pay in any one kind of such money. Not a single case involving this special question has been found as authority for the majority opinion, and in the face of these decisions I submit that this court should not place itself in a state of judicial isolation, unless forced into it by the stress of a strong, if not irresistible, logical necessity; and this, I respectfully suggest, does not exist in this case.

But it was said in argument, and we understand it to be the opinion of the majority of the court, that, even if the grant in question had been to a municipal corporation (as was the fact in several of the cases already cited), yet it would hardly, if at all, be sufficient to authorize the issuance of gold bonds, and that, a fortiori, it will not warrant the county in placing such bonds on the market. This is upon the idea, universally admitted, that, while the former is a corporation proper, the latter is less than such a corporation; that is, it is a public quasi corporation. Without consuming time in pursuing the authorities which so clearly and uniformly draw the line between the two, I think a single suggestion disposes of this objection. Both a county and a municipal corporation, when they propose to issue negotiable securities, payable in futuro, and likely to pass into the hands of purchasers who will seek to rely upon a bona fide title to cut off all equities, must be prepared to point out the legislative act granting such power, either in express terms or by necessary implication. One, no more than the other, has the inherent power to bind itself by an issue of negotiable bonds. The full-fledged municipal corporations must appeal to the legislature for this authority, quite as earnestly as this body, called a "public quasi corporation." If it be that both must look to the same source for their authorization in this regard, then whenever either claims that it is within the provisions of an act of the legislature, in the exercise of such a power, the courts will, of necessity, apply the same rules of construction in the one case as in the other. This proposition is so elementary that it requires no citation of cases to support it. Nor do I at all agree that to hold that the county, under this legislative grant of authority, can issue its bonds solvable in gold, involves the necessity of holding that the county, to meet these bonds and the maturing coupons, could levy a tax on the property of its citizens, payable specially in gold. The bonds can be made payable in gold only because the act authorizes their issuance payable in "dollars," and this generic term includes gold, as well as all other kinds of United States money; but the act does not direct a tax to be levied collectible in "dollars." Should these bonds be issued, their holders could stand on their contract rights, and could insist upon payment in gold in accordance with the terms of the bonds. But the taxpayer would stand in no contractual relation, with either these bondholders or the county. His obligation to pay his proportionate part of the tax levied to meet these bonds and interest would rest alone on the statute. It would grow out of the duty imposed upon the county to provide for the payment of these bonds and coupons by the levy of a tax. As to this, the authority given is coextensive with the duty imposed, and that is "to lay and levy a tax sufficient for the payment of the coupons of said bonds as they mature, and also to create a sinking fund," etc. The county is to levy this special tax, but it is to be laid upon the citizens, as it lays all other taxes, collectible in any of the legal-tender funds of the United States. There is not a single word in § 6 of this act (where alone is the taxing power found) that by any rule of interpretation accepted by the courts will warrant the contention that this county, in performing this duty, would have any other or different power from that which it has in levying and collecting any other tax. In this, as in all other cases, the tax would be levied and collected in the money of the country, the citizen paying his proportion in any kind or species of that money which he might select. And the objection that has been made, that the time may come, before the maturity of these bonds, when, the taxes having been paid in the ordinary currency of the country, the county might find itself compelled to go into the market to buy gold to meet its maturing obligations, goes not to the question of a proper interpretation of the statute, but to that of expediency, and as such is of no force, unless it be that the government should change a policy fixed with the resumption of specie payment, as has been before stated, and this we do not think a court is authorized to assume. Entertaining these views, I cannot agree with the majority.

I am authorized to say that Chief Justice Snodgrass concurs with me in this dissent.

W. C. GIBBS, Appt.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A reservation of the right to annual all contracts every fourth month, stamped across the face of a contract with a school teacher, does not entitle the school directors to dismiss him without charges or notice or testimony, under Mill. & V. Code, § 1192, subsec. 3, empowering them to dismiss a teacher "for incompetence, improper conduct, or inattention."
2. An injunction to prevent a school teacher from attempting to teach in a school—house after an ineffectual attempt to dismiss him arbitrarily will not be granted to school directors, although they have by statute the charge and control of the school property.

(October 24, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals affirming a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County enjoining defendant from attempting to teach in a schoolhouse which plaintiffs claimed to control. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lucky, Sanford, & Tyson, for appellant:

To hold that school directors can unlawfully dismiss a teacher, and then come into a court of equity and obtain its aid in making effective the unlawful act, would violate fundamental principles governing that tribunal, principles so thoroughly established as to have become maxims, to wit:

"He who comes into equity must come with clean hands."

"No one can take advantage of his own wrongs."

Gibson, Suits in Chancery, §§ 53, 62.

The court of chancery appeals in its holding followed Chancellor Frank T. Reed, who refused to dissolve an injunction upon bill and answer in a similar case "upon the ground that the directors were entitled to the custody and control of the schoolhouse of the district, and that the remedy of the defendants was by action for the compensation agreed on." However that case was never appealed to the supreme court, and Chancellor Reed on final hearing dissolved that injunction.

Morley v. Power, 5 Lea, 694.

If the directors have the power given by the reservation clause it would be dangerous and fatal to the good name and reputation of every teacher.

Our statutes give no such power, but expressly restrict directors from dismissing teachers except for "incompetency, improper conduct, or inattention to duty" and after a fair hearing.

Morley v. Power, 10 Lea, 219.

Messrs. Trent & Ford for appellees.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainants are school directors in one of the common-school districts of Knox county, and they filed the bill in this cause seeking to enjoin the defendant from attempting to teach any longer in one of the schoolhouses of that district which was under their control, and from interfering with its occupancy by a teacher whom complainants had employed to take charge of the school as the successor of defendant. The facts are these: The defendant, Gibbs, had been elected to the presidency of an academy in this county, and was in the act of accepting that place, when, induced by complainants, he declined it, and entered into an agreement with them to take charge of and teach the district school with regard to which this controversy occurs. This school was to be opened on the 30th of August following, and for his services as such teacher he was to receive a salary of $50 per month. At the time of making this agreement, the defendant was led to believe that his employment would extend through a period of eight months, it being assumed, no doubt, that the fund available for that district would enable the directors to keep the school open for that length of time. On the 27th of August—just three days before his term of service was to begin—the complainants presented to defendant for his signature a paper writing evidencing the contract between the parties, in which it was recited that the defendant was engaged as the teacher of the school in question "from the 30th day of August, 1895," at the rate of $50 per month. This writing, already signed by complainants, as school directors, contained the usual stipulations authorized by law, but fixed no definite term of employment. Across the face of the writing, however, complainants had caused to be stamped the following words: "The directors reserve the right to annul all contracts every fourth month." Knowing that this clause was upon it, the defendant signed it, and on the day designated took his place, and opened up the school. At the end of four months, without any charge being made against him, and without offering any excuse for their action, the complainants notified the defendant that they no longer required his service, and immediately employed another party in his stead. Complainants, undertaking to induct into office the new teacher, found the defendant in possession of the schoolroom, with his pupils around him, denying the right of the directors summarily and without cause to terminate his employment, and insisting that under the contract he was entitled to continue as teacher until the fund appropriated to that school for that scholastic year was exhausted. This position of the defendant led to the filing of the bill in this cause. The chancellor, on the trial of the case, sustained the bill, upon the ground that the clause above set out was a part of the contract, and that it gave the directors the right arbitrarily to terminate this contract at the end of four months; and he made perpetual the injunction originally issued against the defendant. The cause was recently heard on appeal by the court of chancery appeals, and, while disagreeing with the chancellor as to the ground of his decree, that court affirms his decree, but upon the ground that under the law complainants, as school directors, were the custodians of the schoolhouse, and entitled to its possession, and that upon the dismissal of defendant he had no right to retain control of the property, and thus disturb the further harmony of the school or its operations under the supervision of the directors, but his duty was to surrender the schoolhouse, and seek his remedy, if any, elsewhere.

If public directors can legally import into their contracts of employment of public teachers a clause such as the one in question, this case illustrates the wrong and injustice which may be done under cover of law; and we agree with the solicitor of defendant that "such an injustice should not be sanctioned by the courts unless the law clearly permits it." But, independent of the injury that may be done to the individual, public policy would forbid the recognition of such a power unless it is distinctly conferred by the statutes. As has been well urged, if school directors can provide, as in this case, for annulling contracts at the end of four months, they can also reserve the right to terminate them at the end of one month, or at their own pleasure. It is apparent, if they possess such a power, that there will likely be, in the caprice of the directors themselves, or in the real or fancied grievances of the pupils, or of their oversensitive parents or guardians, continually recurring temptations to its abuse. A system which gave such arbitrary authority to school directors could not result otherwise than in lowering the character of teachers and in demoralizing the public schools. It will be observed that the contract which gives rise to this controversy does not limit the term of employment of the defendant, Gibbs, to four months. It is in the usual form prescribed by the regulations adopted under the statute by the superintendent of public instruction, and sent out by him for the use of school directors in the various counties of the state. This form is left indefinite as to the time of the employment, because the length of the period during which common schools are to be kept open depends upon the amount of public funds which come into the hands of the county trustees to which the particular district is entitled. This is always uncertain at the beginning of the scholastic term. What complainants have done in this case is to take this approved form, and supplement it with the reservation to themselves of the right to terminate the contract at the end of four months. This they had no warrant in the law for doing. Under subsec. 8, § 1192, Mill. & V. Code, school directors have the power to employ teachers, and "to dismiss them for incompetence, improper conduct, or inattention." This right of dismissal, however, is limited to the causes of removal specified in the statute. And even for these causes their power is not unlimited, but can only be exercised after charges made against and upon full notice given to the accused, and after hearing the testimony of witnesses given under the sanction of an oath. Morley v. Power, 5 Lea,

691. To permit school directors, under the cover of a reservation, such as the one in question, to dismiss a teacher without charges or notice or testimony, would be to approve an evasion of this statute, as already construed by this court, and to tolerate a practice that would be, in the end, extremely hurtful to our common-school system. We therefore disagree with the chancellor in the view that he took of this stipulation.

But we equally disagree with the court of chancery appeals in their conclusion. It is true that it is the duty of school directors "to take charge of, manage, and control public school property of the district" (Mill. & V. Code, § 1192, subsec. 10); but that is not only for the purpose of preservation, but also with the view of making successful the operation, of the system, which has been carefully organized for the accomplishment of great public good. They have the supervision of it for school purposes, purposed to be subserved only by its occupancy by the teacher properly installed by them, and not yet legally removed, and the qualified pupils of the district. Their right to possession will be protected in all proper cases, but this right is not unlimited, nor is it arbitrary. Now, having exceeded their authority, as we have held, can complainants come into a court of equity, and ask its active aid in assisting them to the accomplishment of an unauthorized end? We think not. To give such aid would be for that court to disregard the well-settled principle that a complainant must show that the transaction from which his claim arises is fair and just, that there is nothing unconscientious in his conduct relative thereto, and that the relief he seeks is equitable, and not harsh or oppressive upon the defendant. Gibson, Suits in Chancery, §§ 53, 62.

The result follows that the decrees of the Court of Chancery Appeals will be reversed, and the bill will be dismissed, at the cost of complainants.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

v.

1. A lessee's agreement to keep in repair a roadway which is below high-water mark and is a mere incident to the right of mooring, loading, and unloading at a leased river front and so-called landing which has no wharf, dock, or pier, and to deliver the premises in "good order and repair" and "make good all damages to said premises except the usual wear and proper use thereof," does not obligate the lessee to protect the bank against an extraordinary peril from a sudden change in the current of the river which washes away a bank that had stood in the same condition for centuries.

2. The destruction of the property extinguishes the liability for rent under a lease of a river front and landing consisting of a narrow footing at the base of a bluff without any wharf, dock, or pier, when the unprecedented ravages of the river effectually destroyed the use of the landing by washing away all but a shallow fragment of the lot, especially when, with the lessor's consent and participation, works were constructed in front of the shore line which destroyed safe access to the landing.

alleged to be due and unpaid; the plaintiff appealing from so much of the decree as refused to enforce the covenants, and defendants appealing from so much as held them liable for rent. Affirmed on plaintiff's appeal. Reversed on defendants' appeal.

Before Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges, and Stevens, District Judge.

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

This is a bill in equity to enforce the specific performance of certain covenants in a lease, and for the collection of rents in arrear. The suit was begun in 1886 by a bill filed by the complainant, as lessor, in the chancery court of the state, at Memphis, Tennessee, and was subsequently removed to the circuit court of the United States by the complainant upon the ground that the defendants were all citizens of a state other than Tennessee. After removal the cause was docketed and tried as an equity suit. A motion made upon final hearing by the complainant to have the suit transferred to the law docket, and for a reformation of the pleadings, was disallowed. The subject-matter of the lease is described as "the river front and landing in front of lots numbers 1, 2, 3, and 4 in block 1, South Memphis, with ample space for a roadway along the landing in all stages of the water, and no more. The said landing to be used by the said lessees for the mooring, storing, and unloading of coal, wood, and ice barges or boats." The lease began November 1, 1882, and was to continue until October 1, 1889. Eighty-three notes for $75 each were executed, one being payable each month during continuance of the lease. The rent notes, up to and including that due April 1, 1886, were paid at maturity. The notes falling due in May, June, July, and August, 1886, were due and unpaid when the bill was filed. The subsequent instalments of rent fell due pending the suit and, by a supplemental bill filed after expiration of the lease, relief was sought upon them. The prayer of the bill was for a specific performance of certain covenants touching the repair and construction and preservation of the roadway mentioned in the lease, and for an account for waste resulting from the caving in of the bank of the river at the landing, and for a decree for rents past due. The defendants abandoned the premises in April, 1886, claiming that the "landing" referred to in the lease had been destroyed without their fault, and the lease thereby terminated. They further claimed that all possibility of beneficially using the said landing, if otherwise available, was destroyed by the conduct of the lessor in aiding and abetting in the obstruction of access to the lessor's remaining river front by the construction of certain sunken dikes, extending from the shore perpendicularly for several hundred feet, and effectually preventing barges from being safely brought to the shore line. Touching these defenses it is necessary to state certain other facts. The lessor owned four town lots, contiguous. Each had a width of 40 feet and a depth of 150 feet. These lots fronted on Tennessee street, which ran parallel with the Mississippi river, and were bounded on the rear by the river. Mrs. Wait had two residences on these lots, fronting on and near to Tennessee street, and lived in one of them. The river bank was a high bluff of earthy material, known geologically as "loess." The height of this bluff above low-water mark was from 60 to 80 feet. Between the base of this bluff and the margin of the river at low water was a narrow "footing" along which the roadway mentioned in the lease was maintained. Whether this footing, as it is called by the witnesses, was natural, or the result of an artificial cutting away of the bluff, does not appear. Its material was identical with that of the bluff, and it was as subject to caving by action of a strong current, and was under water when the river was at a high stage. This footing was the only basis for a road giving access to the river, and constituted the landing referred to in the lease, there being no wharf, dock, or pier whatever. The landing had long before this lease been used as a place for mooring and unloading coal barges. The manner in which the unloading was done both before and after the lease is described by the witness C. B. Byran as follows: "A long float was moored against the bank, on which the teams of C. B. Bryan & Co. were driven, and the barges or boats of coal were on the outside of said float, and the coal thrown from those boats or barges into the carts, driven on the float as before stated. Then the teams were driven off the float onto the roadway leading up from the river, and along and under the bank onto Beal street; thence up into the city. A lot of ground having a river front, belonging to the city of Memphis, which extended from the south of Linden street to Beal street, enabled C. B. Bryan & Co. to have a continuous way and outlet from the float and barges moored in front of Mrs. Wait's property." Prior to May, 1886, this landing and roadway had been kept in proper repair, and in like condition to that in which it was at date of the lease. Although prior to that month there had been an occasional caving in of the roadway, it had not been serious, and the ravages of the river had been easily repaired. In the spring of 1886, and during the months of April and May, certain government works protecting Hopefield point, above and across the river, gave way, by reason of the force of the current and high stage of the river. The result was that an uncontrollable current was thrown directly against the river bank in front of Mrs. Wait's property, and the property contiguous to hers above and below.

This sudden and surprising change in the force and direction of the current of a swollen and mighty stream resulted in undermining the bluff, and causing it to fall down in great masses. So destructive was the force of the flood that when the river fell and the current somewhat abated nothing remained of complainant's property but a narrow and ragged fringe from 15 to 30 feet in depth. This remnant clinging to Tennessee street presented to the river an almost vertical bank from 60 to 80 feet above the ordinary stage of the river, its surface showing great cracks indicative of further caving. At its foot was deep water, against which a strong and almost resistless current was beating. Against this irregular bluff it was dangerous to moor water craft, both because further caving was plainly indicated, and because the force of the current was so great as to make it dangerous and impracticable. The evidence is convincing that it was impracticable to construct a footing at the base of the bluff for a new road. The remaining portion of complainant's property was not deep enough to permit the cutting away of the bluff in such manner as to protect a new road against the overhanging masses of the shattered bank. It was therefore impossible to reconstruct a practical and safe landing upon her water front; for, without access to and from the public streets of the city, barges could not be there loaded and unloaded. To moor, land, or unload became impossible when the landing referred to in the lease was destroyed, and the bluff's footing carried into the river. To lie under a bluff that was caving in great masses was perilous and practically impossible, in view of the great current sweeping against it. Under these circumstances the lessees treated the lease as terminated, and found a harbor and landing elsewhere. Certain works subsequently constructed in the river for the purpose of breaking the force of the current added to the unavailability of the lessor's remaining water front as either a mooring or landing place. These works consisted in a series of large cribs filled with rock and sunken in lines perpendicular to the shore, and extending some 300 feet beyond low-water mark. One crib was sunken upon top of another, the crest of the line being at about high-water mark. Five of these dikes were constructed along the river front. The distance between each was about 800 feet. Until by accretion the water front of her shore property should be extended to the outer end of the dikes, access to the shore was so seriously obstructed by the presence of these sunken cribs of rock as to be substantially impossible for such crafts as laden coal barges. It has been contended that these dikes were constructed by the United States government as a part of its scheme of river and harbor improvement. We do not find this contention supported by the facts. It is true that some government material was used, and that the work was done under the plans and direction of Capt. S. S. Leech of the engineer corps, and that the fleet and plant belonging to the government had been used in the prosecution of the work. The enterprise was, however, a private conception, and for the protection of private interests imperiled by the sudden change in the current of the river. The scheme was put on foot by a railroad company whose tracks occupied Tennessee street, which offered to subscribe $40,000 if private persons having interests likewise endangered would give half that amount. The emergency was a great one, and the secretary of war, under his discretionary powers, allowed Capt. Leech to supervise the work and use the government fleet and material in his charge. The enterprise was in all its essentials a private matter, for private purposes and benefits, and the fund used in doing the work was voluntarily contributed by those whose interests were benefited. That the complainant Mrs. Wait was one of those who actively aided and induced the construction of these works is clear on this record. It is true that she feebly denies that she agreed to contribute to the fund, but admits she approved and encouraged the work. The weight of the evidence establishes that she not only approved and encouraged the scheme, but that she promised a large contribution, which she has since refused to pay. Upon these facts defendants insist that if the lease was not terminated by the destruction of the landing through the action of the current of the river, they have been evicted as a necessary result of being excluded from the shore by obstructions in the river, placed there through the aid and consent of the lessor. Upon final hearing the circuit court sustained the jurisdiction, and held that the lease had not been terminated by the destruction of the landing or roadway mentioned in the lease, and that the lessees continued liable for rents accruing until the end of the term fixed by the lease, and gave judgment accordingly. That court further held that the covenants of the lease touching the repair of the roadway, and against waste, had not been breached, and refused all other relief prayed. Both parties have perfected appeals and assigned error.

Messrs. William M. Randolph & Sons, for plaintiffs:

O'Neil & Co. were not relieved by the sudden and irresistible flow of the current of the Mississippi river against the front of the landing, and the consequent destruction thereby of the leased premises, from the performance of the contract on their part contained in the lease.

The covenants contained in the lease amount to a covenant by O'Neil & Co. to repair and keep the premises in repair during the term of the lease, and to return them in as good condition as they were when leased at the end of the term.

Wood, Land. & T. § 378.

There is no implied warranty in a lease that the leased premises will remain in the condition they were when leased, or shall remain fit for any particular use, or shall remain or be in any particular condition during the lease.

Wood, Land. & T. § 382; Tiedeman, Real Prop. §§ 187, 195, 196, 854; 2 Kerr, Real Prop. § 1302; Taylor, Land. & T. §§ 303, 308, 309.

In the lease which Mrs. Wait for herself and her children made to O'Neil & Co. there was an express reservation of the right to make such repairs at any time as were necessary to the security or preservation of the leased premises. This reservation gave Mrs. Wait and her children the right to do the work done under the supervision of Capt. Leech, provided it was necessary to the preservation of the premises, and properly done.

Wood, Land. & T. § 369.

Contracts for building or for the construction of works, and the like, falling within the exceptions to the rule that contracts for the erection or repair of buildings, the construction of works, and the conduct of operations requiring time, special knowledge, skill, and personal oversight, will not be specifically enforced, may be specifically enforced.

Pom. Spec. Perf. Cont., § 23, and the cases referred to. See also §§ 808, 812.

The Code, § 3387 (3515), declares: "No guardian shall let or farm out any land of his ward for a longer term than until the majority of such ward, or in any manner but by lease in writing stipulating, (1) that the tenant shall improve the same; (2) that he keep the houses, orchards, and fences already on or to be erected on the same in sufficient repair, and so leave them at the expiration of the lease; (3) that he shall not commit, but shall prevent all kinds of waste; and (4) that he shall not employ timber for any other purpose than for the immediate use of the plantation."

The covenants in the lease made by Mrs. Wait for herself and her children, so far as she made them as guardian, were therefore made in obedience to the express requirements of the statute.

As the lease was made in obedience to the law, and the covenants and agreements which the present bill seeks to have specifically performed are simply those the law required should be put in the lease, they do not belong to the class which the court has the discretion not to enforce.

If there is now any impracticability in O'Neil & Co.'s specifically performing the covenants contained in the lease, or in the way of the court by the proper decree now enforcing such specific performance, such impracticability has arisen out of the facts which have 34 L. R. A.

transpired since the suit was begun, and while it was pending in the court below. Certainly Mrs. Wait and her children cannot suffer any injury or loss by reason of such change of circumstances after they had come into court for the redress of their grievances.

Messrs. Turley & Wright, for defendants:

Is it reasonable to suppose that the defendants would have obligated themselves to turn the current of such a river as the Mississippi, involving as it necessarily would, if not an impossibility, the expenditure of a large sum of money? Certainly no such obligation is expressed in the lease. A covenant to restore in good order and condition, wear and tear excepted, is not breached where the thing perishes from inherent defect.

Messrs. Stephens, Lincoln & Smith also for defendants.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Nine years after this cause had stood at issue as an equity cause, and when being finally heard, the defendants objected to the jurisdiction of a court of equity upon the ground that the remedy at law was plain and adequate, and moved to have the pleadings recast and the cause transferred to the law docket. This motion was denied upon the ground that the case belonged to a class of cases where a court of equity might exercise jurisdiction; one object of the bill being to obtain the specific performance of an alleged covenant obligating the lessees to construct and keep in good repair a roadway along the river bank, and by which access to the landing might be had. Although the court refused a decree for specific performance, or damages in lieu thereof, it does not follow that jurisdiction did not exist to hear and decide the contention that complainant was entitled to that relief. The result reached was in large part a consequence of a construction of the covenants of the lease in the light of the peculiar character of the thing leased, and of the extraordinary cause which had destroyed the roadway and landing which it was sought to have reconstructed under the covenants in question. A case was stated on the face of the pleadings which fairly and reasonably appealed to a court of equity as affording ground for applying for the extraordinary, though discretionary, remedy of specific performance, and required evidence and a patient hearing before determination. Even though specific performance might be refused, yet the court might retain the case, and grant under the prayer for general relief some other relief, as at law. The principle applying was well stated by the learned trial judge when he said: "If this bill be of that class often appearing, whether for specific performance or what not of other equitable appearance, in which a court of equity might maintain and grant relief as at law, although denying the equitable relief which has been prayed, the rule that the case would be dismissed because there was an adequate and complete remedy at law would not apply, unless it were taken at the earliest opportunity." 72 Fed. Rep. 354.

This rule, considered and applied by this court in Reynolds v. Watkins, 22 U. S. App. 83, 9 C. C. A. 273, and 60 Fed. Rep. 824, seems to be as applicable here as in that case. It is true that in that case, as well as in those upon which it is founded, the objection to the jurisdiction was first taken in the court of appeals or in the supreme court. Still the principle applying is so far the same as to require objection to be taken seasonably, and if for fault in that regard, the trial court refuses to entertain the motion, and the case be one of a class over which a court of equity may, under proper circumstances, entertain jurisdiction, this court will not be readily moved to disturb the action of the lower court. The discussion of this question found in the opinion of the learned trial judge is so full and satisfactory that we find no necessity of further elaboration. The objection to the jurisdiction must be overruled.

The contention of the complainant is that the lessees were bound to protect her property against the ravages of the Mississippi river, and to this end were bound, if necessary, to construct in the river such a system of mattresses and dike work as that which subsequently proved sufficient to prevent further encroachment and caving. They say that, for failure to do this before the flood came, they must now compensate the lessor for all the injuries wrought by the flood, or restore the property to the condition it was in when let, by specifically performing the obligation to keep the "roadway thereon" in repair, and the covenant which bound them to deliver the premises in "good order and repair," and "make good all damages to said premises, except the usual wear and proper use thereof." They further insist that defendants are liable for the covenanted rental to the end of the term. It is clear upon the proof that there is not enough left of the complainant's property on which to construct and maintain a road. The grading necessary could not be done without cutting down Tennessee street. It is further made perfectly clear that no amount of mattressing and diking done in front of complainant's lots alone would have been of any avail. To protect her front from this sudden and uncontrollable current, it was essential that a comprehensive system of diking should be constructed, extending above and below her water front. Defendants had no right to occupy riparian property of other abutters on the river, or obstruct access to their shore line by the works necessary to protect Mrs. Wait's property. Her front only extended along the river for a distance of 240 feet. The protective work deemed necessary to protect the shore line, including Mrs. Wait, covered the river front for a distance of 2,200 feet. Her landing and roadway had safely stood against the ordinary currents of the river for an indefinite time, and the bluff over the roadway had been unaffected, possibly for centuries. The usual abrasions of the shelf or footing along which the road ran had been easily repaired, and this roadway and landing, confessedly in "good order and condition" when the lease was made, was preserved in like condition down to the sudden and unexpected change in the great current of the river resulting from the giving away of Hopefield point, on the Arkansas shore, and above Memphis. The restoration of her property is physically impossible, and the prayer for specific performance must be refused.

Is she entitled to an account for damages as for waste, or a judgment for rents accruing after the termination of the landing and roadway? Her claim for relief in one form or another, as well as for rent, is founded upon a construction of the covenants of the lease which we think cannot be supported. This lease appears to have been filled out on one of the usual blank forms sold by stationers for the leasing of lands and tenements, and contains the covenants proper to a common-law demise of improved premises. The covenants material to be considered are these:

(a) "And the said first party [the complainant] covenants that she will keep and secure said second parties in the peaceful use and possession of said premises during the time of this lease, unless default of payment of rent or other condition of this contract be made." (b) "The second parties [defendants], for and in consideration of the use of said premises, agree to pay said first party or her assigns the sum of $6,325, payable in eighty-three monthly installments." (c) "The second parties [defendants] agree to deliver up to said first party [complainant], or her assigns, the said premises, at the expiration of this lease, in good order and condition, and to make good all damages to said premises, except the usual wear and proper use of the same, and to keep the roadway thereon in good repair." (d) "It is further agreed by the parties of the second part that they will, if necessary, construct at their own expense a roadway of boats, piling, or plank along the river front of said lots, and to construct the same without unnecessary digging of the ground on said lots, and to maintain the same during the continuance of this lease. Said second parties stipulate not to commit, but to prevent, waste." (e) "It is further agreed that no alterations or repairs shall be done on any part of said premises by said second parties without the first party's consent in writing, under penalty of double the cost necessary to put the premises in the condition they were when leased to said second parties; and the second party shall not at any time remove any permanent repairs, improvements, additions, or fixtures put on said premises, but the first party shall have and hold all the same at the end of said lease. Said first party reserves the right to make such repairs at any time as are necessary to the security or preservation of said premises."

The line italicized in paragraph c and the whole of paragraph d were inserted by interpolation.

The construction of all grants, deeds, contracts, and leases must be made with reference to their subject-matter. As well observed by his honor, the trial judge, in the opinion filed in this case: "The court ought to take into consideration the circumstances attendant upon the transaction, the particular situation of the parties, and the state of the thing granted, and that every grant of a thing necessarily imports a grant of it as it actually exists, unless the contrary is provided for." In the case of Doe, Freeland, v. Burt, 1 T. R. 703, it was said by Ashhurst, J., "that the construction of all deeds must be made with a reference to their subject-matter, and it may be necessary to put a different construction on leases made in populous cities from that on those made in the country." This language was quoted and approved by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Met. 448-456, where the lease under consideration was a demise of a cellar and basement in a house three stories in height, the court saying: The principle authorized "a construction of leases of lower or upper rooms, demised separately, in reference to the termination or destruction of the interest, different from that usually applied to leases of entire buildings."

And although the court in that case reached the conclusion that the lessee of a room or apartment in a building in which there were other rooms or apartments did take an interest in the adjacent land on which the building stood, yet the circumstances were so peculiar as to justify the inference that "the lessee's right of occupation of the land is an interest, for the time being, defeasible by the destruction of the building by fire." In Winton v. Cornish, 5 Ohio, 477-479, the construction of a lease like that in Stockwell v. Hunter was under consideration. Touching the meaning and intent of the agreement, the court said that "what passes depends upon the intention of the parties, to be collected from the lease;" that "by the term 'land' anything terrestrial may pass, but by any other term, nothing else passes but what falls with the strictest propriety within the meaning of the term used." The lessee's interest in the land supporting the building was held to terminate when the building was destroyed. This lease was not an ordinary demise of land and tenements, but was a lease of "the river front and landing in front of lots numbers 1, 2, 3, and 4, block 1, South Memphis, with ample space for a roadway along the landing at all stages of the water, and no more." This included no tenement, wharf, dock, or pier, for no such improvement existed, or had ever existed. The use to which the thing or interest leased was to be put is stated and defined. It was "to be used by the lessees for mooring, storing, loading, and unloading coal, wood, and ice barges or boats." Clearly, Mrs. Wait did not demise her lots, or any other interest than her rights as a riparian proprietor. These leased rights were such as were appurtenant to her land on the shore, and would pass by a conveyance of those lots, as an appurtenance. Such an interest is not "land," in its full legal sense, because land cannot be appurtenant to land. Harris v. Elliott, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 25-54, 9 L. ed. 333, 344; East Haven v. Hemmingway, 7 Conn. 203; Potomac S. B. Co. v. Upper Potomac S. B. Co. 109 U. S. 685, 27 L. ed. 1074; Linthicum v. Ray, 78 U. S. 9 Wall. 241, 19 L. ed. 657. The rights of a riparian proprietor whose land is bounded by a navigable stream were defined in Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497-504, 19 L. ed. 984-986, to be "access to the navigable part of the river from the front of his lot, the right to make a landing, wharf, or pier for his own use, or for the use of the public, subject to such general rules and regulations as the legislature may see proper to impose for the protection of the rights of the public, whatever those may be." In Lyon v. Fishmongers' Co. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 662, Lord Cairns describes such appurtenant riparian rights as "a form of enjoyment of the land, and of the river in connection with the land." In Potomac S. B. Co. v. Upper Potomac S. B. Co., cited heretofore, this interest is described as not a seisin of the submerged land between high and low water, but as "right of occupation merely, properly termed a 'franchise.'" 109 U. S. 685, 27 L. ed. 1074.

The subject-matter of this lease was not Mrs. Wait's land, or any interest in it other than that riparian right, franchise, or enjoyment which was appurtenant to her lots, and would pass by a deed conveying them. The "ample space for a roadway," "and no more," mentioned in the second paragraph of the lease, is further specifically designated in the next paragraph as the "roadway thereon," and this "roadway thereon" the lessees undertook to keep in repair. This roadway was below high water, at base of the bluff, and was a mere incident to the right of mooring and loading and unloading. It was the means of access to the landing or river; a way of necessity, without which the essential thing granted could not be enjoyed. The right to occupy or use this "road thereon," either as a means of access to or egress from the "landing," though an interest or right in land, was a mere right of use and occupation, defeasible by the destruction of the landing to which it was an incident. Construing the covenants in the light of the peculiar property demised as the thing granted actually existed, it is not possible that the parties intended that the lessees should undertake the protection of Mrs. Wait's land on shore against the extraordinary perils from a sudden change of the currents of the Mississippi river, nor was any such peril within the reasonable expectation of the parties. This bluffy bank had stood in substantially the same condition for centuries. Its base was subject to such abrasion as was usual from high stages of the river, and to the extent that such ordinary tides might be guarded against, or its ravages repaired, the covenants may properly be held to apply. The event which operated to throw down the bluff and destroy her shore line as a landing, and cut off access to the river by the roadway at the base of the bluff, was one of those fortuitous calamities which it is unreasonable to suppose was within the meaning of covenants appropriate to leases wherein lands and tenements are the subject of the demise. We are therefore in entire agreement with the learned trial judge in holding that "the parties did not intend anything more than that the lessees should keep the landing in such repair and condition of usefulness as was required for the uses to which they were to put it, and as then held, as against the ordinary destructive influences operating to abrade the bank or displace the appliances serving that use." That no such extraordinary works were to be constructed by the lessees as were ultimately found necessary to hold what remained of her shore line is not only evident from the intrinsic nature of the case, but is indicated by the provision of the lease prohibiting alterations or repairs to the premises without the consent in writing of the lessor and by the right reserved to the lessor to make such repairs as should be necessary "to the security or preservation of the premises." As we have already seen, the mattressing and diking done to protect the fragment of her shore line effectually destroyed access to the shore during the remainder of the term. It could not be expected that the beneficial use of the landing should be destroyed in order to guard it against caving, and if such protective works had been constructed by the lessees it is easy to conceive that the lessor would have sought to hold the lessees liable upon the covenant against waste for having destroyed her landing and harbor by works which for many years were likely to make access to it perilous and impracticable.

Upon the remaining point for decision we find ourselves unable to agree with the trial court, which held that the covenant to pay rent was not extinguished by the destruction of the property. In support of this position the opinion cites Taylor, Land. & T. §§ 329, 347, 860, 878, 886; 8 Kent, Com. 465; Balfour v. Weston, 1 T. R. 810; Doe, Ellis, v. Sandham, Id. 705; Hallett v. Wylie, 8 Johns. 44, 3 Am. Dec. 457; Fowler v. Bott, 6 Mass. 63; and the observation of Mr. Justice Gray as to the distinction between the rule of the civil and common law in Viterbo v. Friedlander, 120 U. S. 707-712, 30 L. ed. 776, 777. It will be found upon examination that these authorities correctly state the rule of the common law where lands are the subject of the demise and the buildings or improvements are accidentally destroyed before the term ends. In such cases the destruction of buildings by fire, tempest, or flood does not discharge the covenant to pay rent, in the absence of a stipulation to that effect. The reason for this severe rule is that the land is deemed the subject of the demise, and the buildings a mere incident. If the land remained to the tenant after the buildings were destroyed, and he had a right to occupy and use it, his liability for rent, without abatement, was held to continue. To the authorities cited by the learned trial judge we may add Banks v. White, 1 Sneed, 618, a Tennessee case, in which the common-law rule was held applicable to such leases. In view of the fact that rent is a compensation for the use of the thing demised, it has been regarded as a harsh rule, and contrary to natural justice, that liability for rent should continue after the possibility of beneficial use had been destroyed by accident, and at an early day some of the judges struggled against its severity. Richards le Taverner's Case, 1 Dyer, 56a. These early efforts to mitigate it were unavailing, and the rule was finally settled as stated. Gates v. Green, 4 Paige, 855; Fowler v. Bott, 6 Mass. 63. But the very foundation upon which the old rule was rested is removed if the subject-matter of the demise is destroyed. This exception is noticed by Justice Gray in his statement of the common-law rule in Viterbo v. Friedlander, when he adds, "unless at least the injury is such a destruction of the land as to amount to an eviction." Where the subject-matter of the lease is a room or an apartment in a building, and the building is destroyed, the lease is terminated, the interest of the tenant is at an end, and the covenant to pay rent extinguished. This rule is bottomed upon the fact that under such leases it is to be presumed that the interest of the tenant in the subject land was to continue only so long as the subject matter of the lease existed. This doctrine is well settled and is clearly stated by Mr. Taylor in his admirable work upon Landlord and Tenant, at § 520. As stated by him, it has never been repudiated or questioned in cases where it was applicable, so far as our researches have extended, and has been applied in many well-reasoned cases; among them, we cite Winton v. Cornish, 5 Ohio, 477; Kerr v. Merchants' Exchange Co. 8 Edw. Ch. 815; Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Met. 448, 45 Am. Dec. 220; Mo-

Millan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356, 94 Am. Dec. 654; Graves v. Berdan, 26 N. Y. 498. In the case at bar we have already determined that the subject-matter of this lease was the landing, as it existed at date of lease. A "landing" implies a place where vessels can be moored and loaded or discharged. This landing was effectually destroyed by the ravages of the river. If the effect of the force of the current had been limited to merely moving the shore line back, and the new shore line had been substantially as useful as the old, it might well be held that the leasehold continued in existence. But this was not the case. The bank of the river, as it existed after the caving had been arrested, was a vertical bluff, from 60 to 80 feet high. Against this a vessel could not be moored, and her cargo could not be discharged. The physical aspects of the river bank had been so changed, as a consequence of the uncontrollable current of the river, that, although complainant continued to be a riparian proprietor, she no longer had a "landing," in the sense in which the parties had used that term, nor was it possible by reasonable effort to make a landing. The shallow fragment of her lot clinging to Tennessee street was insufficient in depth to permit the construction of a landing and roadway at its base. Aside from this, the construction of mattresses and dikes in front of her shore line effectually destroyed safe access to her shore line from the navigable parts of the stream. It is true that she reserved the right to make such "repairs" as should be "necessary to the security and preservation of the premises." But this did not authorize the construction of works which would make the use of the landing perilous and useless to her lessees. The diking which was done was done with her consent, and legally by and through her procurement, in co-operation with others. This improvement operated to destroy the landing, if it can be said to have had an existence after the caving of her bank had been arrested. In a legal sense, her conduct amounted to an eviction. When the wrongful acts of a lessor upon or in regard to the leased premises are such as to deprive the lessee of the beneficial enjoyment of them, and the lessee in consequence abandons the premises, it amounts in law to an eviction, without other evidence that the landlord intended to deprive the tenant of the possession. Skally v. Shute, 183 Mass. 867. Where repairs are not ordinary, but of a character to deprive the tenant of the beneficial enjoyment of the premises, they will amount to an eviction, if the tenant elects to abandon the premises. Hoessler v. Fleming, 91 Pa. 822. The defendants did not assent to the so-called "repairs." They foresaw that the effect would be to exclude them from the beneficial use of the river front, and made unavailing protest in order to save their rights.

The decree must be affirmed in so far as it refused a decree for waste or specific performance, and reversed in so far as it held defendants liable for rents. The costs of both courts will be paid by complainants.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Francis P. RYDER, Appt.,

v.

Plummer R. KINSEY, Respnt.

(62 Minn. 35.)

1. The owner of a building is not an insurer against accident from its condition.

*Headnotes by STARR, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Individual Liability for falling walls or buildings.

In most of the cases upon this subject, absence of negligence has not been shown, so that RYDER v. KINSEY, in which such absence appears to the satisfaction of the court, is a valuable addition to the law upon the subject. The cases in most marked contrast with RYDER v. KINSEY are from Louisiana, where the statute renders the owner liable for the fall of a building, and it seems that the absence of negligence is not a defense. It would seem that the circumstances should be very peculiar to deprive a person of compensation for injuries received while on a public highway, and caused by the fall of an adjoining building, and recovery has been permitted in a large majority of the cases. The question of most difficulty in all cases of injuries caused by the fall of buildings has been, Upon whom does the liability rest?

Liability of owner or occupier.

The mere fact that a person is owner and proprietor of a building does not render him liable for 34 L. R. A.

but, so far as the exercise of ordinary care will enable him to do so, he is bound to keep it in such condition that it will not, by any insecurity, or insufficiency for the purpose to which it is put, injure any person rightfully in, around, or passing it.

2. Where a building falls without any apparent cause, in the absence of explanatory circumstances, negligence will be presumed, and the burden is upon the owner of showing injuries caused by its fall. The liability may be on the occupier. Chauntler v. Robinson, 4 Exch. 163, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 170.

The occupier of a house which becomes so out of repair that it is liable to fall into the highway may be indicted for failure to repair, although he is but a tenant at will. Reg. v. Watts, 1 Balc. 357.

If while a building is in possession of a tenant it is destroyed by fire so that the walls become a nuisance to the public, and while in that condition the tenant gives a third person the right to remove the metal from the premises so that thereafter the premises are in the joint possession of the two parties, they are liable if the walls fall and injure persons on the street adjoining it, and not the owner of the building. Grogan v. Broadway Foundry Co. 87 Mo. 321.

If the tenant overload the floors of a ruinous building so that they and the merchandise put upon them fall into the cellar to the injury of a lessee of the cellar, the tenant will be liable for the injury. Edwards v. Halinder, Popham, 46.

A landlord is not liable for injuries caused by the that he exercised ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition; but where it appears from such explanatory circumstances that the cause of the fall of the building was a latent defect in its construction, and there is no evidence tending to connect such cause with the owner's negligence, the burden rests upon the party asserting such negligence to show that such cause might have been discovered and removed before the accident by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the owner.

3. Evidence considered, and held that the jury were properly instructed to return a verdict for the defendant.

(July 10, 1895.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff for an order of the District Court for Ramsey County over-ruling a motion for a new trial after a verdict had been directed in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles N. Akers and D. D. Williams, for appellant:

The law makes it the duty of the owner of a building to keep it in proper order, so that no one may be injured by it.

Ignorance of the condition of the building, or the fact that the defect could not easily be detected, would not relieve the owner from liability.

Barnes v. Beirne, 88 La. Ann. 280; Tucker v. Illinois C. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 114; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 702, and cases cited.

fall of a wooden awning attached to the wall of his building in consequence of the tenant's permitting a crowd of people to stand upon it. Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 503, 68 Am. Rep. 563.

But the owner of a building who aids in the construction of a wooden awning is liable for injuries caused by the fall of it and a portion of the wall to which it is attached by reason of the insufficiency of the wall to support the burden. Riley v. Simpson, 83 Cal. 217, 7 L. R. A. 622.

Under the Louisiana statutes the owner of a building is answerable for the damages occasioned by its ruin when this is caused by neglect to repair it or when it is the result of a vice in its original construction. Howe v. New Orleans, 13 La. Ann. 481.

And it is immaterial whether the building becomes unsafe by agencies of time or weather or the acts of trespassers. Tucker v. Illinois C. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 114.

In Odell v. Solomon, 13 Jones & S. 119, a tenant in possession of a building is liable to one injured by the fall upon him of a portion of the building by reason of failure to keep it in safe condition, although the landlord has neglected to make repairs.

But in the higher court it was held that a tenant in possession of a building is bound only to reasonable care that it shall not cause injury to others. And in order to hold him liable for injuries caused by the fall of a portion of the building upon a passerby negligence must be established as matter of fact. Constructive negligence is not sufficient. Odell v. Solomon, 99 N. Y. 635.

If a wall is a nuisance when a lease of it is given, and it subsequently falls upon and injures a person rightfully upon adjoining property, both landlord and tenant may be held liable for the injury. Timlin v. Standard Oil Co. 84 Hun. 44.

The owner of land will be liable for damages done to an adjoining owner by the fall of chimneys which were in a ruinous condition when he leased the property to a tenant. Todd v. Flight, 9 C. B. N. S. 377, 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 21, 3 L. T. N. S. 326, 9 Week. Rep. 145.

If only portions of the building are in possession of tenants, and a third person is injured by the falling of fire walls and a cornice, the owner is liable unless it is shown that such portions of the building were in possession of the tenants. O'Connor v. Andrews, 81 Tex. 28; O'Connor v. Curtis (Tex.), 13 S. W. 953.

For liability of landlord when a portion of the walls remain in his possession, see note to Jones v. Millsaps (Miss.) 23 L. R. A. 157.

Upon the question of the liability of the landlord as distinguished from that of the tenant for the fall of walls in possession of the tenant, see note to Lee v. Molaughlin (Me.) 23 L. R. A. 197.

Building in possession of contractor.

One who is engaged in excavating a cellar under a building is liable, in case he does the work so negligently as to cause the building to fall, to a clerk in the store who is injured by the fall of the building while in the cellar, where he has gone to recover the hat of a customer, which has been carried there by the wind. Lamparter v. Wallbaum, 45 Ill. 444, 92 Am. Dec. 225.

A subcontractor for a portion of a building, who removes braces put up by the subcontractor for the mason work to keep the walls from falling, is liable to the latter in case the wall is blown down because of the absence of braces. Pasquini v. Lowry, 44 N. Y. S. R. 339.

The owners of a building which is being erected by independent contractors are liable for injuries caused by its fall if it is erected in such an unskilful and dangerous manner as to constitute a nuisance. But if the wall is erected in an ordinarily substantial and safe manner, and is overthrown by the operation of extraordinary causes against which ordinary skill, care, and foresight would not provide, the owner will not be liable. Deford v. State, Keyser, 30 Md. 179.

If the owner contracts with a third person to have his building raised and a story put under it the owner is not liable for injuries caused by the fall of the building during the time of making the repairs, if the contractor was a person of proper skill and the work was not a nuisance. Connors v. Hennessey, 112 Mass. 90.

If during the process of constructing a wall it falls because of defective plans the owner is liable, but if because of negligence or want of care and skill of the independent contractor the latter only is liable. Lancaster v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 92 Mo. 460.

If one who has contracted to put up the iron front of a building sublets the contract to one who has the entire charge of the work the contractor will not be liable for injuries caused by the fall of the building in consequence of the negligence of the subcontractor. Peyton v. Richards, 11 La. Ann. 62.

If the wall is being constructed by an independent contractor the owner is not liable for injuries caused by its being blown down during the process of construction. Benedict v. Martin, 36 Barb. 238.

If the owner of a building which has been burned negligently permits the walls to become dangerous, he will be liable to the owner of adjacent property injured by their fall although the city has volunteered to take care of the ruins and have the walls torn down. Anderson v. East, 117 Ind. 123, 3 L. R. A. 712.

The owner of a wall of a burned building which falls on and injures property on adjoining premises is liable for the injury, although his property at the

The falling of the walls and sign without apparent cause was presumptive negligence.

The fact that the premises were in the possession of a tenant under a lease is no defense.

Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295; Lowell v. Spaulding, 4 Cush. 277, 50 Am. Dec. 780.

Charles Ryder was not a trespasser but was engaged in a duty imposed by law.

time was in possession of a skillful contractor for the purpose of rebuilding the house. Seesengut v. Posey, 67 Ind. 408, 33 Am. Rep. 93.

The mere fact that the building is in possession of the insurer for repairs will not exonerate the owner from liability for injuries caused by its fall if it was in an obviously dangerous condition. Knopp v. Alter, 47 La. Ann. 570.

The fact that the insurer has elected to repair, and that the building has been turned over to him for that purpose, will not absolve the owner from liability in case the walls are thrown down by reason of their dangerous condition and injure a person employed in an adjoining building. Steppe v. Alter, 48 La. Ann. 363.

In case the owner has let the work to a competent contractor he will not be liable to the employee of a subcontractor who is injured by the fall of the wall through the negligence of the contractor. Gallagher v. Southwestern Exposition Asso. 28 La. Ann. 244.

As to liability of a contractor for defects in work turned over to his employer, see note to First Presby. Congregation v. Smith (Pa.) 23 L. R. A. 504.

In case the work has been completed and accepted by the owner the Massachusetts court holds that after the wall has been accepted from the contractor the owner is liable for injuries caused by its fall on account of its defective and unsafe condition. Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 232, 28 Am. Rep. 224.

Few courts have had that state of facts before them, so that there has been no general expression of opinion upon the question of the owner's liability under such circumstances. The Massachusetts court applied to the solution of the problem the doctrine of Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 225, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 154, 12 Jur. N. S. 608, 14 L. T. N. S. 523, 14 Week. Rep. 799, 4 Hurlst. & C. 263, that one who for his own purpose brings upon his property anything likely to do mischief if it escapes must keep it in at his peril. Gorham v. Gross, supra, has been cited with apparent approval in some of the other cases upon the general question of liability for the fall of walls. But there are other cases cited in this note which do not seem to be in entire accord with the principle therein stated.

In a Michigan case where the roof of a building fell on a clear day and injured a person on the street adjoining, the court held that the fact that the work was done by an independent contractor would not relieve the owner from liability if he had accepted the work, since it was his duty to have the buildings so erected as to render it reasonably safe. Wilkinson v. Detroit Steel & S. Works, 73 Mich. 406.

But in that case there was some evidence to show 34 L. R. A.

Messrs. Batchelder & Batchelder, for respondent:

The question of negligence was purely one of law for the court. If a verdict had been rendered for the plaintiff the court would have been compelled to set it aside.

It is incumbent on the party who seeks damage for personal injuries to show that he was acting in a way that did not tend to produce the injury.

that the original plan was defective and also that the owner employed a superintendent to oversee the work so that the question of the owner's own negligence was also an element in the case.

Liability for injury to person in street.

A ruined and dilapidated wall is a nuisance if it imperils the safety of persons or travelers on the public highway. Murray v. McShane, 53 Md. 217, 38 Am. Rep. 367.

Permitting a building to overhang a highway in such a manner as to be in danger of falling upon it may be an indictable nuisance. Chute v. State, 19 Minn. 271.

It is the duty of the owner of a building under his control and in his own occupation to keep it in such a state of repair that travelers on the highway shall not suffer injury. Franke v. St. Louis, 110 Mo. 516.

The owner of a building from which a cornice overhanging the highway falls because the nails fastening it to the building have become loosened by reason of ordinary decay is liable for an injury to a passer-by without proof of knowledge on his part of the dangerous condition of the cornice. Roberts v. Mitchell, 21 Ont. App. Rep. 433.

Executors in possession of property of the deceased are personally liable for injuries to a passer-by by the fall of a window from the building into the street which is caused by their neglecting to make necessary repairs on the building. Ferrier v. Trepannier, 24 Can. S. C. 86.

To exempt the owner and contractor from liability for damages caused by the fall of a house in process of demolition the notice of dangers must be of such a character as to put the person injured in fault. Jackson v. Schmidt, 14 La. Ann. 818.

If the walls of a church are negligently permitted to stand after the rest of the building has been destroyed by fire, and subsequently fall upon and injure a person passing along the highway, the church society will be liable for the injury. Church of Ascension v. Auckbart, 3 Hill, 193.

Where the owners of three adjoining lots build houses supported by partition walls, and they are destroyed by fire and the walls left standing until they fall into the street and injure a passer-by, the three owners are jointly liable for the injuries thereby caused. Simmons v. Everson, 124 N. Y. 319.

A church society will be liable for the fall of a shutter forming part of its spire if it injures a person upon the street below and the circumstances were such that notice on its part of the defective condition of the shutter can be presumed. Woods v. Trinity Parish, 21 D. C. 540.

ful act on the land or building of another, and in doing that act occasions injury to a third party (or to himself), the owner of the land or building is not liable.

Gray v. Boston Gaslight Co. 114 Mass. 153, 19 Am. Rep. 324.

Liability for injury to person on adjoining property.

If a man hath a house near my house, and he suffereth his house to beso ruinous as it is likely to fall upon my house, I may have a writ de domo reparanda to compel him to repair his house. Co. Litt 562.

But that writ was subsequently abolished, and it is stated in a note that an action for damages will lie for failure to make the repairs.

The owner of a building is liable for the damages which its fall may cause to property on adjoining premises. Kappes v. Appel, 14 Ill. App. 170.

The mere fact that the city fire department has pronounced a fire wall safe will not absolve the owner from the duty of using care to determine whether or not it is safe, and prevent its injuring other persons. Dixon v. Wachenheimer, 9 Ohio C. C. 401.

If a building falls because of defects in material and workmanship reasonably within the knowledge of the owner, and thereby inflicts injuries upon adjoining owners or their property, or any person employed within the vicinity, such as a fireman trying to extinguish a fire, the owner is liable for the injuries ensuing therefrom. Kitchen v. Carter, 47 Neb. 776.

One who builds or maintains a high chimney the fall of which would injure an adjoining building is liable for its fall in a not unusual gale, or from any cause except such as human foresight cannot reasonably be expected to anticipate and prevent. Cork v. Bissom, 162 Mass. 330, 26 L. R. A. 256.

A wall which is built under the agreement that when the adjoining owner pays one half the cost he may use it as a party wall is not a party wall until the payment is made, and if it falls before that time injuring the adjoining owner, he may maintain an action for his damages against the one who erected the wall. Glover v. Mersman, 4 Mo. App. 90.

If a building in process of erection falls by reason of negligence and want of skill, the owner is liable for injuries thereby caused to the property of an adjoining owner. Seabrook v. Hecker, 3 Robt. 291.

A property owner is not absolved from the duty of care for dangerous walls on Sunday. Dixon v. Wachenheimer, 9 Ohio C. C. 401.

A person who is building a house under a contract to finish it by a certain time or forfeit a certain amount may maintain an action against the owner of an adjoining wall which falls upon his materials and delays his work so that he is compelled to pay the forfeiture. Lynds v. Clark, 14 Mo. App. 74.

In Taylor v. Standall, 7 Q. B. 634, 3 Dowl. & L. 161, 14 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 301, 9 Jur. 1090, where defendant's building fell upon and threw down a wall belonging to plaintiff for which plaintiff brought the action, defendant pleaded that he had repaired plaintiff's wall at his own expense; but the court said there is a vested right of action and the plea states a kind of set-off, but that is no answer.

It is not necessary to serve notice on the owner of the unsafe condition of the property in order to hold him liable for injuries caused by its fall. Tucker v. Illinois C. R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 114.

Where two buildings adjoining each other were burned leaving the side and walls standing close to each other, and a person in taking down one of the walls was injured by the fall of the other, the court held that in the absence of anything to show that one of the walls would have fallen while both were standing or that defendant had notice or was bound to know that one was being removed, he was not liable. Mahoney v. Libbey, 123 Mass. 30, 25 Am. Rep. 6.

The mere fact that the owner of a building in process of erection has his attention called to the fact that the walls are leaning, is not sufficient to render him liable for injuries caused by their fall on the following day, unless the danger is so obvious that a reasonably prudent man would have acted immediately for his own safety in case he was in danger of injury should the building fall. Schwartz v. Gilmore, 45 Ill. 455, 92 Am. Dec. 227.

The owners of a wall that fell and injured the occupant of an adjoining building are not liable if they exercised proper care to make the wall safe and after such care believed that it was safe. Schell v. Second Nat. Bank, 14 Minn. 43.

In that case the wall which fell was one left standing after a fire, and the immediate cause of the fall appears to have been a hurricane, but that fact is not made an element in the case. The question of proper care was left to the jury, and the issue found in favor of defendant. The principle of the case is not in accord with Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 232, 28 Am. Rep. 234, which is noticed supra. In most cases of the fall of a building negligence has been shown. In fact the cases must be very few in which a building falls under ordinary circumstances without negligence on the part of someone. Therefore the abstract question as to how far the owner is bound to keep his building from falling and is liable for injuries caused by the fall on the principle of caring for a dangerous agency has not been fully considered. The Massachusetts (Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 232, 28 Am. Rep. 234) and Minnesota (Ryder v. Kinsey, and Schell v. Second Nat. Bank, supra) courts seem inclined to take opposite views of the question, although they did not discuss it from the same point of view. In fact, the Massachusetts case seems to be the only one which has considered the question

Plaintiff was not entitled to the same protection as travelers passing along the street in a lawful manner.

Trask v. Shotwell, and Freeberg v. St. Paul Floor-Works, supra.

At common law the occupier, and not the landlord, is bound, as between himself and the public, so far to keep buildings in repair that they may be safe for the public; and such occupant is prima facie liable to third persons for damages arising from any defect.

Rosenfeld v. Newman, supra; Loose v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 10 Am. Rep. 623.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff's minor son, Charles Ryder, caused by the falling of a brick veneered wall of a building owned by the defendant. On the trial, after the plaintiff had closed his case, the court directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, for the reason that from its point of view. The other cases seem to treat the question as one of negligence purely with a more or less strict duty on the part of the owner of the building.

Liability for injury to person on property.

A city is not liable for injuries caused by the fall of brick and mortar in a room in one of its public buildings if the accident was the result of causes beyond the control of the city and reasonable time had not elapsed between the time they became dangerous and the accident in which to restore them to safety. Chicago v. O'Brennan, 65 Ill. 160.

Where plaintiff as a mere intruder entered the uninclosed premises of a railroad company upon which was a building in a visible state of decay, and while there was injured by a portion of the building blown down by the wind, it was held that he could not recover for the injury, the building not being so situated as to be dangerous to the public. Lary v. Cleveland, C. & I. R. Co., 73 Ind. 322, 41 Am. Rep. 572.

Where plaintiff was attending a picnic near a hotel when a storm came up, and he and the other picnickers sought shelter in and about the hotel, and the weight of the crowd carried down a veranda along one side of the building upon the heads of plaintiff and others in a room beneath it, the owner of the building was held not liable, since the plaintiff was at most a mere licensee and defendant was not shown to be guilty of negligence. Converse v. Walker, 30 Hun, 595.

The maintenance of a bowling wall along a passageway from a street to a workshop will render the owner liable for its fall in case it injures a person passing along the passageway, although he is going to the shop for his own pleasure, and not for business. Schilling v. Abernethy, 112 Pa. 437, 58 Am. Rep. 325.

The owner of a building erected for rent, who builds loosely, carelessly, unskillfully, and negligently, is liable for injuries to a third person who is injured by the fall of the building while he is in it for a proper purpose. Godley v. Hagerty, 20 Pa. 387, 50 Am. Dec. 731.

But when the owner has done all in his power to erect a building safe for the purposes for which it is to be used he will not be liable to the owner of property stored on the premises for injuries to it caused by the fall of the building by reason of an occult defect of which he had no notice. Walden v. Finch, 70 Pa. 460.

In Continental S. B. Co. v. Burke, 37 L. ed. 969, plaintiff was injured by falling 15 feet by reason of the giving way of a platform or piazza attached to a building upon hotel property at which a club to which he belonged was holding a picnic. The plaintiff was going to the building with a number of other persons to procure liquors which had been stored there by the picnic committee, and the plaintiff was giving way under their weight. Defendant claimed that the building was a private office and that none but the committee had a right therein, and that the building was not intended for any such use as plaintiff was putting it to, and that the liquors were stored in the building under the express understanding that only five or six persons should go there at a time. A verdict for plaintiff was affirmed by a divided court.

Persons who conduct a fair and construct buildings for the use of their patrons are liable for injuries to such patrons by the breaking down or fall of such structures if caused by the negligence or unskillful manner of their construction. Latham v. Roach, 72 Ill. 179; Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 184.

And the principle of that case was recognized in Tucker v. Champaign County Agri. Board, 52 Ill. App. 316, in which plaintiff was injured by stepping through a hole in the flooring of a structure erected for the accommodation of patrons.

So, an agricultural society which erects a building for exhibits is liable for injuries caused by the fall of the building which is the result of its failure to exercise ordinary care to make it safe. Brown v. South Kennebec Agri. Soc., 47 Me. 275, 74 Am. Dec. 484.

Agents of the owner of ground upon which an exhibition is to be given, who are given the supervision of the building of a stand for the accommodation of the public, are not individually liable in case it gives way because not sufficiently strong to sustain the crowd, and injures a person who sues for damages. VanAntwerp v. Linton, 39 Hun, 417.

An employer is not liable to his employee for the fall of a floor upon which grain is stored if due care was used in the construction of the building and there was no reason to suppose that it would not sustain the weight which was put upon it. Dillon v. Sixth Ave. R. Co., 16 Jones & S. 283.

Where a platform over which an employee is to draw materials for a mill is permitted to gradually decay until it falls with a load upon it and injures the employee, he may recover from the employer if the defect could have been discovered by reasonable care. Murray v. Usher, 46 Hun, 404.

In Camp v. Church of St. Louis, 7 La. Ann. 823, where one employed by the contractor to do the brick work on a church building was injured by the fall of a tower, a verdict in his favor against both the contractor and the owner of the building was affirmed by a divided court.

The owner of a building in process of construction is liable to a carpenter working on the roof who is injured by the falling of the building caused by the walls being negligently made of insufficient thickness. Giles v. Diamond State Iron Co. (Del.) 6 Cent. Rep. 897.

An employer is liable to his servant for injuries caused by the fall of an outhouse attached to the side of the building during a time that the servant the plaintiff had failed to establish his cause of action. The plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff's evidence tended to establish the following facts: In 1885 the defendant purchased a lot on Fifth street, in the city of St. Paul, upon which stood a one-story brick-veneered building, which he has ever since leased for store and office purposes. The last lease made by him was in the spring of 1894 to the present tenants. On June 27, 1894, about midnight, Charles Ryder, nineteen years of age, in company with McMahon, a boy about his own age, was walking along Fifth street, and saw a policeman in front of the building, who was trying to take down a sign therefrom, which hung over the sidewalk. This sign was about 8½ feet square, made of oil cloth, with a light wooden frame. It had been suspended by two small iron hooks from a piece of timber, 2x4 inches, extending from the front of the building over the sidewalk, and supported by two guy wires attached to its outer end, and fastened to the sides of the building. It does not appear that it was attached in any way to the part of the wall which fell. The outside hook had become detached from the sign (presumably by a severe storm in the early part of the evening), so that it hung by the one hook. The policeman informed the young men that he feared the sign would fall upon persons passing, and asked them to assist him in taking it down. They assented, and, after striking and pushing the sign with a stick, the policeman and Ryder raised McMahon up, holding him by the legs, and he gave the sign a twist to detach it from the remaining hook, and at that very instant the whole front of the building above the door and windows fell, crushing Ryder to the sidewalk, breaking his pelvic bone and otherwise seriously injuring him. The building was some 18 feet wide and 15 feet high to the peak of the roof. There was a lintel 8x8 inches over the openings in front, and a 4-inch brick wall, the one that fell, extended above the lintel as high as the peak of the roof. In the rear of this brick wall were six pieces of timber 2x4 inches, fastened together so as to make three pieces 4x4 inches, one at each corner and one in the center; and between these there were studding 2x4 inches, about 2 feet apart. There was no sheathing on the outside of the studding next to the brick, but there was on the inside. The brick-veneered wall was not spiked to the studding or sheathing or anchored to the frame in the customary manner.

The owner of a building who has employed competent builders to erect it, and has accepted it from them, is not liable to a painter who is injured by the fall of a cornice and part of the wall under his weight when he went upon it for a purpose connected with the painting of the building, since the cornice was not intended for such use. Fanjoy v. Seales, 29 Cal. 243.

The fact that a building is not made so as to withstand an extraordinary storm does not show negligence. Giles v. Diamond State Iron Co. supra.

A city is liable for the fall of a wall which is being built for it, which is caused by the negligent manner in which the work is done, to a workman who is injured by the fall. Mulcairns v. Janesville, 67 Wis. 24.

If a landlord attempts to shore up a building in possession of his tenant which has settled, he takes the risk of accidents, and if the building falls, injuring the property of the tenant, the landlord will be liable for such injury. Butler v. Cushing, 48 Hun, 521; Judd v. Cushing, 50 Hun, 181.

The mere fact that the landlord does not disclose that the house is in a ruinous state will not render him liable to the tenant for injuries caused by the fall of the house, unless he knows that the tenant takes the house relying on its being fit for occupation. *Keates v. The owner and builder of a storehouse does not by leasing it impliedly warrant that it is fit for the use to which it is to be put so that he will be liable for the damage in case it falls under the weight placed therein. Dutton v. Gerrish, 9 Cush. 89, 55 Am. Dec. 45.

A landlord is not liable for injuries to his tenant caused by the fall of the building, which is due to excavations made by third persons on adjoining property, although the landlord knows of the excavation and takes no precaution to prevent his own building from falling. Ward v. Fagin, 101 Mo. 680, 10 L. R. A. 147; Sherwood v. Seaman, 2 Bosw. 127; Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 341.

Neglect to comply with covenants in lease.

A covenant by a lessor to repair a carriage house does not render him liable for injuries to carriages in the house caused by its fall under the weight of a heavy body of snow upon the roof. Leavitt v. Fletcher, 10 Allen, 119; Searle v. Laverick, L. R. 9 Q. B. 43.

In Anonymous, 11 Mod. 8, it is held that if a lessee for years build a house on the leased premises and let it fall it is waste, Chief Justice Holt saying: "Every man of common right ought so to support his own house as that it may not be a nuisance to another man's."

A covenant by the tenant of a mill to repair, natural wear and tear and fire excepted, will not cover the case of the fall of the mill in consequence of its own defective construction. Hess v. Newcomer, 7 Md. 825.

If a tenant uses a building in what is apparently a reasonable and proper manner having regard to its character and to the purpose for which it was intended to be used, and it falls under the weight of the goods stored therein, he is not liable for waste. Manchester Bonded Warehouse Co. v. Carr, L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 507, 49 L. J. C. P. N. 8, 800, 48 L. T. N. 8, 476, 29 Week. Rep. 354, 45 J. P. 7; Sanger v. Rilton, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 815, 47 L. J. Ch. N. 8, 207, 38 L. T. N. Illegal building.

If a building is erected of a kind forbidden by the ordinances of the city, and a portion of the wall falls, the owner, contractor, and all persons engaged in the work are liable for the injuries thereby caused. Walker v. McMillan, 6 Can. S. C. 241.

Liability of firemen.

A stack of chimneys belonging to a house close to a highway, which by reason of a fire were in immediate danger of falling into the highway, were thrown down by some firemen, and it was held that they were not liable for injuries unavoidably or attached to them in any way, or otherwise supported. There was fastened to the outside of the wall, and fell with it, a large wooden sign 5x18 feet, which was upon the building when defendant purchased it. Practically there was no change in the construction of the building or its condition from the time the defendant bought it until the wall fell. The evidence further tends to show that the customary and proper way to support a veneered brick wall is to sheat or board up the frame on the outside of the studding next to the brick, then lay the brick along and outside of the sheeting, and bind the brick wall, during the progress of its construction, to the frame of the building, by driving 20-penny nails every fifth or sixth course of the bricks into the boards of which the sheeting is composed, so that the nail heads will remain in the mortar at about the center of the bricks. This is what is meant by "anchoring" or "supporting" a brick or veneered wall. These defects in the construction of the wall were discovered after it fell, but there was no evidence in the case as to whether such defects could or could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the owner before the wall fell, except as may be inferred from the facts we have stated.

Upon this evidence, was the question of the defendant's negligence in the premises one of law or fact or for the jury? If fair-minded men might reasonably draw different conclusions from the facts which the evidence tends to prove, the question was one for the jury; otherwise it was for the court. If there is a fair doubt as to the inferences to be so drawn, the question is one of fact. Abbott v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 Minn. 482. The law applicable to this branch of the case is well settled. While the owner of a building is not an insurer against accidents from its condition, yet, so far as the exercise of ordinary care will enable him to do so, he is bound to keep it in such condition that it will not by any insecurity or insufficiency for the purpose to which it is put injure any person rightfully in, around, or passing the premises. Nash v. Minneapolis Mill Co. 24 Minn. 501, 31 Am. Rep. 349; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 702; 1 Wood, Nuisances, § 109. Buildings properly constructed do not fall from slight causes, only from some adequate cause. Therefore, where a building falls without apparent cause, in the absence of explanatory circumstances, negligence will be presumed; and the burden is upon the owner of showing that he exercised ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition. Mullen v. St. John, done to an adjoining house of a third person. Dewey v. White, Moody & M. 56.

Act of third person.

The owner of a building is not liable for injury to a passer-by by the fall of a portion of his chimney if the fall is caused by the improper and unauthorized act of a third person of which the owner had no knowledge. Scullin v. Dolan, 4 Daly, 163.

The fact that the fall of fire walls caused by the pulling of a wire attached to them will not relieve the owner from liability if the walls were dangerous and he might have known that the wire was so attached to them and was liable to cause their fall. O'Connor v. Andrews, 31 Tex. 28; O'Connor v. Curtis (Tex.) 15 S. W. 363.

The owner of a building to the chimney of which a third person has without his consent attached a wire so as to render the chimney unsafe may be held liable to a passer-by who is injured by the fall of the chimney. Gray v. Boston Gaslight Co. 114 Mass. 149, 19 Am. Rep. 324.

Where a pile of bricks and rubbish fell upon and injured plaintiff, the court held that the proof showing that there was no fault or negligence imputable to defendant, that there was no original imperfection in the structure, and that the fall was probably caused by the acts of third persons, the defendant could not be held liable. Burton v. Davis, 15 La. Ann. 448.

Via major.

The owner of a fire wall cannot defeat liability for injuries caused by its fall in a high wind on the ground of inevitable accident if he permitted it to stand for seven days after the fire knowing of the danger. Nordheimer v. Alexander, Mont. L. R. 6 Q. B. 402.

If the owner of a wall adjoining a street in a populous city permits it to become dilapidated and unsafe he will be liable for injuries caused by its fall, although it is blown down by a storm of unusual violence. Vincett v. Cook, 4 Hun, 318.

Where fire destroyed defendant's house leaving one of the walls standing in a dangerous condition, and defendant knowing the fact failed to support it and some days afterwards it was blown down by a wind and damaged plaintiff's house, the court held that defendant could not shield himself under the plea of vis major, and was liable for the damages. Nordheimer v. Alexander, 19 Can. S. C. 248.

A city is not liable for injuries caused by the fall of a market house which is blown down by an extraordinary wind storm. Flori v. St. Louis, 69 Mo. 341, 38 Am. Rep. 504.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries caused by its buildings being blown down by storms where it has used that care and skill in their structure and maintenance which men of ordinary prudence and skill usually employ. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Brigham, 20 Ohio St. 374.

In Couts v. Neer, 70 Tex. 468, a charge to the jury that defendants and their employees were bound to use such care and skill in the construction of the wall and placing the truss as persons of ordinary prudence would exercise under the same circumstances and surroundings, and if they found that defendants had exercised such care and skill and that the wall was thrown down or caused to fall by reason of an extraordinary rainstorm such as could not have been anticipated and by reasonable care guarded against, then you will find for defendant,—was held to be as favorable to defendant as he could demand, and the verdict having been against him it was allowed to stand.

Fire.

If by reason of the fall of a building fire is communicated to an adjoining building the owner of the fallen building may be liable for the injuries thereby caused. Hine v. Cushing, 53 Hun, 519.

Contributory negligence.

If the injured person could have avoided the injury by reasonable precautions on his own part he cannot recover. Factors & T. Ins. Co. v. Werlein, 42 La. Ann. 1046, 11 L. R. A. 351.

If a tenant is injured by the fall of a balcony along which he is carrying a stove at a time when he knows the balcony to be unsafe he cannot recover for the injury. Mullen v. Baine, 45 N. J. L. 520.

H. F. F.

57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 59, 60; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1231.

In the case under consideration, the evidence as to what was done by the plaintiff and those with him in taking down the small, light sign from the building in question would certainly justify the jury in finding that such act was not an adequate cause for the falling of the wall. The presumption then would be, in the absence of explanatory circumstances, that the wall fell because it was in an unsafe condition, and that the defendant was negligent in not exercising ordinary care in properly inspecting and keeping it in repair. But it is only in the absence of explanatory circumstances as to the cause of the fall of a building that the presumption of negligence on the part of the owner is presumed prima facie. Therefore, where such explanatory circumstances are given in evidence, and the cause of the fall of the building is established, and there is nothing in the evidence tending to connect such cause with the owner's negligence, the burden rests upon the party asserting such negligence to give evidence tending to show that such cause might have been discovered and removed by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the owner. The cause of the fall of the wall is clearly established in this case. It fell because of a defect in its construction, in that it was not supported in the usual manner. This was readily discovered after the accident, when the bricks were on the sidewalk, and the manner of constructing the wall was exposed. It is easy to be wise after the fact, but the question is, Did the defendant know, or might he have known, by the exercise of ordinary care, before the accident, of the defect in the construction? If so, he would have been clearly negligent in the premises. But he did not build the wall, and there is no evidence in the case that there was anything in the external appearance of the building indicating its defective construction. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears by the uncontradicted evidence that the defect in the construction was a concealed one. Neither is there any evidence in the case tending to show that the defect could have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care in inspecting the building. The prima facie presumption arising from the undisputed facts is that the defect could not have been discovered by the exercise of such care; for the sheeting on the inside of the studding and the brick wall on the outside of them concealed the defect, and the absence of sheeting next to the brick wall and the anchoring of it to the sheeting by the large nails could not have been discovered by any means disclosed by the evidence, except by the exercise of extraordinary care in inspecting the building, by making openings in the sheeting or wall to discover whether or not the wall was properly supported. Ordinary, not extraordinary, care, was the measure of the defendant's duty in the premises. No importance can be attached to the fact that the large sign was fastened to the brick wall, for, assuming that the wall was properly constructed, it could not be negligence to fasten the sign to it, and there was nothing about the sign or the manner in which it was attached to the wall to indicate the latent defect in the wall. Upon the whole record, we are satisfied that the presumption of negligence arising from the mere fact that the wall fell was rebutted by the explanatory circumstances disclosed by the evidence, showing the cause of its fall, and that the defect was a latent one; and that, in the absence of any evidence disclosing any fact or circumstance from which it might be reasonably inferred that such defect could have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, the question of his negligence is not one admitting of a fair doubt, and that the jury were correctly instructed to return a verdict for him. Any other rule would practically make owners of buildings insurers of their safety.

Order affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT

City of PHILADELPHIA, to Use of John McCANN,

v.

PHILADELPHIA & READING RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(177 Pa. 202.)

1. Power to assess railroad real estate for local improvements is conferred by a statute for the equalization of the public burden, which provides that railroad property, with certain exceptions, shall be subject to "taxation by ordinances for city purposes."

2. A strip of land 1,500 feet wide along a river bank, and used by a railroad company as a coal and ore terminal, is not all exempt from taxation as roadbed although a large part of it is covered with tracks.

3. A yard owned and used by a railroad company as a coal and ore terminal may be sold to satisfy a tax lien, but the purchaser will take subject to the easement of the company to operate its tracks over the property.

(Mitchell, J., dissents.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to enforce a lien for assessments for the construction of a sewer.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas Hart, Jr., for appellant:

The roadbed of a railroad company is not

NOTE.—For the liability of a railroad right of way to assessments for local improvements, see 24 L. R. A.

note to Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Milwaukee (Wis.) 28 L. R. A. 219.

liable to a municipal claim for a local improvement in front of it or alongside of it, whether the same be merely a right of way or owned in fee.

Philadelphia v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 33 Pa. 41; Junction R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 88 Pa. 424.

There is no distinction now recognized between the parts of a railroad, the title to which has been acquired in fee, and those parts required by condemnation, the title of the railroad company being considered to be practically the same in both cases.

Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. v. Reading Paper Mills, 149 Pa. 18; Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Peet, 152 Pa. 468, 19 L. R. A. 467.

The word "railroad" includes, ex vi termini, sidings, etc.

There is absolutely no difference in fact or in law between the railroad west of Richmond street and that east thereof, except that the latter part is longer, different in shape, has more tracks, that they spread out instead of remaining parallel, and that trains come to a stop and unload into vessels instead of merely passing along to destination.

Defendant's property is not liable, because the statutes relating to the imposition of assessments for local improvements never contemplated making such property liable.

It was very early decided that a railroad or a canal and its necessary appurtenant works were not taxable as "land" or "real estate."

Lehigh Coal & N. Co. v. Northampton County, 8 Watts & S. 384; Railroad Co. v. Berks County, 6 Pa. 70; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Wayne County Comrs. 15 Pa. 351; Northampton County v. Lehigh Coal & N. Co. 75 Pa. 461; Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. v. Vanduyke, 137 Pa. 249; East Pennsylvania R. Co.'s Case, 1 Walk. (Pa.) 428; Northumberland County v. Philadelphia & E. R. Co. 20 W. N. C. 381.

Aside from the act of April 21, 1858, new Purd. Dig. 1467, pl. 892, it cannot be questioned that the defendant's lots liened in these cases would not be subject to state or municipal taxation.

There is in this act no legislative intention to make such property liable to municipal assessments.

A liability of this kind is not "taxation" as ordinarily understood and in the sense used in this act.

Northern Liberties v. St. John's Church, 18 Pa. 104; Pray v. Northern Liberties, 31 Pa. 69; Re Washington Avenue, 69 Pa. 352, 8 Am. Rep. 255; Oliver Cemetery Co. v. Philadelphia, 93 Pa. 129, 89 Am. Rep. 732; Greensburg v. Young, 53 Pa. 280; Eris v. First Univ. Church, 14 W. N. C. 232.

Taxation for municipal purposes and charges by municipal assessment are entirely different things.

Mr. John M. Ridings for appellee.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is the owner of a large lot of ground in the city of Philadelphia, fronting on Richmond street about 1,547 feet, and extending back to the port warden's line on the Delaware river. Against this property the city filed a municipal lien for part of the cost of constructing a sewer on Richmond street, between Cumberland and William streets. Scire facias was issued on the lien, to which defendant made affidavit of defense, of which this is the material averment: "The said large lot of ground is entirely and exclusively used as the tide-water coal and iron ore terminal of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company. As appears by the said plan, which is an accurate representation of the place, it is covered throughout with a great number of diverging railroad tracks, the said main line entering the property near Somerset street, and spreading out and running to the ends of the wharves, some twenty in number, whereby coal is shipped into vessels for export, and iron ore is received from vessels bringing the same here, and loaded into the cars for inland transportation. Engines traverse all the tracks as upon other parts of the railroad. The said lot of ground is an absolutely necessary part of the railroad of the said company." There was a rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, which the court below, in opinion filed (4 Pa. Dist. R. 453), made absolute, and defendant appeals.

It was decided that the roadbed of a railroad is not, as land, subject to general taxation, nor to special assessments for city improvements, in Philadelphia v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 38 Pa. 41. This case was decided in 1856, but not reported and published until 1859, so that the act of April 21, 1858 (P. L. 385), could not have been before the court. The facts of the case show that it was a scire facias on a municipal lien for paving along the railroad, which occupied a strip of land 2,046 feet long by 47 feet wide. The court below says: "The single question is whether the remedy by scire facias on the claim filed can be enforced against a corporate body clothed with the usual railway franchise. The process which the plaintiff seeks to use is directed wholly against the soil of the railway, together with the structure of the railway itself; and, upon a judgment upon it for the plaintiff, this corpus may be sold under a levari facias to the highest bidder at a sheriff's sale. To authorize this would be to inflict a serious public evil: and this, too, without the pretext of a benefit having been received by the company, by reason of the paving of the public highway contiguous to the railroad." The court then cites a number of cases in this state, which hold that certain kinds of real estate cannot be taken away from the company by sale under the ordinary forms of adverse process; that, even conceding the railroad company might be charged in some mode of proceeding with the cost of paving, the proceeding by scire facias and levari facias was not the proper one, because directed against the roadbed. The judgment was affirmed in this court for two reasons, in substance the same as those given by the court below: (1) The claim had no foundation in the letter or spirit of the law. (2) The form of the remedy was one which was inapplicable as against a corporation operating a public highway, because it would destroy that in which the public had an interest. The decisions of the court below and this court are based mainly on the absence of statutory authority to seize and sell, for assessments, the roadbed of a railroad company as land; and reasons of more or less force are given why the absence of such authority is wise. While the facts in this case show the decision was eminently just, for the sale sought to be enforced by a levari facias was of a strip of land only 47 feet wide, on which was the actual structure of the railroad, yet the cases decided up to that time show the exemption of property from taxation, on the plea that it was an indispensable part of the corporate franchise, had reached a point which, in the legislative mind, was no longer tolerable. Water stations, depots, toll houses, reservoirs, houses and gardens of lock tenders and collectors, engines, and machinery for raising cars up planes, collectors' and engineers' offices, all were exempt on the ground that they were indispensable to the exercise of the franchise. As noticed, this last decision was in 1856, but then came the act of April 21, 1858, which contains this provision: "The offices, depots, car houses, and other real property of railroad corporations situated in said city (Philadelphia), the superstructure of the road and water stations only excepted, are and hereafter shall be subject to taxation by ordinances for city purposes." From its plain words, this was not an act defining what amount or what character of taxes might be imposed on corporate property, but an act declaring what property thereafter should not be exempt, and what should be, from taxation. It brought again within the taxing power a very large amount of property, which under the former decisions of this court had escaped. And it declared in explicit terms that the superstructure and water stations should be exempt. Although the word "superstructure" might, in present railway engineering phraseology, be limited to sleepers, rails, and fastenings (see Superstructure, Century Dictionary), yet we have no doubt that the legislature of that day, adopting the ordinary meaning of the word, intended by it the roadbed, with whatever had been constructed upon it. Except this and water stations, railroad real estate should be subject to taxation.

But it is argued that the words "subject to taxation by ordinances for city purposes" only mean taxation for ordinary revenue, and give no authority to assess for municipal improvements. Under the authorities the word "taxation" does not always indicate a power of assessments for local improvements. The purpose as well as the language of the act may exclude such power. But this act plainly includes the power. The purpose, as declared in the preamble, is the equalization of the public burden. The burden, under the decisions, had not been theretofore shared equally, if the landowner for 1,500 feet of a large lot on one side of Richmond street escaped assessments for municipal improvements, while the lotowners on the opposite side paid the whole. The intention was inequality should be remedied. How? By conferring power to tax it by "ordinances for city purposes." The construction of the sewer is a city purpose. Therefore the power to assess for payment of the cost of it, theretofore limited, is thereafter almost unrestricted. The power conferred is intended to be ample that the evil before existing because of want of it should be remedied. We are of opinion that this act conferred fully on the city the power here claimed, to assess, by ordinance, railroad real estate for local improvements.

The Junction Railroad Case, 88 Pa. 428, following Philadelphia v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. supra, declares the roadbed exempt, but recognizes the well-marked distinction made by the act of 1858 between the roadbed and other real estate of the company. The claim in the Junction Railroad Case was filed against the strip of land constituting the roadbed, and on that ground was not sustained. Nor can the roadbed here be made subject to this lien. Just what portion of this land is subject to lien for this assessment we do not decide. Clearly a large part of it is not roadbed. The affidavit and map filed show a large part of the land is a coal yard or terminal. Defendant, by its act of incorporation, is authorized to appropriate for roadbed a strip of land 4 rods or 66 feet wide. In addition it can appropriate land for sidings and turnouts for the speedy and safe passage of its cars. Land so taken would properly be termed "roadbed" and be exempt from taxation. But a tract of land 1,500 feet wide, extending from Richmond street to the river, used as a coal and ore terminal, is not a roadbed, any more than the private coal yards in the city, where, by turnouts and sidings the company dumps coal, are parts of the roadbed. All are appurtenant to the business of the road, but are not an integral part of it in conducting its business as a carrier. If it did not provide these terminal facilities, private individuals, with a view to profit, would. The complete control of such a yard by the company, doubtless, adds to the efficiency and economy of shipment and delivery after the coal is carried between point of consignment and destination, and the company may properly own and control the land as a stimulant to its business; but, if it chooses to do so, it must pay municipal assessments, as other real-estate owners.

While we can, from this record, determine that a large part of this 1,500 feet is not roadbed, we cannot say just how much is. But that fact prevents not the entry of judgment. The plaintiff has a lien on the land in excess of that not subject to municipal assessment. A sale of the land passes to the purchaser nothing the lien does not bind. He takes it subject to defendant's easement. In Re Howard Street, 142 Pa. 601, our Brother Mitchell, in passing on the constitutionality of this act of 1858, to the apportionment of benefits and damages, suggests that serious difficulties may arise from lack of provision for collection and distribution; but he says none of them arise in that case, and they may never arise. A similar question was raised in Re Opening of Berks Street, 12 W. N. C. 10, where the court says it is something with which it has nothing to do. The same argument is presented here; that is, the insufficiency of the process to enforce the judgment. We might pass the question, as was done in the other cases, as one which could only arise when the writ was issued on the judgment. But the difficulties presented in the cases cited, which were to assess and apportion damages and benefits caused by the opening of streets, do not appear here. The city has its judgment in rem against land on which defendant had, under the law, before the filing of the municipal lien, a visible notorious easement or right of way to the extent of its roadbed. No adverse process could disturb it in the enjoyment of this easement, for, as is held in Susquehanna Canal Co. v. Bonham, 9 Watts & S. 27, 43 Am. Dec. 815, and the many cases following it, "the franchises and corporate rights of a company, and the means vested in them which are necessary to the existence and maintenance of the object for which they were created, are incapable of being granted away and transferred by any act of the company itself or by any adverse process against it." The roadbed running to the river through this yard, made necessary to the existence of the road as a common carrier, cannot be taken from it by a proceeding in rem against the yard. The purchaser takes subject to the easement, just as the purchaser of land at sale under a mortgage takes subject to an open, visible easement antedating the mortgage. The argument of appellant's counsel, although a most able one, does not treat the act of 1858 as the undoubted law on which the case turns. We are clearly of the opinion that the city's claim is sustained by this act; that it, in effect, negatived a large number of the decisions of this court announced before its passage, in view of the statutes on this subject then existing. Since 1858, what land held by railroads in Philadelphia shall be assessed for municipal improvements is no longer a judicial question. The statute has answered it in unmistakable terms.

The judgment is affirmed.

Mitchell, J., dissenting:

It is conceded that the roadbed or other part of the property essential to the franchise is not subject to taxation or municipal charges, while property merely convenient may be. The affidavits in these cases raise questions of fact as to which class the premises liened belong to, and I would send the cases to a jury to settle these questions before judgment, and not leave them to future contest as suggested in the opinion of the court.

City of MEADVILLE et al.

A municipal corporation which has contracted with a private corporation for a water supply as authorized by the act of May 23, 1874, cannot subsequently proceed to erect a plant of its own, as it is authorized to do by another section of the act, but in case it wishes to own a waterworks plant it must proceed, under § 60 of the act, to acquire the one belonging to the other contracting party.

Freeport Waterworks Co. v. Prager, 129 Pa. 605.

When the alleged contract was attempted to be made, November, 1874, with the Meadville Water Company, there was no legislative authority empowering the city to furnish water by a "contract with, or authorizing any person, company, or association to erect waterworks," as the act of April 23, 1874, did not apply. The city could make a contract for the supply of water, but the authority to delegate and by delegation exhaust its power did not exist under the act.

This power, being legislative and therefore discretionary, cannot be controlled by the courts or surrendered or bargained away.

Meadville Fuel Gas Co.'s Appeal (Pa.) 4 Atl. 786.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Meadville was incorporated by act of February 15, 1866, and supplements of March 28 and April 6, 1870. Its municipal powers and privileges are also regulated by the general act of May 23, 1874, for government of cities of the third class. Before the adoption of the present Constitution, its debt exceeded 2 per cent of the assessed value of its taxable property. On 16th of December, 1873, an election was held to determine whether the city should construct municipal waterworks to supply the inhabitants with water. The vote was 177 for, and 519 against, the proposition. Then, August 5, 1874, the mayor was authorized by councils to appoint a committee to confer with citizens on the subject of a supply of water, and the committee was appointed. No written report seems to have been made, but on the 12th of August, following, it was resolved by councils that the proposition of Dick & Gill and others be accepted. Then on October 23, 1874, a committee of councils and the mayor were authorized to contract for the construction of such works with the Meadville Water Company as soon as the company was duly incorporated. Articles of association were then entered into by 100 citizens and taxpayers for the formation of the company, which was duly chartered October 30, 1874; and on November 7 a contract was signed by the mayor, for the city, attested by the clerk and by the proper officers of the company. This contract provided for a supply of water for all city purposes, in pursuance of the authority conferred by their charter to supply the public, and, further, that connections with the water-mains should be made on all the streets, for hydrants, public buildings, markets, fountains, etc.; such connections to be designated by the city. The grades of all streets, lanes, and alleys where water mains should be laid were to be furnished by the city, which should grant the right of way through all such streets, lanes, and alleys. For furnishing water for city purposes, the company was to be paid $6,000 annually. The contract was to continue ten years, and then for another ten years, with some change of compensation for fire hydrants. The company then proceeded with the construction of its works, and completed the same at a cost of about $185,000. The city made annual appropriations to pay for the water furnished for city purposes up until 1893, when further payment was refused on the ground that the original contract was invalid for want of proper ordinance authorizing the same.

On September 21, 1894, city councils passed an ordinance that $75,000 of city bonds should be issued for purpose of constructing new municipal waterworks. Notice was then given of an election for the proposed increase of debt, in which it was stated that the assessed valuation of the city was $2,030,000, and the existing debt $61,500; that the proposed increase of debt for the construction of the waterworks was 3.7 per cent. The majority of the voters favored the increase of debt. Councils then, on March 11, 1895, adopted this ordinance: "That a system of waterworks be built and erected for the use of the city of Meadville for the purpose of supplying said city with water, and such persons and corporations as may desire the same; to be made and completed in accordance with the plans to be provided by the civil engineer of the city." The city engineer prepared plans for the new works, embracing about 22 miles of mains to be put down on the streets and alleys of the city, reaching for the most part all the consumers of water supplied by the old company. Further, the city entered into a contract with Chandley Bros. & Co. for the construction of the works in accordance with the plans of the city engineer; the price to be paid being $104,723, not including cost of land for pumping station, water wells, reservoir, or right of way through private land. These plaintiffs then filed this bill to restrain the city from carrying out the contract, they averring in said bill (1) illegality and irregularity of the election for increase of debt; (2) that the proposed increase of debt exceeded the constitutional limit of municipal indebtedness; (3) that the construction of municipal works, in view of the contract obligations of the city with the Meadville Water Company, was without authority of law, and, even if the power existed, the proposed exercise of it was a gross abuse of the power. The city filed an answer denying all the material averments of plaintiffs' bill, and conclusions of law therefrom, and further affirmatively alleging that the original contract was invalid, not being authorized by proper ordinance, and therefore was not binding upon the city. By agreement of the parties, Theodore Lamb, Esq., was appointed referee, to report facts and conclusions of law. He made a report, and on the facts concludes (1) that, although there was no formal ordinance authorizing the contract, the city, by subsequent distinct, unequivocal acts, running through years, had ratified it, and was legally bound by its terms; (2) the irregularities attending the election on the question of increase of indebtedness were not sufficiently grave to invalidate it; (3) that the proposed increase of indebtedness by the contract with Chandley Bros. & Co. for construction, added to the existing bonded indebtedness of the city, did exceed 7 per cent of the taxable property, and was therefore void, being in violation of the Constitution; (4) that the city has full power to make the contract, if the debt had not exceeded the constitutional limit. It is therefore suggested that an injunction issue to restrain the city from further proceeding with the construction of the municipal works. Both parties have filed exceptions to this decree. We fully concur in the referee's finding of fact, and approve all his conclusions of law, except the tenth. This disposes of all the exceptions on both sides but the plaintiffs' fifth exception, which is to the referee's conclusion that the city had power to make the new contract, notwithstanding its liability on the old one. It is perhaps needless to say that the question raised is not altogether free from difficulty, and we might avoid passing upon it in this particular case; but the same question is already before us in one other case, and like circumstances existing in perhaps a hundred others, involving millions of property, may raise it in the future. Therefore our plain duty is to pass upon it here. We have had the aid of full and able argument on each side. The full bench has given it prolonged and complete consideration in all its aspects, and as a result this judgment is fully concurred in by every member of the court.

As before noted, the question is raised by the referee's tenth conclusion of law, as follows: "(10) In the opinion of the referee, the right of the city of Meadville to build waterworks is one governed by legal considerations alone. Has the city power to do so? If so, the works may be constructed, and no equitable considerations can stay her hands. When the Meadville Water Company constructed its plant, it did so with knowledge that the city had the right to construct waterworks at any time, and it was bound to know that the city had the right to reconsider its determination not to do so at any time. The building of other works may, and undoubtedly will, seriously affect the present company, but the loss that may occur is one for which the law allows no compensation. It seems to me that the cases of Lehigh Water Co.'s Appeal, 102 Pa. 515, and Re Millvale, 162 Pa. 874, fully settle this doctrine."

The general borough act of 1851, under which Meadville first became a municipality, gave authority to boroughs to "light the streets, to provide a supply of water for the use of the inhabitants, . . . to make all needful regulations for the protection of pipes, lamps, reservoirs, and other construction or apparatus, and to prevent the waste of water so supplied." This clause was reenacted in the city's special charter of 1866, with the addition of authority to supply itself with water for fire purposes. And so the authority continued, as the referee finds, down to August 13, 1891, when, by proper official action, it accepted the provisions of the act of assembly of May 23, 1874, providing for the organization and government of cities of the third class, in which class it took its appropriate place. That act authorizes cities of this class, in their corporate capacity, to "supply with water the city and such persons, partnerships, and corporations therein as may desire the same, at such prices as may be agreed upon and for that purpose have at all times the unrestricted right to make, erect, and maintain all proper waterworks, machinery, buildings, cisterns, reservoirs, pipes, and conduits for the raising, reception, conveyance, and distribution of water, or to make contracts with, and authorize any person, company, or association to erect all proper waterworks, machinery, buildings, cisterns, reservoirs, pipes, and conduits for the raising, reception, conveyance, and distribution of water, and give such persons, company, or association the exclusive privilege of furnishing water as aforesaid for any length of time not exceeding ten years." The fiftieth section of the same act, in order to effect the powers thus given more fully, authorizes the purchase by the city, at such price as may be agreed upon, of the rights, privileges, and franchises of any water company then in operation, and thereafter to exercise all the powers of the company so purchased. The 53d section confers on the city the right of eminent domain, and authorizes it to appropriate such land and property as may be required in the construction of waterworks. The corporation act of April 29, 1874, gives to water companies the right to introduce into boroughs and cities, wherever they may be located, a sufficient supply of pure water; and, when completed, its right in the locality covered by its works is exclusive, until, during a period of five years, the company has divided among its stockholders a dividend equal to 8 per cent upon its capital stock. Then it is made lawful, after twenty years from the introduction of the water, for the municipality to become the owner of the waterworks, by paying the net cost of erecting and maintaining the same, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, deducting from such interest, however, any dividends theretofore declared. Both acts were passed at the same session of the legislature, within four weeks of each other. They are very elaborate, apparently making provision for every contingency that occurred to the legislative mind at the date of their passage; and clearly, from the proximity in dates of their discussion and enactment, no provision in the later act was intended to repeal the first directly or by repugnancy. In Smith v. People, 47 N. Y. 390, is this apt language, applicable to such facts: "Statutes enacted at the same session of the legislature should receive a construction, if possible, which will give effect to each. They are within the reason of the rule governing the construction of statutes in pari materia. Each is supposed to speak the mind of the same legislature, and the words used in each should be qualified and restricted, if necessary, in their construction and effect so as to give validity and effect to every other act passed at the same session."

Here, then, plainly, were two distinct methods by which the municipality could supply its citizens with water. By putting either method in operation the same end was accomplished; that is, the supplying of the citizens with water. There is no repugnancy in the provisions of the two acts, on the assumption that one or the other alone will be adopted to effect the purpose. There will be a decided repugnancy in their operation if both be put at work at the same time to effect that purpose. If anything be manifest, it is that if two water mains be laid side by side on the same street, equally accessible to the householder on each side, conveying double the quantity needed, with double sets of hydrants, pumping stations, offices, salaries, and expenses, one or the other must be abandoned. No community will pay double for any article of necessity or luxury. If the property holder must, by compulsory taxation, support the municipal system, he will not voluntarily support the private corporation system. Such a conflict of interests will inevitably bankrupt the system which depends on the voluntary patronage of the public. We hesitate to assume—every court is bound to hesitate long before assuming—that the legislature intends, by grants to distinct corporations for public purposes, that there shall arise such conflict in the exercise of the franchises as will result in the practical destruction of property of any citizen without compensation. It is a cardinal rule of construction, between older and younger grants of franchises, that the sovereign does not intend that the younger shall infringe on the older; but to assume that these franchises can be in existence and in operation at the same time is to assume that the commonwealth has granted precisely the same thing to the municipality that it had already granted to the water company, for, in a business view, the contemporaneous exercise of the franchises is impossible. Therefore, in approaching the consideration of the words of the acts, the judicial mind, at the start, must incline against the conclusion of the learned referee. Consider, then, the words of clause 9 of the 20th section of the act of May 23, 1874. The city is "to have at all times the exclusive right to supply itself with water, and such persons, partnerships, and corporations at such prices as may be agreed upon." This is the grant by the commonwealth of the power or authority to its creature, the municipality, which without the grant was helpless, in this purely commercial matter. It was not an exercise of governmental power, which would be implied from the mere creation of a municipality. In Western Sav. Fund Soc. v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 185, this court, in discussing this question, adopted this language: "As a local sovereign, it [the city] had no authority to enter into the business of manufacturing and selling gas. For its sovereignty did not extend to such subjects, any more than it did to almost any other manufacture. It is true, a municipal corporation is not bound by any engagement which prevents a discharge of the duties imposed upon it by its organic law, for the plain reason that such engagements are contrary to law. But when such a corporation engages in things not public in their nature, it acts as a private individual, no longer legislates, but contracts, and is as much bound by its engagements as is a natural person. The distinction between public duties and private business is wide and obvious." Therefore the grant specifically of the means by which the power may be executed is given. It shall have the unrestricted right to erect and maintain proper waterworks, machinery, buildings, and reservoirs, to convey and distribute the water. First is the exclusive power to supply itself, and then the powers incident to and necessary to make the first power effective. To have granted the right only to supply itself would have left a doubtful implication, as to whether it might erect its own works, or should buy its supply from corporation dealers in water. But after the grant of the right to supply, and the one method of exercising the right, it occurs to the legislative mind, as all such grants are strictly construed, and this prescribes but one method, that the city may be shut up to that one. The legislature, only twenty-four days before, had enacted that water companies might be authorized to supply water, and should have power to erect and maintain all works and machinery necessary and proper for raising and introducing into the town, borough, city, or district where they may be located a sufficient supply of pure water. Here was another kind of corporation than municipal, empowered to convey and distribute water to cities and towns. The city may not desire to erect and manage its own waterworks; may prefer to purchase water. Then comes the grant of a second method of supplying itself with water: "Or to make contracts with and authorize any persons, company, or association" to convey and distribute the water for any length of time not exceeding ten years. The primary grant was the power to supply; the secondary one, the grant of two distinct methods of exercising the power, either of which might be adopted. There was no grant of power to put both methods in operation at the same time; for once the power has been exercised to supply the city, by contract, through another creature of the same sovereign, then the municipal function has passed from the city, and must be performed by the other contracting party, which last has rights and obligations imposed upon it by law, as clearly defined and as capable of enforcement as those of the city. As long as the city keeps within the scope of its powers to bargain, it must stand by the bargain, the same as an individual. We do not doubt that the legislature could, by the act of May 23, 1874, have granted to the city the right to change back and forth from one method of supply to the other, as whim or interest might dictate. It is sufficient to say that it did not do so. This view of the scope of legislation on this subject accords with the known facts. A municipality, in its beginnings, is perhaps not financially strong, or its debt may approach the constitutional limit so closely that it cannot borrow. Nevertheless the low state of its financial condition does not render less urgent the necessity of a water supply. It can obtain it in but one way,—by contract with those who have the money, and are willing to invest their private capital in the construction of waterworks. The legislature knew that capital would not be invested in such an enterprise if in the future it were liable to confiscation by competition with a public enterprise operated from a municipal treasury capable of replenishment from the pocket of the taxpayer. That fact suggested clause 7 of the corporation act. The municipality will not be forever poor. The time will come when it will be of financial ability to own and operate its own works. The very fact of having a supply of water on an investment of private capital has tended to stimulate its growth, and to largely appreciate the value of taxable property. Therefore, says the legislature: "It shall be lawful at any time after twenty years from the introduction of water or gas, as the case may be, into any place as aforesaid, for the town, borough, city, or district in which the said company shall be located, to become the owners of said works, and the property of said company, by paying therefor the net cost of erecting and maintaining the same, with interest thereon, at the rate of 10 per centum per annum, deducting from said interest all dividends theretofore declared: provided, that nothing in this section contained shall authorize a company incorporated under the provisions of this act to construct gas or waterworks within the limits of any municipality, when gas or waterworks shall have been constructed by said municipality, without the lawful consent of the corporate authorities thereof: and provided further, that the court of common pleas of the proper county shall have jurisdiction and power upon the bill or petition of any citizen using the gas or water of any of said companies to hear, inquire, and determine as to the charges thereof for gas or water so furnished, and to decree that the said bill be dismissed, or that the charges shall be decreased, as to the said court may seem just and equitable, and to enforce obedience to their decrees by the usual process."

It is correct, as argued by defendants, that this clause is repealed by the act of May 23, 1889; but as between these contracting parties, whose rights vested at the date of the contract, the subsequent act could not divest them. If the act of 1874 had provided that the works should be taken at their actual value, and then had enacted a merely different form of procedure to ascertain the value, the contract right would not, perhaps, have been affected by the act of 1889. But here the value is a fixed one,—the net cost, with interest at 10 per cent per annum, deducting dividends. The result is one of computation. There is no room for discretion or judgment, which may be exercised under one form of proceeding as well as another. Both the contracting parties must be conclusively presumed to have had in view the law which empowered them to contract, and which became part of the contract. At the end of twenty years the defendants have a right to take the works at a price fixed by the law, and that is one of computation. True, as to the city, the taking of the works is only permissive. It is not bound to take them; while, if the city demands, plaintiffs are bound to surrender them. But, if the city does not choose to become the owner of the works in the mode pointed out in the act, it has no power to destroy their value by duplicating them at the expense of the taxpayers.

As to the question raised by clause 3, we decline to discuss it, as it has no bearing on the one before us. It will be time enough for that when two private corporations seek to exercise their franchises in the city at the same time.

The argument that by this construction the citizens are in the power of a private corporation, having the sole authority to determine the price, quantity, and quality of the water supply, is completely answered by the second proviso to clause 7, and subsequent legislation regulating the conduct of water companies. Brymer v. Butler Water Co. 172 Pa. 489; Com. v. McCormick, v. Russell, Id. 506. The two cases cited by the referee as sustaining his decision (Lahigh Water Co.'s Appeal, 102 Pa. 515. and Re Millvale, 162 Pa. 374), are in apparent conflict with this judgment; and the language of the court, to some extent, in both cases, would lead to a different conclusion from the one to which we have come. The first case, on its facts, however, is not the same as this. By a supplement to the act incorporating the borough of Easton, March 12, 1867, the town council was authorized to construct and provide waterworks, and elect water commissioners. Then, by another supplement, April 15 of the same year, the borough was authorized to construct or purchase waterworks. In this case the municipality had by these special acts, with the consent of the majority of voters, the authority to erect its own waterworks; and this special legislation constituted part of its corporate power, antedating the present Constitution and the acts of 1874. By the schedule to the Constitution it is declared: "All laws in force in this commonwealth at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, not inconsistent therewith, and all rights, actions, prosecutions and contracts, shall continue as if this Constitution had not been adopted." It was held that the authority conferred by the special acts of 1867 was not taken away by the act of 1874 giving the exclusive right to the water company. When it is noticed that the controversy turned on the repeal or nonrepeal of the special acts, and whether the borough had, by inaction under the special law, lost its right to construct municipal waterworks, the distinction between that case and the one before us is obvious. Without adverting to what was said by Justice Paxson in delivering the opinion, and considering only what was decided, there is no conflict between that case and this. In Re Millvale, supra, it was assumed by all parties in the court below, and by the learned judge of that court, that the authority of the municipality to violate its contract existed. On the appeal the point pressed in this case was scarcely touched upon in the argument. With the greatest reluctance on the part of every member of this court, the decree of the court below was affirmed. That reluctance is expressed in no doubtful language by our Brother Green, who delivered the opinion. In fact, it was assumed by all counsel and both courts that Lehigh Water Co.'s Appeal, supra, was decisive of the contention on that point, and the case went against the water company on other grounds. It was a mistake. We now are glad of the opportunity for correction,—especially so because the example of Millvale borough seems to have misled other municipal corporations to adopt the same course of action. Luzerne Water Co. v. Toby Creek Water Co. 143 Pa. 568, also cited by defendants, was a controversy between two rival companies, and the power of the municipality did not come in question.

Therefore in this case we are of opinion, for the reasons given, that the fifth exception to the learned referee's tenth conclusion of law should be sustained, and it is decreed accordingly. Further, it is directed that the said defendants and each and every of them, be restrained by a permanent injunction from entering into contract for the construction of waterworks in accordance with the plans prepared by the city civil engineer as aforesaid. It is further ordered that defendants pay the costs of this proceeding.

NORTHERN CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

(177 Pa. 142.)

1. Authority to a street-railway company to cross any railroad operated by steam or otherwise does not give power to cross elsewhere than at points where the railroad is crossed by a street or highway when other sections of the street-railway charter confine the adoption of its route to established streets and public highways.
2. A railroad right of way is property which the company may protect from unlawful invasion by a street-railroad company which seeks to establish a crossing over it.
3. Constructing a street railway on a viaduct 100 feet long and 23 feet high over a railroad company's right of way, and operating cars thereon, are such an invasion of the rights of the railroad company as will entitle it to maintain a suit to restrain it.

(October 5, 1890.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Cumberland County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from crossing plaintiff's right of way. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward B. Watts, W. F. Sadler, and John Hays, for appellants;

There was no right to cross land held in fee. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Montgomery County Pass. R. Co. 167 Pa. 62, 27 L. R. A. 766; Lehigh Coal & N. Co. v. Inter-County Street R. Co. 167 Pa. 75.

The Northern Central Railway Company has not only the same right as a private person to be compensated for injury to the land held by it in fee, which the defendant proposes to cross, but it also has such property or ownership in its right of way as cannot be appropriated to public use without its consent, unless provision be made for compensation for the damages suffered.

Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. v. Reading Paper Mills, 149 Pa. 18; Potts v. Quaker City Elec. R. Co. 161 Pa. 396; Pittsburgh Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Feet, 152 Pa. 488, 19 L. R. A. 467; Pittsburgh Junction R. Co.'s Appeal, 122 Pa. 511; Old Colony & F. R. Co. v. Plymouth County, 14 Gray, 155.

It was improper to begin the construction of the defendant's railway without the consent of all the owners of land through which it passed or which abutted on the roads over which it is proposed to build the same. The defendant did not have the consent of all such owners.

Lehigh Coal & N. Co. v. Inter-County Street R. Co. supra.

NOTE.—For crossing a railroad by a street railway without compensation to the railroad company, see Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. West Chicago Street R. Co. (Ill.) 20 L. R. A. 485, and note.

Messrs. A. G. Miller and J. W. Wetsel, for appellees:

Building on township roads is recognized by the Constitution.

Art. 17, § 9: Gettysburg Battlefield Assn. v. Gettysburg Electric R. Co. 2 Pa. Dist. R. 659; Gillette v. Chester & M. R. Co. Id. 450; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Montgomery County Pass. R. Co. 3 Pa. A railroad is a highway—a public highway—and is not held for all purposes as private property.

Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Southwest Pennsylvania R. Co. 77 Pa. 173.

The Constitution of the state permits crossings.

Const. 1874, art. 17, § 1: Junction R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 88 Pa. 424.

The learned court properly said that it was not within its province to question the franchise granted by the state.

Turnpike Co. v. Jenkintown Electric R. Co. and Plymouth Twp. v. Chestnut Hill & N. R. Co. 4 Pa. Dist. R. 8.

It matters not, so far as the right to cross steam railroads is conferred by act May 14, 1889, § 18, whether the land occupied by the railroad company for railroad and track purposes is held by easement, as it is commonly called, or in fee simple. It is the possession for railroad purposes, which prevails, and not as to how the right of possession was obtained.

Junction R. Co. v. Philadelphia, supra.

By virtue of act May 14, 1889, § 18, electric railways may cross steam railroads, and that, too, without compensation, etc., and the said act is constitutional.

Lockhart v. Craig Street R. Co. 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 470, 139 Pa. 419; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Wilkesbarre & W. S. R. Co. 1 Pa. Dist. R. 627.

This right to occupy the turnpikes and cross steam railroads is absolute by virtue of the act of 1889, and if the said railroads feel aggrieved, or that conditions to preserve their rights and safety of the public are necessary, an appeal can be made to the court under the act of June 19, 1871.

Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Wilkesbarre & W. S. R. Co. supra; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Broaddock Electric R. Co. 152 Pa. 116.

The right to cross another railway or railroad is expressly given, and prior consent is not needed.

Citizens' Pass. R. Co. v. East Harrisburg Pass. R. Co. 164 Pa. 274.

The court found that appellant would not be injured nor interfered with in the operation of its railroad by an overhead crossing as contemplated, and therefore there was no necessity to make an order defining conditions under the act of 1871.

Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Wilkesbarre & W. S. R. Co. supra.

Railways may diverge for a short distance where the conformation of the service or the position of streams makes it necessary in order to avoid discomfort or danger to the traveling public.

The right of electric passenger railways incorporated under the act of 1889 to occupy county roads with consent of local authorities has been recognized.

Sterrett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is unnecessary to consider all the questions presented by this record. Such of them as are worthy of notice have been referred to, at least briefly, by the learned president of the common pleas in his opinion, findings of fact, and conclusions of law sent up with the record. The general and controlling question, however, is whether a company chartered under the street railway act of May 14, 1889 (Pub. Laws, 211), has the right to construct, maintain, and operate its road across the lines of a steam-railroad company, without the consent and against the protest of the latter, at a point where its roadway is not crossed by a public highway. The answer to this question must, of course, be sought for in the expressly granted or necessarily implied powers and authority with which the street-railway company has been invested by the law under which it was created, and subject to which it continues to exist. If the right referred to cannot be found therein, it necessarily follows that the question must be answered in the negative. Section 1 of the act of 1889 provides "that any number of persons, not less than five, may form a company for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating a street railway on any street or highway upon which no track is laid, or authorized to be laid or to be extended under any existing charter, with the privilege of so much of any street, used or authorized to be used under any existing charter, as is hereinafter provided, for public use in the conveyance of passengers, by any power other than by locomotive; and for that purpose may make and sign articles of association, in which shall be stated . . . the streets and highways upon which the said railway is to be laid and constructed," etc. Section 4, authorizing extensions and branches, declares that "the act of the company authorizing any extension or branch shall distinctly name the streets and highways on which said extension or branch is to be laid or constructed." It also provides that "no extension or branch shall be constructed on any street or highway upon which a track is laid or authorized under any existing charter except as hereinafter provided." Section 14 authorizes the "use of such portion of the track of any other company, already laid down, as may be necessary to construct a circuit upon its own road at the end thereof." The length of track to be thus used "only with the consent of the local authorities of the city, borough, or township, in no event, shall exceed 500 feet of single track." It also prescribes the mode in which compensation for such use shall be made, etc. The next section declares: "No street passenger railway shall be constructed by any company incorporated under this act within the limits of any city, borough, or township without the consent of the local authorities thereof, nor shall any street railway be incorporated hereunder which shall not have a continuous route from the beginning to the end, forming a complete circuit with its own track, excepting the 500 feet to be used under § 14." Section 17 authorizes the occupation and use of turnpikes, not exceeding sufficient width for two tracks, and requires that compensation for such use shall be first made to the owner or owners of such turnpike or turnpikes, in the mode prescribed in § 14, aforesaid. With the exception of above-mentioned restricted and qualified rights to use a small section of another company's track in forming a circuit, and to occupy and use longitudinal strips of turnpikes, etc., street-railway companies chartered under said act are certainly not in express terms invested with any other power or authority in the nature of eminent domain. Indeed, the specific grant of these qualified rights is strongly indicative of legislative intention to withhold from such companies every other power of eminent domain. This conclusion is further fortified by the provisions intended to restrict them to establish streets and highways as the location of their main lines, extensions, and branches. As we have seen, their right to construct, maintain, and operate street railways is specifically limited to existing streets and highways. The names of the streets and highways selected by them must be stated in each company's articles of association. In the recorded action of the company exercising the branching power, etc., authorized by the act, it must also "distinctly name the streets and highways on which said extension or branch is to be laid or constructed." In brief, in the selection or adoption of the route, either of their main line or of any extension or branch thereof, they are expressly confined to established streets or other avenues in cities and boroughs, and to public highways in townships, subject to such further restrictions, even as to them, as are specified in the act. Outside of and beyond the restricted power and authority as to selection and adoption of a route, etc., thus granted, they are not invested with any other authority in that regard except such as may be necessarily implied. Without ignoring the well-settled rules applicable to the construction of charters, it is impossible to reach any other conclusion than that the legislature, in this carefully drawn and well-guarded act, intended to withhold from companies chartered thereunder everything in the nature of a roving commission under which they might assert the right to locate, construct, and operate street railroads wherever they pleased. It was successfully contended in the court below that the authority given in § 18 of the act "to cross at grade diagonally or transversely, any railroad operated by steam or otherwise," is general in its application, and confers an unqualified right to cross a steam railroad anywhere, without regard to whether there is an established street or highway crossing at the same point or not. This is a grave mistake. As we have seen, location, construction, and operation of street railways are authorized only on established streets and highways. Section 18 is evidently predicated of that fact, and hence the authority therein granted is necessarily applicable only to crossings at points where the railroad is crossed by a street or highway. In other words, it refers only to crossing at a point where the street or highway on which the street railway is located crosses the steam railroad. To hold otherwise would not only be contrary to the manifest intention of the legislature, but it would involve the constitutionality of the eighteenth section.

As to the property on which the alleged trespass was threatened, the learned trial judge found that "at the place of crossing plaintiff has a right of way 60 feet in width, and an adjoining strip of land 20 feet wide, which was acquired by deed;" and in sustaining plaintiff's eighteenth and nineteenth exceptions to his previous rulings he further found that said 20-foot-wide strip of land owned by it in fee, that prior to filing the bill defendant company attempted to cross plaintiff's land and right of way at the point in question, and that plaintiff had reason to apprehend that such attempt was imminent, etc.; but, in view of the facts, as he found them, he held as matter of law that plaintiff's right of way and ownership in fee of said strip of land were immaterial; that the right to cross plaintiff's railroad, etc., at an elevation of about 23 feet above the surface of its tracks was conferred upon the Harrisburg & Mechanicsburg Electric Railway Company by § 18 of the act, and then said: "The long, narrow piece of land referred to, which is held in fee, is essentially part and parcel of the railroad, just as much so as the easement which it adjoins, and the right to cross it is as clearly given as is the right to cross the easement." For reasons already suggested, we think he was clearly wrong in this. Aside from the ownership in fee of the 20-foot-wide strip, the plaintiff has a substantial property interest in its right of way which the defendant is bound to respect. While that interest cannot be called a fee, it is a species of title that has some of the incidents of an estate in land. As was well said by our Brother Mitchell in Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. v. Reading Paper Mills, 149 Pa. 18: "Such title is sometimes called an easement, but it is a right to exclusive possession, to fence in, to build over, the whole surface, to raise and maintain any appropriate superstructure, including necessary foundations, and to deal with it, within the limits of railroad uses, as absolutely and as uncontrolled as an owner in fee. There was no such easement at common law. . . . It would seem to be rather a fee in the surface, and so much beneath as may be necessary for support, though a base or conditional, fee terminable on the cesser of the use for railroad purposes. But, whatever it may be called, it is, in substance, an interest in the land special and exclusive in its nature, and which may be the subject of special injury. . . . and therefore within the rule which governs the application of equitable relief."

There is also manifest error in the tenth finding of fact, viz.: "So far as the evidence has disclosed, the building of defendant's railway and the running of cars thereon will not injure or affect the operation of plaintiff's railroad, or inflict upon plaintiff any actual damage. There will be no increase of danger from accident or other cause." Aside from the unauthorized occupation of plaintiff's property by spanning the same with an overhead bridge or viaduct, 100 feet or more in length and about 22 feet above its tracks, at a point where there has never been an overhead or grade crossing of any kind, it is impossible to reach the conclusion that such a superstructure, with electric cars running thereon at frequent intervals, will not result in a greater or less increase of danger to plaintiff company, its patrons, and employees. To what extent the danger from accident or other cause would be increased would, of course, depend very largely on the degree of care and skill exercised in the construction and maintenance of the bridge and in the operation of the street railway thereon; but that, under the most favorable circumstances, there would be an appreciable increase of danger, no one can doubt.

It follows from what has been said that plaintiff had standing to resist the threatened invasion of its rights by the Harrisburg & Mechanicsburg Electric Railway Company, one of the defendants, and, upon the facts shown by the pleadings and proofs, it was entitled to the relief prayed for.

The decree dismissing the bill is accordingly reversed, and the perpetual injunction specially prayed for is now granted against the Harrisburg & Mechanicsburg Electric Railway Company, with costs to be paid by said company; and as to the other defendant the bill is dismissed. It is also ordered that the record be remitted to the court below for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion of this court.

1. One having the lease of the roof and outside of a party wall of a building projecting above the adjoining buildings for the purpose of advertising thereon by means of a stereopticon, is not evicted by the destruction of the value of the wall for advertising purposes, caused by the tenant of the adjoining building, without any denial of the validity of the lease by renting the roof of his building with a screen erected thereon to another advertising company.
2. A lease of the roof and outside of a party wall of a building projecting above the adjoining buildings for the purpose of advertising thereon by means of a stereopticon does not become invalid for failure of consideration because the tenant in possession of the adjoining building, without questioning the validity of the lease, leases the roof of his building with a screen erected thereon to another advertising company, by means of which the value of the wall for advertising purposes is destroyed, where the lease contained no provision on that point.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

There can be no such thing as a party wall where the premises in question and the adjoining premises are owned by the same person, as in this case.

Finley v. Stuebing, 88 Phila. Leg. Int. 386; Weston v. Arnold, 22 Week. Rep. 284, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 128.

If consent of the tenant of the adjoining property to the use of the wall had been obtained by the lessees, they would presumably have continued to pay the rent. Because they neglected or refused to do so, can the defendants visit the result of such neglect or refusal upon the plaintiff, who was in no default whatever, and refuse to pay the rent due under the contract? When one of two parties to a contract must suffer, shall it not be the one who is in default?

If the thing promised be possible in itself, it is no excuse that the promisor became unable to perform it by causes beyond his own control, for it was his own fault to run the risk of undertaking, unconditionally, to fulfil a promise when he might have guarded himself by the terms of his contract.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts upon which the legal question presented on this record is raised are quite novel. It appears from the evidence that Andrew Moore is the owner of a row of buildings between the hotel known as the "Girard House" and Ninth street, extending from Jayne street to Chestnut. The most northerly of these buildings is No. 29 South Ninth street, and it has been occupied for some time by the plaintiffs as lessees of Moore. The building next to No. 29 is in the occupancy of George M. Moore as a tenant, and is but one story high. The other buildings, down to Chestnut street, are also but one story high, while No. 29 is two stories in height. The south wall of No. 29 is for this reason plainly visible above the buildings south of it to persons going in and out of the postoffice, and to persons passing along Chestnut street, at its intersection with Ninth street, and for some distance westwardly therefrom. The American Bill-Posting Company, Limited, desired to make use of the conspicuous surface so presented for the display of advertisements by means of pictures and words thrown upon the wall by a stereopticon; and it entered into a contract, in the form of a lease, with the plaintiff, for the use of the roof and south wall of No. 29 at an agreed rent. The defendants are the sureties of the company upon this contract. The company took possession of the roof and south wall in pursuance of its contract, and entered upon the display of its advertisements, which were thrown upon the south wall by means of a stereopticon. Some time afterwards George M. Moore made a lease of the roof of the building occupied by him, for a similar purpose, to the American Exhibition Company. The use of this building was made possible by the erection of a frame upon the roof to support a screen on which views could be displayed. This frame and screen, when in place, nearly covered up the south wall of No. 29, and rendered it practically valueless to the bill-posting company. It thereupon abandoned the effort to use it, and refused to pay accruing rent. The position taken by it was that it had been evicted from the leasehold, and that the rent was, as a matter of law, suspended in consequence.

If the facts amount to an eviction, the defense is well taken. It may be conceded that the plaintiff had no title to the south wall of No. 29. It was a party wall, and the rights of the plaintiff did not extend beyond its center. Its southern face belonged, for all purposes, to the owner of the land on which that half of the wall rested. But the company was put into actual possession of its surface. Neither the plaintiff nor the owner nor the tenant of the adjoining building has objected, or denied the validity of the lease. What has happened is that the tenant of the adjoining property has made a contract with another company for the use, not of the wall of No. 29, but of a frame erected on his own roof, and that the use of this frame has the effect of covering up considerable of the surface of the south wall of No. 29, and greatly reducing its value as a surface for the display of advertisements. Is this an eviction? Originally an eviction was understood to be a dispossession of the tenant by some act of his landlord, or by the failure of his title. Anderson, Law Dict. 418. It has come in later years to include any wrongful act of the landlord which may result in an interference with the tenant's possession in whole or in part. The act may be one of omission as well as one of commission. The rent is suspended by an eviction because it is plainly unjust that the landlord should be permitted to collect it while, by his own act, he deprives his tenant of the possession which is the consideration for it. But the landlord is not responsible for the acts of others lawfully done on their own premises. He is liable only for his own acts, and for such acts of others as it was his duty to protect his tenant from. Tiley v. Moyers, 43 Pa. 404; Hoeverer v. Fleming, 91 Pa. 322.

If Mrs. Oakford or Andrew Moore, her landlord, or any person having an estate in fee simply or by lease in the party wall on the south side of No. 29, had objected to the use of that wall by the bill-posting company, and ousted it from its possession, whether by legal proceedings or by physical interference, an eviction would have taken place. The right to use the wall would in that case have been taken away from the tenant, and the duty to pay rent would have ceased. But neither Mrs. Oakford nor her landlord nor any other person has objected. No ouster by legal proceedings or by physical interference has taken place. The lessee is still in possession so far as the plaintiff or anyone having any right to question its possession is concerned; but that possession has been lessened, perhaps practically destroyed, by the action of an adjoining tenant. If this action was a lawful one, within the limit of his own premises, the plaintiff cannot be held liable for it. The covenants for quiet possession relate only to acts of the lessor and those acting under him, or of the holder of a better title. They do not extend to the ill-natured conduct of other persons by which the value or the comfort of the leasehold may be diminished. The probability that the view of the south wall of No. 29 would be cut off by some intervening structure between it and Chestnut street, erected by one of the owners or tenants in the row, was one that could be estimated by the company as well as by Mrs. Oakford. If the company desired to guard against this contingency, it could have been done by contract with the intervening tenants, or by a special covenant with Mrs. Oakford. But the company made no inquiry and took no precautions. It assumed the risk of the actions of the owners and tenants of the property between No. 29 and Chestnut street, and the result has been what should have been anticipated. The tenant of an intervening property has undertaken to furnish a wholly different surface for the display of advertisements, which, when in use, conceals the south wall of No. 29 from view, and takes away its value. This does not seem to us to be an eviction. The tenant has been disappointed, but not dispossessed. He is in possession of the space he leased, but he cannot use it in the manner he anticipated because of the action of a third person, done within the limits of his own leasehold. If this was not an eviction, for the same reason it does not amount to a failure of consideration, as the case appears on this record. The consideration of the promise to pay rent was the right to the use of the roof and south wall of No. 29. That right has not been legally denied, but its value has been reduced. Since the action of George W. Moore, it is not worth the rent the bill posting company promised to pay for it. But, if the depreciation is not chargeable to the plaintiff, it is the misfortune of the company to have had its possession made useless by the intervention of parties with whom it had no contract, and against whose conduct it had no covenant.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY OF NEW JERSEY.

(178 Pa. 307.)

1. A lease by a railroad company without clear and specific statutory authority is utterly void.

2. A statute of a state in which a railroad company is organized can give it no authority to lease a railroad held by it in another state contrary to the policy of the latter state.

3. Evidence that a certain engine which passed at the time a fire started threw sparks to an unusual distance is sufficient to go to the jury on the question whether or not such engine caused the fire, notwithstanding testimony that such engine was provided with a sufficient spark arrester.

4. The testimony of a witness that she had seen the engine claimed to have set a fire on different occasions throw large coals should not be taken from the jury, notwithstanding she testifies on cross-examination that she was mistaken, where the reason she gives for her mistake is unsatisfactory.

5. Evidence as to sparks thrown and fires set by unidentified engines is admissible in an action against a railroad company for fires charged to have been set by sparks, where there is evidence that the fire started while two trains were passing.

The contracts were just what they purported to be, viz., a lease by the Central Company to the Port Reading Company, and a guaranty of the rentals by the Philadelphia & Reading Company to the Central Company.

Where the statute authorizes the lease, the lessee assumes during the existence of the lease all the duties and obligations of the lessor, and, from the time it enters into possession of the road, becomes solely liable for all injuries resulting from its management unless it is operating the road in the name of the lessor.

In 1887 a lease was executed between the Central Company and the Philadelphia & Reading Company directly, and Mr. Dinsmore sought to have a preliminary injunction issued in the United States circuit court upon this ground alone, and the court refused to permit the injunction to go.

Dinsmore v. Central R. Co. 19 Fed. Rep. 153.

If a preliminary injunction could not issue from the New Jersey courts, it cannot be possible that the Pennsylvania courts will determine it in this proceeding.

The question of the validity of the lease is a question of mixed law and fact, but some evidence must surely be adduced to submit to the jury before, under the instructions of the court, they can be permitted to pass upon the question whether the prohibition against consolidation of competing lines was infringed by the agreements in question.

Com. v. South Pennsylvania R. Co. 1 Pa. Co. Ct. 214; Gummere v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 1 Pa. Dist. R. 585.

The Central Company was lawfully in possession of this division of its railroad. It executed a contract with another corporation of New Jersey in New Jersey by which it let its whole system, including this branch to the Port Reading Company. Admittedly that contract in New Jersey is a perfectly valid one. The lex loci contractus sustains it. The Lehigh Coal & Navigation Company, its lessor, acquiesces in it so far as we know, and there is no provision in its lease to prevent it. The Lehigh Coal & Navigation Company under the laws of Pennsylvania could have made this lease direct to the Port Reading Company. The implication of all the acts of assembly is that such a contract is valid. No prohibitive statute is shown.

Baltimore & P. & B. Co. v. McCutcheon, 18 Pa. 13.

McCullum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Three questions are raised by the specifications of error: (1) Was the action, in view of the leases given in evidence, maintainable against the defendant? (2) Was there sufficient evidence of negligence to submit to the jury? (3) Was the evidence as to the condition of the unidentified engines properly excluded? These questions will be considered in the order in which they are stated.

The action was brought to recover damages for the destruction of plaintiff's buildings by fire caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant, as the lessee of the Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad. To fix the liability upon the defendant company, the plaintiff gave in evidence the charter of the Lehigh Coal & Navigation Company, under which the Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad was constructed, and the charter of the defendant company, a corporation of the state of New Jersey, and a lease of the former road by the latter company for a period of 999 years, dated March 31, 1871. The defendant gave in evidence a lease dated February 12, 1892, by the defendant company to the Port Reading Railroad Company, a corporation of the state of New Jersey, of their railroads and leased roads, including the Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad, with the rolling stock, for the balance of the term of 999 years. The Port Reading Railroad was projected to extend "from a point on the Bound Brook Railroad to a point on the Arthur Kill, on the Staten Island Sound," and was not shown to form a continuous route with the Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad, and was unfinished at the time of the execution of the lease. The plaintiff, in rebuttal, gave in evidence a lease, dated February 11, 1892, of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company of their roads in Pennsylvania, with the rolling stock, to the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, for a term of 999 years, together with a tripartite agreement, dated February 12, 1892, between the defendant company, the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, and the Port Reading Railroad Company, and further evidence to show that the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, and not the Port Reading Railroad Company, was the real lessee from the defendant company, in contravention of the laws of Pennsylvania inhibiting the merger of parallel and competing lines, and the laws of New Jersey restricting the execution of leases made by foreign corporations. The court took the case from the jury, one of the grounds specified being that, under the evidence, the action was not brought against the proper party. The plaintiff's evidence given in chief was sufficient to establish a liability on the part of the defendant for negligence, until overcome by countervailing evidence on the part of the defendant. If the defendant's evidence is insufficient for that purpose, it will not be necessary to consider the testimony in rebuttal. The first question which presents itself for consideration, therefore, is whether the lease of the defendant company to the Port Reading Railroad Company was valid.

The general rule of law governing the execution of railroad leases is thus stated by Mr Justice Sharswood in Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Bedford & B. R. Co. 81* Pa. 104: "One railroad company cannot lease to another its franchise of operating a road built or authorized to be built, unless it can show a grant of power from the sovereign in express terms or by necessary implication. In England, courts of equity have frequently enjoined railway companies from carrying leasing contracts into effect which wanted the express authority of Parliament. 1 Redf. Railways, 592. The general canon of construction applicable to legislative grants of this class, derogating, as they do, from common right and public policy, requires that the intention should be very manifest if not to be unequivocally expressed, at all events not to depend upon ambiguous phrases, rendering the implication doubtful." Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Allegheny County, 63 Pa. 126, and Stewart's Appeal, 56 Pa. 418, are authorities for the same principle.

The defendant points to the statute of New Jersey for its authority for the execution of the lease, by which it seeks to escape liability. But the defendant company and the Port Reading Company are foreign corporations, and this leads us to inquire, What is their standing in our courts? A "corporation, being the mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. . . . The recognition of its existence even by other states, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein depend purely upon the comity of those states,—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy." Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 181, 19 L. ed. 860. The public policy of a state is to be deduced from the general course of legislation and the settled adjudications of its highest courts. American & F. Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 856, 25 L. ed. 890. It has been ruled that an act, although held to be unconstitutional, may express legislative policy as to foreign corporations. Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex. App.) 12 L. R. A. 366.

The next question which we are called upon to consider is the public policy of our state as to the leasing of railroads. All of the statutes to which our attention has been directed, conferring leasing powers upon railroads, are limited to railroad companies created by or existing under the laws of this commonwealth giving them leasing rights with foreign or domestic railroads, provided they shall be connected with each other directly, or by intervening railroads. It has been decided that the terms of a statute providing for the leasing of continuous lines must be held to refer to corporations of the state, unless there is an expressed intent that they are to apply to foreign corporations. Freeman v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 28 Minn. 443. In Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co., supra, it was held that the repeal of the statute granting the privilege of organizing mercantile corporations was a direct prohibition against the operation of such corporations within the state, and therefore the law of comity did not require that a mercantile corporation organized under the laws of another state should be allowed to do business therein. In Methodist Church v. Remington, 1 Watts, 219, 26 Am. Dec. 61, it was held that the equitable powers of the courts will not be exercised to enforce a trust which is against the policy of the state, as expressed by the legislature in parallel cases.

The warrant for the Port Reading lease must be found, if at all, in the legislation of this state. The defendant company relies upon the lease as a defense to the suit. It ought therefore to show that it is such a lease as is authorized by our laws. The act of April 23, 1861 (Pub. Laws, 410), and the act of February 17, 1870 (Pub. Laws, 81), expressly confer upon railroad companies leasing powers, but in each the grant of these powers is upon a condition named therein. To these acts the defendant must look for its authority to make the lease. It cannot be found in the act of March 24, 1865 (Pub. Laws, 49), or in the act of April 14, 1868 (Pub. Laws, 100). Neither of them expressly or by necessary implication confers leasing rights. The act of 1861 confers the right to lease, "provided that the roads of the companies so contracting or leasing shall be directly or by means of intersecting railroads connected with each other;" and the act of 1870 confers it, "provided, however, that such road or roads so embraced in any lease . . . shall be connected, either directly or by intervening line, with the railroad or railroads of said company or companies of this commonwealth so entering into such lease, . . . and thus forming a continuous route or routes for the transportation of persons and property." There is nothing in the Port Reading lease or in the evidence in the case which shows that the Port Reading Railroad was connected directly or by intervening line with the Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad, and it is not claimed in the printed argument of the appellee that they were so connected. As the defendant company relied on its lease to the Port Reading Company for exemption from liability for loss or injury caused by the negligent operation of the Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad, it was bound to show a warrant for the lease in the statutes of this Commonwealth. This, as we have seen, it failed to do. It is well settled that, "where the lease is made without clear and specific authority, it is utterly void, because public policy very strongly opposes any attempt on the part of the company to relieve itself of its high obligations by transferring them to another company; and, where this is the case, the liability of the lessor is entirely unaffected by the void lease. It remains the same, the lessee being regarded merely as the agents." Wood, Railway Law, 1055, 1056, and cases cited.

We have not considered the appellant's contention that the lease to the Port Reading Company was in fact, though not in form, a lease to the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, nor whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the Lehigh Valley Railroad and the Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad are parallel and competing lines. While these are questions of fact, to be determined upon evidence applicable to them in a proceeding to cancel the lease, the question whether they can be raised in an action for loss or injury caused by negligence in the operation of the road does not appear to have been presented to or considered by the court below, nor was it brought to our notice in the argument on appeal. We express no opinion on this question now, but we suggest that it ought to be raised, argued, and considered in the court below and here before there is a final decision of it.

The next question to be considered relates to the sufficiency of the evidence offered to prove the negligence of the defendant. The buildings destroyed were a barn, wagon shed, grain shed, and pig sty, located in close proximity to the railroad tracks. The distance from the west-bound track to the place where the fire originated, in a pile of straw at the rear of the barn, was about 122 feet. The fire occurred on the 19th of July, 1892, about 6 o'clock in the evening, at the close of the day's work of threshing. It was first seen by the hired girl, Edna Redener. She testified that, immediately before she saw the fire, she had been sent from the house to the wood pile for some wood, and that, while she was standing on the porch of the house, she saw the west-bound coal train, with engine No. 815, pass the premises, going west. On reaching the wood pile, she saw the fire, and she at once notified Eugene Kindt, the tenant of the farm, who was in the barn sweeping the floor. She further testified that she had seen this engine on different occasions throw coals as large as hickory nuts. Eugene Kindt testified that, from the front part of the barn, he saw the tail end of a train going west when he started towards the fire, and, when he first saw the fire, he could have covered it with a big hat. John Ruple testified that he lived about 150 rods west of the plaintiff's buildings, and some 120 yards from the railroad; that he was on his porch, watching for his brother on an east-bound train, at the time the fire started; that the east-bound and west-bound trains passed each other about 75 yards west of the barn; that the west-bound train was moving at the rate of 25 or 30 miles an hour, and threw fire some 40 or 50 feet up in the air; that it set fire to the grass alongside of the track; and that "the tail end of the east-bound train had not passed yet when the fire broke out." John Warg testified that he had seen No. 815 throw coals the size of a hazel nut, from 150 to 200 feet. A number of other witnesses testified that unidentified locomotives on this railroad threw large coals shortly before and after the fire. Witnesses were produced by the defendant who testified that engine No. 815 was furnished with a spark arrester of an improved pattern, and that it had been examined shortly before and after the fire, and found in good condition. Defendant then recalled Edna Redener for further cross-examination. She testified that she was mistaken when she stated in her former examination that she had seen engine No. 815 throw sparks as large as hickory nuts, but the reason she gave for her mistake is not satisfactory. The reason she gave was that Mrs. Kindt told her she was mistaken, although she admitted that Mrs. Kindt was not present at the time she before thought she had seen the sparks. Mrs. Kindt was also called by the defendant for further cross-examination, and testified that the fire had started before the east-bound train had passed. The court thereupon struck out all the evidence as to the condition of the unidentified engines, and refused to receive similar offers, and, holding that the plaintiff had failed to make out a case, gave binding instructions for the defendant.

The evidence has been briefly reviewed in order to determine whether it was of such a character as to warrant a submission to the jury. If the action of the court in excluding the evidence in regard to sparks thrown and fire set by unidentified engines was correct, still there was sufficient evidence of negligence to warrant a jury in finding it. Besides the witness Edna Redener, there were two other witnesses who testified, among other things, as to the unusual distance to which the sparks from engine No. 815 were borne. Such evidence required the submission of the case to the jury, notwithstanding the testimony that the engine was provided with a sufficient spark arrester. Huyett v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 23 Pa. 374; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hendrickson, 80 Pa. 182, 21 Am. Rep. 97; Pennsylvania Co. v. Watson, 81* Pa. 298; Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. McKeen, 90 Pa. 122, 35 Am. Rep. 644; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Schulte, 98 Pa. 341; and Henderson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 144 Pa. 461, 16 L. R. A. 299.

We also think the court erred in holding that the testimony of Edna Redener should not be submitted to the consideration of the jury. When the unsatisfactory reason for correcting her testimony is considered, we think the jury should have been permitted to pass upon it. The same may be said of the evidence as to the unidentified engines. Mrs. Kindt's testimony that the fire had started before the east-bound train had passed was not undisputed. The positive evidence of John Ruple left the question in doubt, and that doubt should have been solved by the jury, and not by the court. Kohler v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 135 Pa. 346; Kly v. Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. 158 Pa. 233; and Glass v. Philadelphia, 169 Pa. 492.

Judgment reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

It is a maxim of the law that "everything will be presumed against the despoiler." (Omnia presumuntur in odium spoliatoris.) Loft's Maxims, No. 339; Broom, Legal Maxims, 938.

This doctrine, though not the first time iterated, is the best exemplified in that most celebrated old case—Armory v. Delamirie, quaintly and tersely reported as follows: "The plaintiff, being a chimney-sweeper's boy, found a jewel, and carried it to the defendant's shop (who was a goldsmith) to know what it was, and delivered it into the hands of the apprentice, who, under a pretense of weighing it, took out the stones, and, calling to the master to let him know it came to three half pence, the master offered the boy the money, who refused to take it, and insisted to have the thing again; whereupon the apprentice delivered him back the socket without the stones." In trover against the master, "several of the trade were examined to prove what a jewel of the finest water that would fit the socket would be worth; and the chief justice directed the jury, that unless the defendant did produce the jewel, and show it not to be of the finest water, they should presume the strongest against him, and make the value of the best jewels the measure of their damages, which they accordingly did." 1 Strange, 605, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. 636.

In other words the rhymster has said:

"And seeing by this wickedness the stone
Was made away and his worth known to none,
Craftsmen there came to show by weight and tale
What gems of best and uttermost avail
Might in the compass of that ring be laid,
With no less damage it should be paid;
For what man hideth in wrong-doing
Against him the law deemeth everything."
[Leading Cases Done into English, London, 1876.]

"The presumption in odium spoliatoris is perfectly legitimate. It is so natural and so just that it is a part of every civilized code." Bryant v. Stilwell, 24 Pa. 814, 817.

Concerning evidence this presumption is applied in varying degrees of severity in three general classes of cases: (1) Where a party fails to produce evidence after demand or notice by the party entitled to the production thereof; (2) where a party fails to introduce documentary (the "best") evidence which would properly be a part of the case; and (3) where a party adversely interested destroys or withholds evidence to which the adversary is entitled. That a case of the last-named class often is the result of its being one of the other two.

- I. Where a party fails to produce evidence after demand or notice by the party entitled to the production thereof.

When a party who has control of evidence fails to produce it in response to a subpoena duces tecum, or notice, from another party to the suit entitled to its possession (or upon demand when the writing or other evidence is present in court), secondary evidence may be offered, and the strongest presumption favoring it will be entertained in odium spoliatoris. Thayer v. Middlesex Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Pick. 328; Clifton v. United States, 45 U. S. 4 How. 242, 11 L. ed. 967; Leeds v. Cook, 4 Esp. 256; Atty. Gen. v. Halliday, 26 U. C. Q. B. 307.

Mr. T. F. Burke for plaintiff in error.
Messrs. R. E. Esteb and J. A. Van Orsdel for defendant in error.

Groesbeck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action against Henry G. Hay, the plaintiff in error, as executor of the last will and testament of Charles G. Strom, deceased, to recover for services rendered by Severin Peterson, the defendant in error, to decedent, during his lifetime, in the sum of $7,186.67, for fourteen years, ten months, and twenty days, at the rate of $40 per month, the period of time being from November 1, 1878, to September 21, 1893, at which last-named date the employer died. The claim was presented to the executor, and disallowed. The petition declares upon a quantum meruit, and alleges that the reasonable value of the services was $40 per month, and "that plaintiff has received no compensation for his labor during said period." The amended answer, upon which the trial was had, for a first defense denied each allegation of the petition, except the death of Strom, the employer, the probate of his will, the appointment and qualification of the executor, the presentation of the claim, its disallowance, and the filing of the claim with the clerk of the district court of the proper county, and that the plaintiff worked for said Strom during most of the period alleged in the petition, except when he was sick and unable to work. The second defense, in brief, sets forth that the plaintiff below made his home with Strom, and was a member of his family, and was during all of the period mentioned in the petition provided with food, clothing, lodging, medical attendance, and care, and that any labor performed by Peterson for Strom was rendered as a member of Strom's family, without any contract between the parties, or any promise on the part of Strom to pay for the same; that Strom took Peterson into his home as a matter of friendship, and by reason of his charitable and friendly feeling towards him cared for and maintained him as one of his family, furnishing all the necessities of life and supplies for his subsistence, as well as various sums of money from time to time for his personal needs and expenses, including, among other sums of money, not less than $6 per month, monthly, during the years 1886, 1887, and 1888. The third defense alleges that the said sum of $6 per month during the years aforesaid received by Peterson was all that his services were worth over and above his board, lodging, medical attendance, and care, and that he was paid in full whatever was due him up to December 31, 1893, and that all of the claim of the plaintiff prior to September 20, 1885, accrued more than eight years prior to the commencement of the suit, and was barred by the statute of limitations. The fourth defense sets forth in a different form the bar of the statute of limitations, showing that on the 10th day of January, 1891, all of the claim of the plaintiff for work prior to January 10, 1887, had accrued more than four years, and was then barred by the statute of limitations as it existed on January 10, 1891, the date of the approval of chapter 72, Laws 1890-91,

It does not, however, dispense with the necessity of making proof. The burden is upon the party making the demand or giving the notice, not only to prove that such notice was given but also to make out a case by substitution of other evidence for that which the adversary does not produce. Moulton v. Mason, 21 Mich. 364; Hunt v. Collins, 4 Iowa, 56; Spring Garden Mut. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 9 Md. 1, 68 Am. Dec. 30; Lawson v. Sherwood, 1 Stark. 314.

The presumption aids the evidence offered in lieu of that which is withheld, but it does not pre-suppose the existence of a fact not shown. There is, however, on Lord Abinger's assertion, one circumstance under which such secondary evidence of the contents of the document cannot be given. It is where the document is in existence in the control of a third person. Doe, Bowdler, v. Owen, 8 Car. & P. 110.

This division of the subject has been hereinbefore considered,—Cartier v. Troy Lumber Co. (Ill.) 14 L. R. A. 470,—and needs no other mention here than that when there is in fact a destruction of the evidence withheld, the case comes within the third class as shown below.

II. Where a party fails to introduce documentary (the "best") evidence which would properly be a part of the case.

a. The rule stated.

Complete suppression for the purposes of the suit is equal to spoliation, and it has been said to be ground for presuming that which was claimed by the adversary. Bowles v. Stewart, 1 Sch. & Lef. 200, 222.

"To smother evidence is not much better than to fabricate it. A party who shuts the door upon a fair examination, and thus prevents the jury from learning a material fact, must take the consequences of an honest indignation which his conduct may excite." Bryant v. Stilwell, 24 Pa. 314, 317.

It is at least true that "when a person is proved to have suppressed any species of evidence or to have defaced or destroyed any written instrument, a presumption will arise that if the truth had appeared it would have been against his interest, and that his conduct is attributable to his knowledge of the circumstances." The general rule is, Omnis presumitur in odium spoliatoris. Winchell v. Edwards, 57 Ill. 41; Riggs v. Pennsylvania & N. E. R. Co. 16 Fed. Rep. 804.

Where evidence which would properly be a part of the case is within the control of the party whose interest it would naturally be to produce it, and, without satisfactory explanation, he fails to do so, the jury "may" draw an inference that would be unfavorable to him. Hall v. Vanderpool, 156 Pa. 152; Thompson v. Shannon, 9 Tex. 536; Black v. Wright, 9 Fred. L. 447; Bindley v. Martin Bros. 23 W. Va. 773; McDonough v. O'Neil, 113 Mass. 82.

They may presume that had it been produced it would have been against him. Miller v. Jones, 32 Ark. 337.

Therefore the neglect to make proof raises the presumption that he could not have done so. Parks v. Richardson, 4 B. Mon. 276.

The withholding of books of account may raise "every presumption against them." Page v. Stephens, 23 Mich. 337.

The neglect of an executor to keep strict accounts, when it was his duty to collect the rents and he had collected part of them, raised the presumption that he had collected all of them. Landis v. Scott, 32 Pa. 465.

And the failure to produce a note in evidence raised every fair presumption against it. Symington v. M'Lin, 1 Dev. & B. L. 261.

which extended the time for bringing actions upon contracts not in writing, either express or implied, from four years, the limitation theretofore fixed by § 2870 of the Revised Statutes of Wyoming, to eight years. The sixth defense alleged payment in full, and the seventh defense was a counterclaim for board, lodging, medical attendance, subsistence, and care furnished to Peterson by Strom, alleged to be reasonably worth the sum sued for. It is conceded that a reply was filed to the affirmative defenses of the answer. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff below in the sum of $3,297.83, and, upon a motion for a new trial, the court found the verdict excessive, and directed that the motion should be granted, unless the plaintiff, Peterson, filed a remittitur in the sum of $878.83, reducing the verdict to the sum of $2,419. This remittitur was filed, the motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment was entered for the amount of the verdict as reduced. The deductions made from the verdict were for three months' services while plaintiff below was sick and in the hospital, and by a payment of $6 per month for the years 1886 to 1888, inclusive, amounting in the aggregate to $261, the further reduction allowed by the court being the difference between the rate of wages per month allowed by the jury and the rate of $15 per month allowed by the court, exclusive of board, lodging, and clothing.

There are twenty-two assignments of error in the action of the trial court in rejecting certain evidence offered by the plaintiff in error, the refusal of certain instructions requested by him, and the giving of certain instructions requested by the adverse party. The verdict is also assailed as not based upon sufficient evidence, and as contrary to law. Peterson, the plaintiff below, did not testify as to the contract or term of service, probably because his adversary was the executor of the will of decedent, and no objection is made on that score under the rule laid down by our statute excluding a party from testifying in such matters where his adversary is an executor. The testimony to support the claim of the plaintiff below was that of admissions made by the decedent during his lifetime that he had promised to pay Peterson when he was "through with him," one of the witnesses stating that the amount was $40, and another $30, per month. There was other testimony to the effect that the decedent had said that he had not paid Peterson anything, as the latter was unable to take care of his money; and that decedent had shown a package, which he had put in his safe, to a witness, and stated that it was Peterson's wages. The services of Peterson were of long daily duration, and consisted of his attendance at the liquor saloon of his employer, where he had waited upon customers, and performed menial labors in cleaning out the saloon. Besides these services, he had performed personal services in waiting upon his employer. The evidence very clearly establishes that Peterson did not render his services as a member of Strom's family, nor in return for board, lodging, and medical care when sick. A portion of the time—about three months—he was sick at the hospital, and was Likewise a party's refusal to explain what he can explain justifies the presumption that his explanation would be to his prejudice. Heath v. Waters, 40 Mich. 457; Union Parish School Board v. Trimble, 88 La. Ann. 1073; Mitchell v. Napier, 22 Tex. 120.

The presumption arises most strongly against one who keeps back documents. Atty. Gen. v. Dean and Canons of Windsor, 24 Beav. 679.

The refusal to offer a deed in evidence which is present in court warrants the strongest presumption that the deed would show that the possessor claiming title under it had none. Roe, Haldane, v. Harvey, 4 Burr. 2484.

Where a deed stands in the way of a party's inheritance under a will, and such party does not produce it or account for its loss, the court will give the most favorable intendment as to its contents, for the benefit of the heir. Livingston v. Newkirk, 3 Johns. Ch. 815.

"This is the settled doctrine in the books; and it is founded on the maxim of law, that omnia presumuntur in odium spoliatoris." Ibid.; Rex v. Countess Arundel, Hob. 109; Dalton v. Coatsworth, 1 P. Wms. 731; Cowper v. Earl Cowper, 2 P. Wms. 720, 748; Cookes v. Heller, 1 Ves. Sr. 234.

The nonproduction of a lease raises a presumption that the production of it would do the plaintiff no good. Tryman v. Knowles, 13 C. B. 222, 22 L. J. C. P. N. S. 143, 17 Jur. 238; Hardon v. Hesketh, 4 Hurlst. & N. 175, 28 L. J. Exch. N. S. 187.

And the suppression of receipts is evidence that such receipts afford inferences unfavorable to the title of the plaintiff. James v. Blow, and Owen v. Flack, 2 Sim. & Stu. 600, 608, 4 L. J. Ch. N. S. 202.

b. The substituted evidence.

The best evidence is required and a party is not permitted to have recourse to secondary evidence except in cases of accident, honest mistake, or involuntary necessity. The party who, having it in his power to produce the best evidence, voluntarily suppresses or destroys it, creates every presumption against himself as a depollor. Before he will be permitted to enjoy the benefit of the rule admitting secondary evidence, he must first rebut the inference that the original document or other evidence was kept back or destroyed by design. He cannot give parol or secondary evidence of its contents without first introducing evidence sufficient to rebut the suspicion of fraud which arises from his act. The motive of the destruction is the controlling fact which determines the admissibility of the secondary evidence. When the loss or destruction is shown to be without mala fides the rule laid down in the celebrated case of Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange, 605, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. 636, does not apply, and the party will be allowed the same benefit from the proof of contents as he would if the document itself had been produced. Riggs v. Taylor, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 408, 6 L. ed. 140; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 581, 6 L. ed. 166; Broadwell v. Stiles, 8 N. J. L. 71; Price v. Tailman, 1 N. J. L. 447; Livingston v. Rogers, 2 Johns. Cas. 483, 1 Cal. Cas. 27; Blade v. Nolan, 12 Wend. 173, 27 Am. Dec. 126; "The Count Joannes" v. Bennett, 5 Allen, 169, 81 Am. Dec. 738; Rudolph v. Lane, 67 Ind. 115; Blake v. Fash, 44 Ill. 304; Palmer v. Goldsmith, 15 Ill. App. 544; Bagley v. McMickle, 9 Cal. 490; Bagley v. Eaton, 10 Cal. 126, 148; Clunnes v. Pezzy, 1 Campb. 8; Saltern v. Melhuish, AmbL 247.

What shall constitute satisfactory proof that evidence was withheld or destroyed for an improper purpose cannot easily be reduced to a fixed rule. The presumption is not universal and inelastic, but special, varying with the concrete case. It must be applied with judgment and sound discretion. It is a presumption of fact and a county charge. The instructions for the defense that the services were rendered as a member of the family of Strom seem to fairly present the law, and the burden of proving that there was an understanding that Peterson was to receive nothing for his services except his maintenance was very properly put upon the defendant below. An agreement to pay for services rendered and accepted is presumed unless the parties are members of the same family, or near relatives. Lawson, Presumptive Ev. 74. The parties were not relatives, and the evidence establishes the fact that Peterson was not considered a member of Strom's family, but that he was to be paid for his services, the amount of which was not clearly fixed. It is unnecessary to review the instructions complained of on this point, as they fairly present the law governing this branch of the case.

Other assignments of error attack the verdict as excessive. As modified and reduced by the court, the allowance of $15 per month is not excessive, if plaintiff should have recovered, and the verdict should not be disturbed on that ground.

The statute of limitations is pleaded in bar, and is presented by the following instruction requested by the plaintiff in error and refused by the court: "The jury are instructed as a matter of law that the plaintiff cannot recover for any services or work performed by him for the deceased in his lifetime prior to eight years preceding his death." The other defense of the old statute of limitations in force during a period covered by the employment is not urged upon our attention, and we shall not consider it. The action could only be brought within eight years after the cause of action accrued. It is asserted that the right of action accrues and the statute begins to run on each item of the account from the day of its proper date,—that is, from the day of the delivery of the article or work done,—as was held in Courson v. Courson, 19 Ohio St. 454; but in that case there was an interrupted term of service, and the breaks in such term served to make such continuous period of service separate and distinct items of account. In this case the service was continuous, except for a brief period of three months, while defendant in error was sick, and in the county hospital, and the service was resumed after his recovery. But it is insisted that where there is an express employment, but no time or measure of compensation or term of employment agreed upon, the law will regard the hiring as from year to year, and the wages payable at the same time, and will not imply an agreement that the payment of compensation shall be postponed until the termination of the employment. To this effect are the cases of Davis v. Gorton, 16 N. Y. 255, 69 Am. Dec. 694; Re Gardner, 103 N. Y. 533, 57 Am. Rep. 788; Gilbert v. Comstock, 93 N. Y. 484; Miller v. Lash, 85 N. C. 51; Grady v. Wilson, 115 N. C. 844; 1 Wood, Limitation of Actions, 330. There are other cases to the contrary, notably Littler v. Smiley, 9 Ind. 116; and we are not prepared to adopt the rule of the New York cases, as we think that the contrary rule is upheld by this court in Jackson v. Mutt (Wyo.) 42 Pac. 603, where the circumstances—not of law and may be overcome by other evidence.

Proof that a deed for a chattel (a slave) once existed and was in the possession of a person who intermarried with the grantee of the deed; that the deed had been demanded of him and not produced; that he resided "now" in another state; that further search and inquiry had been made of the persons who might possibly be in possession of the deed and without effect,—was deemed sufficient to rebut the presumption of fraud and admit secondary evidence. Mordecai v. Beal, 8 Port. (Ala.) 539.

That a weak-minded woman, at the request of her brother, had destroyed a deed of conveyance executed by herself, was deemed by the court to be the result of "unfortunate advice," and not of an intent on her part to commit a fraud upon anyone. Drosten v. Mueller, 103 Mo. 624.

The testimony of a party that she destroyed certain letters because she "had no further use for them and believed them to be of no consequence" was deemed sufficient to repel the inference of a fraudulent intent in their destruction. Smith v. Holyoke, 112 Mass. 517; Lucas v. Brooks, 23 La. Ann. 117.

Lord Ellenborough permitted a party, by his own testimony, to prove loss and diligence, and then permitted him to testify from memory as to the contents of a deed. Kensington v. English, 8 East, 288.

On this principle secondary evidence of a lost United States patent to land was admitted to prove title. Bell v. Hearne, 10 La. Ann. 515.

And secondary evidence of the loss or destruction of naturalization papers may be given when the case is freed from the inference of fraud. Kreitz v. Behrensmeier, 125 Ill. 141.

Likewise false invoices come within the spirit of the rule. Bush v. Guion, 6 La. Ann. 797.

Although the destruction of the written evidence prior to the commencement of the suit raises a presumption unfavorable to the party who destroyed it, yet the presumption may be rebutted by proof adduced on the part of such party. St. Louis v. Queen, 25 Can. S. C. 649.

But the voluntary destruction of evidence (letters) after the commencement of the suit raises the inference of a fraudulent design to do away with evidence, and it is within the discretion of the court to refuse to admit proof of the contents by the destroyer. Baldwin v. Threlkeld, 8 Ind. App. 812, Following Blade v. Noland, 12 Wend. 173, 27 Am. Dec. 126.

Failure to call witnesses who are known to be conversant with the facts. (The Fred. M. Lawrence, 15 Fed. Rep. 635; The Ville du Havre, 7 Ben. 328; Grubbs v. North Carolina Home Ins. Co. 108 N. C. 473), or bribing witnesses to be absent (Chicago City R. Co. v. McMahon, 103 Ill. 485, 42 Am. Rep. 29; Houser v. Austin, 2 Idaho. 188), gives rise to a like presumption; but a collation of cases does not properly belong in this connection. It will be the subject of a subsequent note.

The full rigor of the rule is that where papers are concealed or falsified the party will not be entitled to further proof "for that is an indulgence granted only to honest mistake and unintentional error." The Liverpool, 1 Gall. 518.

This principle was strictly adhered to in many English cases. Wardour v. Berisford, 1 Vern. 452; Dorington v. Jackson, Id. 449; Plampin v. Betta, Id. 272; East India Co. v. Evans, Id. 308; Dyer v. Tymewell, 2 Vern. 122, Freem. Ch. 112; East India Co. v. Sandys, 1 Vern. 127; Childs v. Saxby, Id. 207; Hunt v. Matthews, Id. 408.

of the case were somewhat similar to the case at bar. However, the payments made in the years 1886 to 1888 took the case out of the statute, and made the account between the parties a mutual one. It is urged that the regularity of payments of $6 monthly during these years leads to the inference that these payments were in full for those years, and had no reference to past transactions; but there is testimony that during these periods and afterwards the decedent had stated that he had not paid Peterson anything, and that his wages were $30 per month. There certainly was evidence to the effect that these payments were part, and not complete, payments, and it can reasonably be inferred from the evidence that they were on account. In New York, such payments have been held sufficient to take the case out of the statute, and such holding is not contrary to the views announced in the cases from that state already cited. Smith v. Velie, 60 N. Y. 106; Re Gardner, 108 N. Y. 533, 57 Am. Rep. 768. The ruling of the court refusing to give the instruction, and to apply the statute of limitations to that portion of the claim prior to September 23, 1885, was warranted under the evidence.

The court was asked to instruct the jury that the declarations of a creditor, as in the case of plaintiff below, that any debt of the deceased to him is discharged, or that there is nothing due him, is prima facie evidence of payment. Peterson admitted to witnesses that Strom owed him nothing, directly after the latter, in his last sickness, asked him, if there was anything due, to make out his bill, to which interrogation of Strom, Peterson did not respond. This evidence did not particularly relate to an admission of payment, but might tend to show that there was no original contract to pay for services rendered by Peterson. It was strong evidence against Peterson, but the court and jury seem to have treated it of small moment, taken in connection with the other evidence in the cause; and we think that their action in this respect, although the admission was not denied by Peterson, is not error, because the weight to be given to testimony of mere admissions is to be determined by the jury, and it may be proper for the court to instruct them that such testimony is usually unsatisfactory, and should be received with great caution. Saveland v. Green, 40 Wis. 431, 444. The instruction was too sweeping in its terms, and the ground was fully covered by another instruction which was given at the request of the defendant below, in substance, that if the plaintiff knew before the death of Strom that the latter desired and requested all his creditors, including Peterson, to present their claims before his death, and if plaintiff refused to do so, and said that nothing was due him, that fact raised a strong presumption against him.

Some of the books of account of the decedent were destroyed by the plaintiff, Peterson, and the only books found were those discovered concealed under a barrel, and a calendar found hanging on the wall. Upon the latter entries were made showing that at the close of January of that year Peterson was paid for one month, and at the close of the year was paid

But in the American courts it is held that the presumption arises against nothing but the evidence destroyed. Thompson v. Thompson, 9 Ind. 223, 68 Am. Dec. 638; Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Merchant, 1 F. Ins. Co. 7 Wend. 31; Wilson v. Cassidy, 2 Ind. 562.

An affidavit which is of itself sufficient to open the door for secondary evidence of the contents of a promissory note is not itself evidence of the contents of the note. Almy v. Reed, 10 Cush. 421.

The affidavit of the contents of a letter not produced was admitted because, as the court said, "if untrue it was at the imminent peril of exposure by the production of the letter, and that under such circumstances the representation in the affidavit must be taken to be true." Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 804, 634, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 898, 16 Jur. 871.

c. The rule and evidence in admiralty.

In admiralty prize courts it is a recognized law of nations that neutral property is free from confiscation. But where such neutrality cannot be shown satisfactorily because the ship's papers have been destroyed, and such destruction or spoliation has not been frankly and satisfactorily explained, a presumption of mala fides is raised, and the property will be condemned as that of the enemy, unless such presumption is removed by other evidence admitted within the discretion of the prize court as in other cases. This is the American rule. The Pizarro, 15 U. S. 21 Wheat. 227, 4 L. ed. 226; The Peterhoff, Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 463.

The maritime courts on the continent of Europe excluded further proof after spoliation was established, holding that alone sufficient to raise the presumption against neutrality and to justify confiscation, but the English Admiralty Code, modified 34 L. R. A.

that rule to the extent of not holding spoliation alone to be defamatory when other circumstances were clear. The Hunter, 1 Dods. Adm. 480, 486, 487; The Two Brothers, 1 Rob. Adm. 131; The Rising Sun, 2 Rob. Adm. 104; The Polly, Id. 361; The Johanna Emilie, 13 Jur. 708.

III. Where a party adversely interested destroys or withholds evidence to which the adversary is entitled.

a. The rule.

Courts will go far in presuming against those who destroy documents and instruments necessary to the security or elucidation of the rights of others, but there is a limit to the application of the term "everything" as it is used in the rule "Everything will be presumed against the despoiler." Diehl v. Emig, 65 Pa. 328; Halyburton v. Kershaw, 8 Desaus. Eq. 105; Preston v. Leighton, 6 Md. 33; Carnel v. Day, Litt. Sel. Cas. 492, 493.

The principle of the maxim Omnia presumuntur in odium spoliatoris, as applicable to the destruction or suppression of a written instrument, is that such destruction or suppression raises a presumption that the document would, if produced, mitigate against the party destroying or suppressing it, and that his conduct is attributable to this circumstance. There is great danger that the maxim may be carried too far. It cannot properly be pushed to the extent of dispensing with the necessity of other evidence, and should be regarded "as merely matter of inference, in weighing the effect of evidence in its own nature applicable to the subject in dispute." Where there is express and positive evidence, there is no place for presumption or inference. It is only in reference to the contents of the paper destroyed or withheld that in full, and these entries were in the handwriting of decedent. Judge Potter, who drew up the will, after the death of the testator left Peterson in charge of the place of business of the decedent, where there were a number of account books. He afterwards examined them carefully, but was not allowed to state whether there were any charges therein against any employee of the decedent, Strom. At the time he was questioned upon this matter it had not been shown that the books, or any of them, had been destroyed, and it seems that the question was properly objected to. No exception was taken to the ruling of the court sustaining this objection, and the question, although a vital one in the case, was not renewed. Judge Potter examined three or four of the books, he says, very carefully, so that he had a general idea of them, without examining any particular account. The books might have been intact when the inventory and appraisement were taken, which took a day or two; and the witness stated that he was under the impression that he examined the books at that time, but may have examined them before the inventory was taken. He had charged Peterson to leave everything as it was, and, when he discovered that the books were burned, spoke sharply to Peterson, reminding him of the direction, and asked him why the books had been destroyed. Peterson replied that Strom, the deceased, had told him to burn them up. This answer was made promptly, and Judge Potter says there was nothing extraordinary in Peterson's conduct when he made this explanation. The instruction asked for on this point was as follows: "If the jury believe from all the evidence in this case that the books of account of the deceased, or any of them, were destroyed by plaintiff, a presumption arises that, had the truth appeared by said books, it would have been against his interest." This instruction was refused, and the court gave no other bearing upon the question. The defendant was entitled to an instruction covering the point, for it is a universal rule that the suppression or destruction of evidence raises the presumption against the spoliator, where the evidence is relevant to the case, or where it was his duty to preserve it. Omnia presumuntur contra spoliatorem. Lawson, Presumptive Ev. 140 et seq. Where the spoliator is the claimant, the fact of spoliation alone raises a presumption against his claim. Where a deed, a will, or other paper is proved to be destroyed or suppressed, or there is vehement suspicion of its having been done, the presumption, in odium spoliatoris, applies in favor of the party who claims under such paper, though the contents are not proved. Id. 152, and cases cited. But there is great danger that the maxim may be carried too far, and it should be cautiously applied. In this case the mere destruction of the books is not sufficient to warrant the presumption that their contents were against the interest of Peterson, for they were burned after they had been examined, and some time after the funeral of Strom. There was no attempt made to conceal the books by Peterson, or to prevent their examination, and it nowhere appears that there were charges against Peterson on the books destroyed, although it does appear the maxim can have application; and where the contents are proved there is no occasion for resort to the maxim. Bott v. Wood, 56 Miss. 136; Jones v. Knausa, 31 N. J. Eq. 609.

Where, then, a deed or will is shown to have been in existence but to have been destroyed by the adversary, it will be presumed that such deed or will contained the conditions favoring the party who asserts them, when it was possible for it to have contained them. Dalston v. Coatsworth, 1 P. Wms. 731.

This rule is built upon the cases of Rex v. Countess Arundel, Hob. 109; Sanson v. Rumsey, 2 Vern. 561; Hampden v. Hampden, 1 Bro. P. C. 550; and Woodroff and Burton, Reg. Lib. A. 1722, fol. 222, decided in the order named, and was followed in Lord Melville's Trial, 29 How. St. Tr. 1194.

No presumption arises except upon proof. Inference may aid proof but cannot create it. There must be proof offered to sustain the allegations of the pleadings, which proof, if insufficient, may be aided by every presumption against the destroyer, but the mere proof of the destruction will not warrant the rendition of a judgment which could otherwise only be supported by the facts evidenced by the writing destroyed. Gage v. Parmelee, 87 Ill. 329.

The case of Cowper v. Earl Cowper, 2 P. Wms. 749 (A. D. 1784), was the first to emphatically iterate the rule that no presumption could arise except upon evidence, and it was based on the holdings in Rex v. Countess Arundel, Hob. 109; Gartside v. Ratcliff, 1 Ch. Cas. 292; Hunt v. Matthews, 1 Vern. 408; Wardour v. Bertsford (said to be not rightly reported), 1 Vern. 452; and Countess Plymouth v. Bladon, 2 Vern. 32, which need no further consideration here. See also Moffat v. Moffat, 10 Bosw. 468, 501.

The rule may be applied in like cases to the following:

Where the defendant has placed it beyond the power of the plaintiff to prove the execution of a bill of sale, proof of that fact will raise a presumption of its execution. Cheatham v. Riddle, 8 Tex. 162.

The destruction of a receipt will raise the presumption of the payment of money. Downing v. Plate, 90 Ill. 238.

The failure of a party to perform his duty in keeping strict account of the workings in a coal mine extending under adjoining land raises the presumption that all the coal taken out came therefrom. Dean v. Thwaite, 21 Beav. 621.

The failure of a confidential agent to keep vouchers against himself while keeping those against his principal raised the presumption that he had received his full compensation. White v. Lady Lincoln, and Duke Newcastle v. Kinderley, 8 Ves. Jr. 383.

The destruction of a contract by the vendor for the purchase of land about the time a demand was made by the vendee for the delivery of a deed was held sufficient to raise the presumption that it did not state the agreement in the manner alleged by the vendor. Warren v. Crew, 22 Iowa, 315.

Upon proof that a member of the firm whose duty it was to keep the books, expended more money for personal or family expenses than he has charged himself with, the maxim in odium spoliatoris applies. Dimond v. Henderson, 47 Wis. 172.

Where the controversy was as to the number of acres conveyed by a certain deed which the defendant might have produced, the court said: "Perhaps the presumption in odium spoliatoris might arise from the fact of the nonproduction of the deed and failure to account for its absence;" but the case that the books discovered did contain charges against him. Whether Judge Potter's examination was sufficient or not to show that there were such charges does not appear; neither does it appear that he did not know, or could not remember, whether there were any charges in the books against the plaintiff. However, the instruction asked was too broad, and should have been modified by counsel, for the mere fact of the destruction of the books alone does not show that they were evidence against the interest of the spoliator. His conduct might not have been that of a spoliator, but rather that of a stupid or ignorant man, who thought that he had a duty to perform, enjoined upon him by his deceased employer; and there are some indications in the evidence that support this view. Some four months prior to his death, Strom published in a local daily paper a notice which the publisher states he believes was brought to him by Peterson, entitled "Extends Thanks," which states that on the 7th of the month (May, 1893) Strom closed his liquor house, and that he would store his goods, and, if business would justify, would probably open the next summer, and, if not, he would ship his goods away. He then presents his highest compliments to his "proper" customers, and states: "Remember, if I am guilty to creditors for payment, come and collect. If any persons are guilty to me for liquors, please keep this [the notice] as a present." This notice was introduced for the purpose of showing that Strom was settling up his accounts, and that, in addition to his general custom of meeting his obligations promptly, he had given notice to his creditors that he desired to pay his bills. Other testimony was introduced, showing that he had directed the payment of his local bills, and had requested that money be taken from his safe for that purpose. But the publication referred to also indicates that he had no desire to press his claims against his creditors, and is in harmony with Peterson's statement that Strom had directed him to burn his books. No instruction was asked upon the question of this explanation of Peterson, nor were the jury asked to be instructed to disregard it as evidence. It went to them as his explanation of his conduct in destroying the books. It will be noticed that it appears that an inventory was taken of the property of the estate, but whether before or after the destruction of the books does not appear. It should have been shown that the accounts against the creditors of the estate were not in this inventory, or were not preserved. If they were, and had Peterson's account, if there was any against him, appeared in such inventory, it could have been introduced as secondary evidence.

The instruction asked for presents the British law governing the spoliation of documents. Broom, Legal Maxims, 940; 1 Phillips, Ev. (Cowen & H. notes) 639; Houser v. Austin, 2 Idaho, 188, 198. The rule is strong in admiralty cases, but upon this point Mr. Justice Story says in the case of The Pizarro, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 241, 4 L. ed. 229. "The objection which is urged against the admission of the further proof would, under other circumstances, deserve great consideration. Conceal-was decided on other grounds. Barney v. Seeley, 38 Wis. 381.

Likewise, the court announced its willingness that the presumption should be the basis for the decision of the case, but decided the case on other grounds in Wilson v. Cassidy, 2 Ind. 682.

The destruction of forged notes after being arrested for their utterance raised a presumption of forgery. State v. Chamberlain, 80 Mo. 129, following Pomeroy v. Benton, 77 Mo. 64.

Upon the destruction of a second will by a person interested in opposition thereto so that the exact contents of the will cannot be ascertained, the jury were held bound to infer that the second will contained inconsistent dispositions with the first, and further, that the second will contained a clause expressly revoking all former wills, the court saying: "It is far better that there should be an intestacy than that a spoliator should be rewarded for his dishonesty." Jones v. Murphy, 8 Watts & S. 275, 301.

If a second will be destroyed or withheld by fraud the jury are bound to infer that the second will contained dispositions of property inconsistent with the first, and more, in odium spoliatoris, and that the second will contained a clause expressly revoking all former wills. Ibid.

Where, however, the testator is shown to have destroyed the latter will the rule does not apply. Such destruction likewise revives the former, but because it is a direct revocation of the latter. Harwood v. Goodright, 1 Cowp. 87, 91.

And where the destruction alone is shown, the testator is presumed to have destroyed it. Betts v. Jackson, Brown, 6 Wend. 178.

There is no basis upon which the presumption can arise, where, although the form of the property in question has been changed, neither the value nor the means of establishing the value has been lessened or destroyed. In case of a change of form—as by the milling of ores—it is only where corroborating circumstances or secondary evidence have been destroyed that the strongest presumption will arise from the direct testimony. Fox v. Hale & N. Silver Min. Co. 108 Cal. 389.

And such adverse presumption will not arise in the absence of a purpose to suppress evidence, as by the mere sending away of hides taken from butchered animals alleged to have been wrongfully taken. People v. Hurley, 57 Cal. 146.

The destruction of books relating to matters long since settled and never since disputed, will be treated lightly, and will not be allowed to prejudice the case; but it is entirely different where they relate to recent transactions of which the accounts therefrom arising have not been adjusted. And still more where that destruction was by the party who has filed the bill to have accounts taken of those transactions. In such a case the court must be satisfied that the destruction was proper and justifiable or the principle laid down in Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange, 505, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. 636, will be applied, and everything will be presumed against the destroyer which is most unfavorable to him if it is consistent with the rest of the facts which have been either admitted or proved. Gray v. Haig, 20 Beav. 219.

As to the substitution of secondary evidence in such cases, see supra, II. a.

And where a brother for the deliberate and sole purpose of cutting off investigation destroyed book accounts of the firm after suit brought, thereby making it impossible to ascertain the amount out of which he had defrauded his partner, to whom as he said he was "bound by the ties of gratitude for giving him his start in life," the court said: "No ment, or even spoliation, of papers is not of itself a sufficient ground for condemnation in a prize court. It is undoubtedly a very awakening circumstance, calculated to excite the vigilance and justify the suspicions of the court. But it is a circumstance open to explanation, for it may have arisen from accident, necessity, or superior force; and if the party in the first instance fairly and frankly explains it to the satisfaction of the court, it deprives him of no right to which he is otherwise entitled. If, on the other hand, the spoliation be unexplained, or the explanation appear weak and futile; if the cause labor under heavy suspicions, or there be a vehement presumption of bad faith or gross prevarication,—it is made the ground of a denial of further proof, and condemnation ensues from defects in the evidence, which the party is not permitted to supply." In the case of Baldwin v. Threlkeld, 8 Ind. App. 312, the court says: "The court sustained an objection of the appellee to proving the contents of certain letters testified to by the appellant after he had practically admitted that he voluntarily destroyed the letters after he had commenced the suit on a note against the Bryants. The court had a right to deduce from the act of destruction after the commencement of such suit the inference of a fraudulent design to do away with the letters themselves, and upon this theory the exclusion of the evidence was proper." This is the rule laid down in Blade v. Noland, 12 Wend. 173, 27 Am. Dec. 126, where a party deliberately destroyed a note before it fell due, and there was nothing in the case accounting for or explaining the act, consistent with an honest or justifiable purpose; and it was held that the plaintiff was bound to give affirmatively, evidence to show that the act took place under circumstances that repelled the inference of fraudulent design. These cases apply to a case where a party destroys or suppresses his own evidence, and seeks to introduce secondary evidence of the contents of the same, if in its nature documentary, or does not produce the witnesses to testify, or causes them to leave the jurisdiction. But the presumption is not a conclusive or absolute one, although it is a strong presumption; and this is the rule where a party suppresses or withholds evidence. The following instruction was given in the case of Thompson v. Thompson, 9 Ind. 323, 68 Am. Dec. 688: "If the jury believe from the evidence that William Thompson, the plaintiff, burned, or in any way destroyed, any of the papers of the deceased, James A. Thompson, without the knowledge and consent of those who were interested in the estate of said deceased, it devolves on him to show by proof other than his own statements what those papers contained; and on his failure to do so the law raises the presumption against him that they were of the highest value to the defendant in this suit, and entitles her to a verdict." The court said, in substance, while holding the instruction erroneous, that it is undoubtedly true that a party who destroys the evidence by which his claim or title may be impeached raises a strong presumption against the validity of his claim; and if the latter case could ever present itself for the rigid rule recognized alike in equity and at law, embodied in the maxim, Omnia præsumentur in odium spoliatoris." Pomeroy v. Benton, 77 Mo. 64.

b. The proof.

Before one party can charge another as a spoliator he must show that he was himself interested in the document destroyed; and before the destruction will be deemed to be a spoliation he must show that it was done malo animo to injure him. Delany v. Tenison, 3 Bro. P. C. 650.

Furthermore before the character of a spoliator can be fixed on one who destroys a deed, the purpose of the instrument must be proved to have been what it is surmised to have been. When that is done then the act of the spoliator is deemed to be equivalent to a confession. M'Reynolds v. M'Cord, 6 Watts, 288.

As above stated, there must be some evidence "on which the presumption can be reposed," but "if a man destroys a thing that is designed to be evidence against himself, a small matter will supply it." Anonymous, 1 Ld. Raym. 731, quoting from Lord Holt in B. R. Mich. 10 Wm. III.

Slight evidence of the contents of a written instrument wilfully destroyed is usually sufficient, for from the fact of the wilful destruction arises the presumption that if the truth had appeared, it would have been against the interest of the destroyer, and that his conduct is attributable to his knowledge of this circumstance. Jones v. Knauss, 31 N. J. Eq. 609.

The mere destruction or withholding of an instrument will not always supply the absence of proof of its contents, or corroborate the evidence of an interested witness in regard to them. The presumption arising therefrom may, in some cases, 34 L. R. A.

determine the general character of a paper destroyed or withheld, or reduce to certainty what is equivocal, vague, or uncertain, or complete what is imperfect, but it does not corroborate whatever the party prejudiced by the destruction may testify to be the contents. Moffatt v. Moffatt, 10 Bosw. 501.

Courts of equity will go beyond and even contrary to the rules of law and presume most liberally in odium spoliatoris.

The fact of the spoliation may be proved by the answer or oath of the opposite party, so may the contents of a paper; but when it is sought to raise a debt against the spoliator there must be some evidence beyond the fact of the spoliation. The term "some evidence" need not be understood to mean a prima facie case, but slight evidence which conduces to prove the charge is sufficient; its weight or credibility is a matter of discretion and circumstance. Askew v. Odenheimer, Baldw. 380; Saneon v. Rumsey, 2 Vern. 561; Cookes v. Hellier, 1 Ves. Sr. 235; Gartside v. Ratcliff, 1 Ch. Cas. 233.

Lord Eldon thought the courts might have gone a little too far in presuming, after proof of spoliation, that the contents of the thing spoiled are what they have been alleged to be; but he refuses to change the rule. Barker v. Ray, 2 Russ. Ch. 63, 73.

A will, being in court and not produced by the plaintiff, the jury may infer that the statements of the defendant concerning its contents are true. Sutton v. Devonport, 27 L. J. C. P. N. S. 54.

This is upon the theory that if the facts are not as alleged the adversary has it in his power to make it so to appear. Hampden v. Hampden, 3 Bro. P. C. 550.

And where the young Earl of Anglesea was transported, sold as a slave, and thereby kept from his inheritance for thirty years, the court said: "These facts speak more strongly in proof of the plaintiffs' plaintiff destroyed papers or the estate, and especially receipts for taxes, which are important documents, he committed a great wrong, but yet the presumption against him would not be of that conclusive character indicated by the instruction. The jury were told in the instruction in the case cited that, if the plaintiff destroyed any papers of the deceased, the defendant was entitled to their verdict. The court then proceeds to say: "The law of nations, as recognized in continental Europe, under certain circumstances raises a conclusive presumption against the spoliator of papers indicating the national character of a vessel. 1 Kent, Com. 157, 158. But even that rule does not ordinarily prevail in England and the United States. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 31; The Pizarro, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 242, 4 L. ed. 230, note. This rule has no place in the courts of common law. On proof of the existence of a paper, the testimony of a party who ought to have the custody of it, touching its loss, with evidence of diligent search for it, is addressed to the court. If its loss is established, he is allowed to go to the jury with evidence of its contents. But his adversary may prove that he has withheld or destroyed it, and if he satisfactorily establish that point, every presumption will be indulged against him in reference to its character. 2 Phillips, Ev. (Cowen & H. notes) 293; 3 Phillips, Ev. 1193; Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Mechanic F. Ins. Co. 7 Wend. 31. The rule is well stated by Sutherland, J., in the case last referred to." This rule is that the refusal to produce books and papers upon notice given does not warrant the presumption that they would show the facts alleged by the party giving notice; the only effect of such refusal being that parol evidence of their contents may be given, and, if such secondary evidence be imperfect, vague, and uncertain as to dates, sums, etc., every intendment and presumption shall be against the party who might remove all doubt by producing the higher evidence. But some general evidence of such parts of their contents as are applicable to the case must first be given, before any foundation is laid for any inference or intendment on account of their nonproduction. This doctrine will be applied to another feature of the case at bar. The following instruction was given in the case of Bott v. Wood, 56 Miss. 186, 189: "If the jury are satisfied from the evidence that Thomas H. Wood fraudulently destroyed the will now in controversy, testified to by Blanton as duly executed by his father, everything may be presumed against the destroyer of the will in odium spoliatoris [meaning 'in hatred of the spoliator'] and against those claiming under him." This instruction was held erroneous, the court remarking that the maxim, Omnia presumuntur in odium spoliatoris, might be carried too far, and citing Best, Ev. §§ 412 et seq., as stating that it should be regarded as merely matter of inference in weighing the evidence in its own nature applicable to the subject in dispute. The party destroying a written instrument must not gain by his own wrong, but it is only in reference to the contents of the paper destroyed or withheld that the maxim can have application. As the contents of the will were proved, the maxim case than a thousand witnesses." Craig v. Earl Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1430.

In the cases of Sanson v. Rumsey, 2 Vern. 561, and Eyton v. Myton, Id. 380, deeds of marriage settlement were burned, and in Dalston v. Coatsworth, 1 P. Wms. 731, a deed of inheritance was destroyed. The rule in each case decreed that the injured party should hold and enjoy, and that the adversary should convey. In one case the court imprisoned the spoliator until he should make a conveyance; the court admitting that it could not imprison him forever, but saying that he could obtain his release by executing the conveyance.

The evidence that is deductible where there has been a spoliation of the "best" evidence (the original document) is of course secondary evidence. The rule is that, if by fraud a party is deprived of the possession of a written instrument which belongs to him, secondary evidence of the contents may be given in the same manner as in the case of lost documents. Grimes v. Kimball, 3 Allen, 518.

Where a party refused to produce a lease which was proved to be in her custody, an attorney who had read it was allowed to give evidence of its contents. The court presuming it to be against her interest, inasmuch as she had the power to show it to be otherwise if such were the fact. Young v. Holmes, 1 Strange, 70.

Exception. There is one exception to the rule that upon proof of the fact that the party adversely interested destroys or withholds evidence to which the other party is entitled, a presumption arises in odium spoliatoris enabling the aggressor to make secondary proof by the words of his own mouth. It is in the case of letters received by the one party from the other.

In such a case the letters are not presumed to contain whatever the adversary avers they do contain, nor is the receiver compelled to account for their nonproduction in evidence. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 DeG. M. & G. 604, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 898, 16 Jur. 371.

If the law created an adverse presumption against one who fails or refuses to produce in evidence letters received by him, it would place almost any single man at the mercy of an artful and designing woman who would choose to recognize in her letters sent to him the existence of a marriage contract. However, this would violate the other rule that parties cannot introduce their own declarations in evidence. Law v. Woodruff, 48 Ill. 300.

Where letters which are supposed to have been received are not produced there is at most no more than a suspicion raised. It does not constitute proof. Carpenter's Estate, 94 Cal. 406.

"This doctrine is especially applicable to actions for libel, in which the language used, and the sense and meaning which properly attach to it, constitute the gist of the action." The Count Joannes v. Bennett, 5 Allen, 160, 51 Am. Dec. 733.

If, however, there has been a destruction of letters, and an action for breach of promise of marriage is brought against the receiver, and he satisfactorily shows that the act of destruction was not the result of fraudulent intent, the case comes within the exception to the rule of law, and secondary evidence of the contents is at his instance admissible. Tobin v. Shaw, 45 Me. 331, 71 Am. Dec. 547.

c. The damages.

After a spoliation has been established and "some evidence" is introduced, sufficient on which to base a presumption of damages, it then becomes a question what shall be taken as the measure of damages. On the mere establishing of the fact that the rights of a party are either withheld or violated the law will presume that damage has been done, making it necessary for the adversary had no application, and it was not a proper guide for the jury. It was held that the instruction was too broad and indefinite in saying that "everything may be presumed against the destroyer of the will," as it should have been limited to intent and presumption as to the terms of the will, if given at all. The instruction given in the case at bar was to the effect that if the plaintiff destroyed the books of account of the deceased, or any of them, a presumption arose that, had the truth appeared by said books, it would have been against his interest. This excludes wholly the circumstances surrounding the destruction of the books, and the explanation of the plaintiff. It also assumes that the books of account contained charges against the plaintiff. It is to the destruction of "evidence" relevant to the case, or where it was the duty of the plaintiff to preserve the evidence, that the rule applies. Lawson, Presumptive Ev. p. 140, rule 24. It does not appear that the books destroyed were relevant or material to the case, or that their contents would have disclosed charges against or settlements with the plaintiff, Peterson. Another book found disclosed payments made to the plaintiff, but this does not warrant an absolute or controlling inference that the burned books contained like charges, or any charges against Peterson. Drosten v. Mueller, 103 Mo. 624, 633. But the destruction of the books must be a wilful act, as the presumption is that evidence "wilfully" suppressed would be adverse if produced. 1 Rice, Ev. § 87, subd. c. While the word "wilful" might, in common parlance, be held to be synonymous with "intentional," yet there can be no doubt that the destruction must be designedly done with the purpose of suppressing evidence. Taking into consideration all the facts and circumstances relative to the burning of the books by Peterson, including the opportunity afforded for the examination of them for days after the decease of his employer, and that there was not, probably, a very diligent search by him of all the books of account, as one was found with but little effort, and a calendar was left hanging on the wall containing some statements against his interest, his apparent candor and promptness in acknowledging the burning of the books, and the explanation that he gave that it was done at the direction of his employer, and his evidently regarding his unusual act as nothing extraordinary, do not fully convey the belief that the destruction of the books by him was designedly done for the purpose of suppressing evidence against him. Certainly, the presumption resulting from the destruction of the books was not an absolute or conclusive one, and the instruction was too sweeping in its terms, as it neither by qualifying words limited the presumption to intention or design, nor to the fact that the jury should first find that the books contained evidence against him. Although entitled to an instruction upon this point, it was not the duty of the court to give a proper instruction, unless requested in positive terms. If an instruction is requested, and cannot properly be given without modification, the judge may, for that reason, refuse to give it, because to entitle it to be given it must be wholly correct in point of who would not be mulct to make proof to the contrary. Tedder v. Stiles, 16 Ga. 2.

The important question then is the amount. In Lord Melville's Trial, 29 How. St. Tr. 1194, 1195, Sir Samuel Romilly said in his argument: "My lords, in civil cases a party who destroys evidence of a transaction is always charged to the full extent that it was possible that that transaction could have gone." (He based his remarks upon the preceding great cases of White v. Lady Lincoln, and Duke Newcastle v. Kinderley, 8 Ves. Jr. 363.)

A still stronger case than the celebrated Armory v. Delamirie is Mortimer v. Cradock, 7 Jur. 45, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 166, in which a necklace containing fifty-six diamonds was lost and soon thereafter found in the possession of the defendant, a jeweler, but only thirty-one of the diamonds were seen. Upon defendant's failure to establish satisfactorily how he came in possession of those he had, and failure to deny that he ever had the whole number (the whole having been dishonestly taken by some person), the jury were instructed to presume that the defendant had the whole number and to find the damages accordingly, which they did—£500.

The maxim that everything will be presumed against the destroyer "has often been a most effective instrument in the hands of justice to punish wrongdoers."

Where, however, goods are taken from a store the presumption does not arise that goods have been taken of the highest value of the best grade and largest quantity within the store; but only of the precise thing shown to have been taken. Harris v. Rosenberg, 48 Conn. 227.

If one in the possession of property prevents the owner from showing its quality he may be charged for the best quality of such article. Bailey v. Shaw, 24 N. H. 207, 55 Am. Dec. 241; Clark v. Miller, 4 Wend. 623.

The principle was applied in a case where it had been the duty of a person to keep strict account of the workings of a mine extending under another's land; failing to do so he was deemed to be chargeable with the full amount taken out unless he could prove it was not taken out during the time which the account was directed to embrace. Dean v. Thwaite, 21 Beav. 621.

The rule then may be stated to be that if you establish the fact of spoliation against the defendant, and he will not show the sum spoliated, the court will presume it to be the sum alleged by the plaintiff, the same being in harmony with the other facts in the case. Lancaster v. Atkinson, 2 Russ. Ch. 60.

When the destruction is freed from the inference of a fraudulent design, then the presumption is not of maximum damages but of a minimum amount.

It being proved by servants that a certain number of full bottles of liquor were delivered to the defendant, the jury were directed to presume that they were filled with the cheapest liquor in which the plaintiff dealt, viz., porter, and they awarded damages upon that scale accordingly. Clunnes v. Pezzy, 1 Campb. 8.

Following this case, where a bank note (a loan of currency) was asked and given, and no proof made of the denomination of the note, the jury were instructed to presume it to be one pound sterling—the lowest in circulation. Lawton v. Sweeney, 8 Jur. 964.

The fabrication of evidence, as well by interlineations as by intermingling, gives rise to a presumption in odium spoliatoris, and will be the subject of a subsequent note. R. 8.

law. Mere nondirection, partial or total, is not ground for a new trial, unless specific instructions, good in point of law, and appropriate to the evidence, are requested and refused. 2 Thomp. Trials, §§ 2341, 2349.

The trial court refused to admit in evidence a certain calendar found in the place of business of Strom, upon which was written in Strom's handwriting certain statements. It was marked for identification, and upon the refusal of the court to receive it as evidence the counsel for defendant below offered to prove by it that in the handwriting of Strom, the deceased, across the date of January 30, 1892, appeared the words, "Severin paid for a month," and across the 31st day of December, 1892, also in the handwriting of the decedent, appeared the words, "Severin Peterson paid to this day in full." This calendar was found hanging on the wall, and one account book was found under a barrel by a son of decedent, in a room where the safe was kept. The witness was not produced, nor his deposition taken, as he was in Sweden; but the fact of the discovery of these papers and books was shown by the affidavit of the executor, which was admitted in evidence in order to prevent a continuance. This affidavit states that other memoranda in Strom's handwriting appeared upon the calendar, but no reference is made to such matters other than the two entries mentioned in the offer of counsel when the calendar was sought to be introduced. Nowhere in the record is it disclosed what these other entries were, and the contents of the calendar are not before us in any form, except as to them. It is asserted that it was shown that it was the custom of the decedent to make memoranda upon the calendars, but this is not borne out by the testimony. The calendar was not a book of original entry, neither does it appear to have been kept in the usual course of business of the decedent. It cannot be said that it was one of the books of account of the deceased. The statute applicable to such evidence, among other things, provides that a party shall not testify where the adverse party is an executor or administrator, with certain exceptions, one of which is as follows: "Sixth. If the claim or defense is founded on a book account, a party may testify that the book is his account book, that it is a book of original entries, that the entries were made by himself, a person since deceased; or a disinterested person nonresident of the county; whereupon the book shall be competent evidence; and such book may be admitted in evidence in any case, without regard to the parties, upon like proof by any competent witness." Rev. Stat. § 2590. Unfettered by statutory provisions, the American cases, taken together, are to the effect that entries made in the regular and usual course of business are admissible in evidence after the death of the person who made them, on proof of his handwriting; and during his life, if authenticated by himself. Other private entries may be used to refresh the memory, but are not admissible in evidence. Notes to Price v. Earl Torrington, 1 Salk. 285; Doe. Patteshall v. Turford, 3 Barn. & Ad. 890; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 581. The statute does not seem to change this rule, and it is necessary to show that the book offered is an account book, or what may reasonably be considered to be such. The most liberal rule was adopted by the supreme court of Vermont in Gleason v. Kinney, 63 Vt. 560, where the diary of a decedent for a certain year was held rightly admissible in evidence against an administrator. But the entry was in the form of an original entry of a charge in a book account, rather than a memorandum from which such charge could be formulated. There were regular books of account kept in that case, but the entry was found under the proper dates in a diary. The court said: "When the transaction requires and furnishes only a memorandum, its entry on a daybook, journal, or ledger, intermingled with proper accounts, does not render it any more admissible in evidence. But when it is of such a nature that it is the proper subject of a charge upon book, and the party enters it as such a charge, although on a book other than his regular books of account, such entry is an original entry in book account. Nor is its character changed by his failure to transfer it upon his regular books of account." It was also remarked that the nature of the transaction and entry marks the determinative characteristic between a charge in book account and memorandum, and that this is the doctrine in all the cases in Vermont. There is a marked difference between the charges made in that case on the diary of the decedent and upon the calendar in the case at bar. There the entry was in each instance, "Liberty T. Kinney, Dr. To paid . . . for you," while on the calendar offered in this case the entry was, "Severin paid for a month," and, "Severin Peterson paid to this day in full." These entries do not disclose the amount paid in either case, and the memorandum on the calendar, although a proper subject for book charge, was not entered "as such charge"—an omission that appears to be studied. But this Vermont case does not appear to be in harmony with other cases in that state, or with cases elsewhere. Said the court in Barber v. Bennett, 58 Vt. 476, 483, 56 Am. Rep. 565. "But it has generally been held that to lay the foundation for the admission of that kind of evidence, it must be shown that the entries [of a deceased person] were made in the usual course of business of the party making them, and at or about the time of the transaction to which they refer. This qualified right to use such evidence in favor of the party making the entries is in contravention of one of the primary rules of evidence, which forbids the manufacture of evidence by a party in his own favor." The rule announced in Welsh v. Barrett, 15 Mass. 380, is commended, and that is that, "what a man has actually done and committed to writing, when under obligation to do the act, it being in the course of the business he has undertaken, and he being dead, there seems to be no danger in submitting to the consideration of the jury." The Vermont court would not apply the rule in the case last cited from that state, as the memoranda were made by the decedent, in his lifetime, upon loose pieces of paper; and said further: "A memorandum is defined to be a note to help the memory; and this paper, considered in connection with the circumstances under which it was found, partakes of that character. It certainly was not an account so kept and proved as to be admissible as evidence. It has been uniformly held in this state that memoranda are not independent evidence in chief, even during the lifetime of the party making them." In the case of Callanay v. McMillan, 11 Heisk. 557, the evidence consisted of entries in a memorandum book carried by decedent in his lifetime, which was found by his executors after his death, and the entries therein were proved to be in the testator's handwriting, and it was also proved by the executors that they had no other means of proving these items. They were clearly stated in amounts and dates, but were rejected by the court, which held that the entries were not admissible either under the statute or the general common-law principle, as the book was not a book of account, nor were the entries made in the usual course of business or professional employment, but the book was but a mere private memorandum, and upon no principle admissible. So it was held in the case of Robinson v. Hoyt, 39 Mich. 405, that where payments alleged to have been made by a deceased mortgage debtor were denied by the creditor, they were not sufficiently proved by entries in the handwriting of the debtor in an unusual place in his day-book, from which the immediately preceding leaves had been torn, while the regular entries were followed by a number of blank pages. The following cases tend to support these views: Vina v. Gilman, 21 W. Va. 309, 45 Am. Rep. 562; Peck v. Valentine, 94 N. Y. 569; New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 102 N. Y. 581; Bates v. Preble, 151 U. S. 149, 157, 38 L. ed. 106, 110; Anchor Mill. Co. v. Walsh, 108 Mo. 277; Robinson v. Smith, 111 Mo. 205; Buckley v. Buckley, 12 Nev. 423, 442; Libby v. Brown, 78 Me. 492; McDonald v. Carnes, 90 Ala. 147; Doolittle v. Stone, 136 N. Y. 818; Abel v. Fitch, 20 Conn. 96; Bridgewater v. Roxbury, 54 Conn. 217; Beak v. House, 141 Ill. 290. In one state, at least, such memoranda of a decedent as disclosed by these calendars offered in evidence at the trial below are by statute made competent evidence. Craft's Appeal, 42 Conn. 158. But we have no such statute, and the rule ought not to be relaxed without it, even under the circumstances disclosed in this case.

Another objection to the entries on this calendar is that they were not shown to be continuous, as the entries must be in a book used continuously for the purpose (1 Whart. Ev. § 688, citing Kibbe v. Bancroft, 77 Ill. 18); for, although the affidavit admitted as evidence states that there were other entries besides the two relevant to the case, the offer does not show this fact, and we have no means of determining what those entries were, as there is no proof of the nature and character of the other entries on the calendar, whether of daily entry or of less frequent periods. While our statute ought to be liberally construed, and the liberal rule followed under the common law, to admit a memorial of business transactions which cannot ordinarily be carried in the mind, yet, recognizing the wide application given to books of account under statutes akin to ours, it will not do to admit matters that have not been the subject of book accounts, nor registered in the usual, regular, and ordinary course of business. The account books of the illiterate ought to be as admissible as the books of a tradesman and a banker, if within the statutory conditions, as the purpose of the law is to secure authenticity and credibility in respect to the evidence, rather than to prescribe forms. Woolsey v. Bohn, 41 Minn. 228. There are respectable courts that hold that a debtor's books of account are not evidence to prove payments by him to his creditors (Hess's Appeal, 112 Pa. 163), yet the liberal tendency of modern decisions is in the other direction. These payments, however, ought to be charged on something that might be considered a book of account kept in the usual course of business. The proof lacks this crucial test in regard to the calendars, and the calendars were not admissible as primary evidence. They are under the ban as secondary evidence, as there is nothing to show that the entries were ever made in the books of account, or that it is impossible for the executor to show that fact. Even if the destruction of the books by Peterson prevented the executor from giving secondary evidence of their contents, and although slight evidence, under such circumstances, may be admitted, and will be deemed satisfactory, there is nothing to show that any entry on the calendar was ever the subject at any time of book account. Because the entries were not in definite form to constitute a charge as to the amounts paid, and were not shown to have been kept in the usual course of business or to have been transferred to books of account, the calendar was properly rejected by the trial court.

This cause was twice tried, the second trial resulting in a much larger verdict for the plaintiff than was first awarded to him. While there is undoubtedly a sufficient reason for instituting the proceedings in error, and our impressions are that, were we to decide the cause in the first instance, we might have reached a different result than that arrived at by the jury and the trial court, yet, upon the whole, we cannot say that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the judgment. The claim was a stale one, and the plaintiff below stated that the deceased owed him nothing. He did not deny this, although he was a competent witness to make the denial or explain his admission; yet there is sufficient evidence to sustain the judgment. The law was fairly presented to the jury with one exception,—the matter of the destruction of the books,—and a proper instruction was not requested upon this point. The services rendered were of the most menial character, and were performed at unusual hours, and the circumstances of the case lead us to believe that Peterson was relying largely upon the bounty of his employer, and expected provision to be made for him in the will. It seems as if much difficulty could have been avoided in the case, and the truth clearly ascertained, either by probing the conscience of the plaintiff below by interrogatories as to the original contract and as to payments, by permitting him to testify to the facts in court, or by calling him as a witness. The executor cannot be deprived of his right to compel the adverse party to testify as he might any other witness under our Code provisions. What is intended for the protection of the estate in guarding it against fraudulent claims or unfounded causes of action should not be permitted to operate as a source of injury, and many times the interests of an estate may urgently require that an executor or an administrator should waive what belongs to him as a privilege, and call the opposite party as a witness. "The facts upon which he founds his defense, or upon which he bases his claim, may be locked in the breast of the adverse party, and without his testimony a failure of justice may ensue. The legislature could not have designed to place the estates of deceased persons at such disadvantage by depriving them of evidence within reach necessary to their protection against imposition and fraud. The adverse and surviving party, when compelled to testify by the executor or administrator, cannot reasonably complain; for, though a party, he can then be examined fully in his own behalf on the subject of his examination in chief. Nicolls v. Esterly, 16 Kan. 82; Whart. Ev. § 475a." Roberts v. Briscoe, 44 Ohio St. 596, 602. These extracts are from the opinion of the supreme court of Ohio under statutory provisions identical with ours, including the provision that an adverse party may be compelled to testify the same as any other witness. Wyo. Rev. Stat. § 259.. While counsel are not compelled to resort to such means in a case like the one under consideration, such a course would be highly commendable, and would tend to dissipate the doubts and difficulties that render the case obscure. We do not intend these remarks as a censure or rebuke to the eminent counsel who participated in the trial of this cause, but they may serve to hereafter secure the elicitation of truth in a parallel case,—the great object in view in the administration of justice.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Annie C. PETERSON, by Next Friend,
v.

(177 Pa. 385.)

A judgment in a trial court against a party whose counsel is, to the knowledge of the court, at the time present in the supreme court in obedience to its rule will not be permitted by the latter court to stand.

(October 5, 1896.)

APP^{EAL} by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Gavin W. Hart for appellant.

Mr. D. B. Meany for appellee.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was for damages for personal injuries from negligence of defendant. It was tried in the court below on January 25, 1895, in the absence of defendant's counsel, and a verdict for $6,000 given for plaintiff. The absence of counsel, Gavin W. Hart, Esq., was owing to his presence in this court at the argument of a cause in which he was of counsel for appellee (Sheehan v. Railroad, on supreme court calendar for same week, and for argument same day). The court below was moved for a new trial on this ground, which was refused, and judgment entered on the verdict. We now have this appeal by defendant, assigning for error the action of the court below in proceeding with the trial in absence of its counsel. Rule 41 of the supreme court is as follows: "That the hour list be suspended in the eastern district during the period assigned to the argument of cases from the county of Philadelphia. The argument of each cause shall be limited to one hour, unless the chief justice, upon an examination of the paper books, shall consider more time to be necessary. Sixty causes shall be assigned to each week, and a list thereof shall be made up and published by the prothonotary on the Saturday preceding. Said causes shall be set down in the order of their term and number, and shall be numbered on said list consecutively. The first twelve cases on said weekly list shall be assigned for argument on Monday, and for each succeeding day of the week, except Saturday, the first twelve cases theretofore undisposed of on said list shall be assigned for argument. No cause on said list shall be continued when reached, except for a sufficient cause. Engagements of counsel in the lower courts will not be recognized as a reason for the continuance or postponement of a cause, except when they are actually engaged in a trial which has been commenced in a previous week and is unfinished."

As by the Constitution the jurisdiction of the supreme court extends over the state, it must, as an inherent judicial power, necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction, have authority to make rules which, in its opinion, will enable it to dispose of the business which comes before it from every court in the state. Whether its rules, intended to speed hearings, are the very best to accomplish the purpose, or whether they in any particular instance operate hardly, are proper subjects of discussion in determining whether they shall be abrogated or amended; but when adopted such discussion is out of place in determining whether they should be recognized by the lower courts. If the supreme court have authority to adopt rules which, in its judgment, are necessary for the prompt transaction of the public business we think no lawyer will doubt its power to enforce them; and this without regard to a difference of opinion as to their equitable operation. Clearly, then, it is the duty of the lower courts to have regard to them, not because they, in all cases, are the best, but because, being in the judgment of the supreme court the best, it has adopted them. They then, necessarily, become a rule of action for the lower courts, in so far as their business is affected by them, because they are the law. The common pleas courts have power to adopt rules which shall facilitate the transaction of their business. We have always rigorously sustained this power, unless in rare cases, where the rules were in violation of law. We cannot, however, sustain a rule or an order, even though made with a view to compel prompt trial of an issue in the common pleas, if the effect of such rule is to deny other litigants their right to a hearing in an appellate court. In that case it is a manifest violation of law, and our judgment is final on that question. Besides, not only should we have the aid of the court below in the enforcement of rule 41, because it is a lawful exercise of the power of this court, but also because it is a reasonable exercise of that power. There are in the commonwealth fifty-four judicial districts, with ninety-nine judges. From the final judgments and decrees of these courts there come before us annually, approximately 1,000 appeals, which ought to be heard while this court is in session. After argument, many of these cases demand prolonged investigation and careful consideration. If we are to dispose of this litigation promptly, that disposition of it can only be accomplished by strict order of hearing and rigorous enforcement of the order by such rules as 41. The court sits in Philadelphia five months. Seven weeks of that time are set aside for hearing appeals from the courts of that county; and this, in view of the whole calendar, is all we can afford to give, and, in our judgment, all it is entitled to, exclusively, in an equitable distribution of our time among all the litigants of the state. All the appeals assigned to the two Philadelphia periods are seldom got through with in that time. Those not reached are heard as we can find time on weeks assigned to other counties, and, if not heard then, they go over for a year. To keep down the number of those that go over, many of them involving large sums of money, it is imperative upon us to insist on the presence of counsel when their cases are called. The rule is not for our convenience, but to promote the interests of suitors. In some cases, such as illness or recent death of counsel, and like causes, the rule is relaxed, but not to suit the convenience of counsel who have causes for trial on the common pleas calendar. That, if permitted, would practically break up our calendar, and continue about one half of the cases for a year; and, if such a course were allowed, it would not be three years until the Philadelphia list would be encumbered with cases which would not be reached for several years. This would be a denial of justice. In adopting and enforcing this rule, we appreciate the difficulties of the common pleas in disposing promptly of all the cases on their calendars in the order in which they are called, while this court is engaged on the list of appeals for Philadelphia. But their cases are more completely in their control than ours. The counsel and parties concerned, in most instances, all reside in the city. During our session they have twenty weeks for Philadelphia, while we have but seven. Under such circumstances, not without inconvenience, we admit, but without seriously delaying suitors, such order could be made by the lower courts as would guard against an adverse judgment to a client while his counsel was attending to his professional duty in this court. But, however this may be, the inconvenience to suitors in a few cases ought not to be permitted to work the eventual vexatious delay and gross injustice which otherwise would be suffered by all the parties to all the appeals from final judgments in all the courts of the city. In view, then, of these facts, and the further fact that neither the learned judge of the court below nor we can add anything to the fifty-two weeks of the year, what is his plain duty? As we see it, it is, not only in letter, but in spirit, to recognize this rule, and to so arrange the trial list of causes before him that counsel, by obeying it, shall not put in peril the interests of their clients. We think it not improbable, when the learned judge remarked, "I doubt the right of the supreme court to make any such rule, and I would like to test it," he for the moment misapprehended our relations to each other and to the public. Neither he nor we, as against each other, have any rights to assert. Both of us have only very plain judicial duties to perform. The public alone have rights to be insisted on, and rights which both of us are bound to keep in mind. These are to have justice administered without "denial or delay." If, in working together for this object, our rules or orders should, in rare cases, come into conflict, then the only question is, not which shall assert a right, but which has the authority to finally determine what shall best promote the public interests. We feel sure a glance at the Constitution, from which both of us derive whatever judicial authority we have, furnishes a complete answer. If the authority to finally decide is reposed in us, then we are bound to exercise it, not as asserting a right, but as performing a public duty.

It would serve no good purpose to take up and discuss at length the conflicting statements of facts by the learned judge of the court below and the able counsel for defendant. The contradictions are more apparent than real, and such as usually arise where each of the parties, under a sense of injury, strenuously insists on what he conceives to be his personal rights, not regarding the situation from the standpoint of official duty; and, although we have carefully considered the testimony, it would only, perhaps, aggravate the irritation were we to attempt to reconcile these conflict ing statements. We believe each attempted to perform his duty as he saw it, though they do not seem to believe that of each other. Nevertheless, the main fact stands out prominently and unquestionably that the court below disregarded, in spirit at least, a rule of this court, and thereby this defendant, in the absence of its counsel, who was in attendance upon his duties in this court, was cast in a verdict for $6,000. Lawfully defendant had a right to counsel. Through no fault of its own or of its counsel, but because of the erroneous ruling of the court below, it had none.

The trial was not, therefore, lawful, and the judgment must be reversed. It is reversed accordingly, and a v. f. d. n. awarded.

v.

EASTERN BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION of Syracuse, New York.

(177 Pa. 232.)

A contract to pay money to a loan association situated in another state at its place of business, made by a resident of one state, who applied to become a member of the association as resident in the foreign state, is to be governed by the laws of its residence, although it had an agency at the place where the borrower resided through which the contract was made.

(October 5, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lycoming County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover back money paid by plaintiff to defendant which was alleged to have been usurious interest upon a loan. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. M. B. Hicks and W. H. Spencer, for appellant:

The place of contract is where it is delivered and first takes effect as a binding obligation.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. p. 547.

The obligations were delivered at Williamsport, and the money was paid at Williamsport, thus fixing Williamsport as the place where the contract was consummated and the obligations delivered and first became binding as such.

Although the appellee has complied with the act of April 22, 1874 (Pub. Laws, 108), by filing the required certificate in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, this does not confer upon it authority to exercise within this state the powers conferred upon it by its charter.

It is only by virtue of the provisions contained in the 87th section of the act of April 29, 1874 (cl. 1, Pub. Laws, 96, and cl. 6, Pub. Laws, 98), that building associations incorporated in Pennsylvania under said act can collect more than the amount actually loaned, with 6 per cent interest.

Jarrett v. Cope, 68 Pa. 67; Philanthropic Bldg. Asso. v. McKnight, 85 Pa. 470; Kupfert v. Guttenberg Bldg. Asso. 80 Pa. 465.

The comity between the states, in force in Pennsylvania, does not hold that because the statute law of New York provides that the exercise of certain powers conferred upon the corporation in question shall not be deemed a violation of the New York statutes against usury, that therefore this corporation shall be permitted to exercise all these powers, or any of them, in the state of Pennsylvania, without regard to the usury laws of this state.

Atlanta Nat. Bldg. & L. Asso. supra*.

A contract made at one place, to be performed at another, is governed by the law of the place of performance, provided that the place of performance was not fixed different from that of the contract for the purpose of evading the usury laws of the place where the contract was made.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is an incorporated building and loan association, duly incorporated by the laws of New York, and located and transacting its business at Syracuse, in that state. The plaintiff, in October, 1891, made application to become a member of the association, by purchasing two shares of its stock, and, in November following, received a certificate for the shares. In May, 1892, he made application for a loan of $200, which was granted in December of the same year. As security for the loan he gave a bond and mortgage on some land in Lycoming county, Pennsylvania, for the sum of $207.89, which included the premium paid for the loan. The actual money paid to the plaintiff was $180. At the same time he gave to the defendant sixty-seven promissory notes, for $3.17 each, except three for $1.67 each, the aggregate amount of which was secured by the mortgage, and represented the monthly payments to be made by the plaintiff as a member of the association. On August 31, 1893, the plaintiff paid the mortgage debt in full, the amount being $181.07, after deducting the withdrawal value of his stock and a rebate premium. He now claims that the premium retained by the defendant and the fines charged against him in the settlement were usury, and seeks to recover in this action $50.95, alleging that this amount was the excess over legal interest on the amount of money actually loaned to him by the defendant. He contends that his contract with the defendant was a Pennsylvania contract, and to be governed by the law of that state. The defendant had an agency at Williamsport, in Pennsylvania, and the transaction was conducted between the plaintiff and the defendant's agent at that place. That circumstance, however, is of no account if the contract was to be performed in the state of New York. The appellant does not at all dispute the proposition that contracts are to be governed by the law of the place where they are to be performed, nor does he contend that he would have any right of recovery under the law of New York, which permits building and loan associations to charge usurious rates of interest on loans. The learned court below decided that the place of performance was the state of New York, and the contract was therefore to be governed by the law of that state. In this opinion we concur.

A point was also made that, if the contract was made for the purpose and with the intent of evading the usury laws of Pennsylvania, it must be governed by the law of Pennsylvania, and not of New York. As to this the court below held that there was not a scintilla of evidence of any such intent, and therefore the doctrine could not apply to this case; and in that ruling also we fully concur.

It is only necessary to examine briefly the contract of the parties in order to determine at what place it was to be performed. The defendant's place of business was at Syracuse, in the state of New York. The plaintiff's application for membership was in the following words: "I, Joseph Bennett, of Williamsport, county of Lycoming, state of Pennsylvania, hereby apply for membership in the Eastern Building & Loan Association of Syracuse, Onondaga county, New York, and subscribe for two shares of instalment stock. I hereby agree to abide by all the terms, conditions, and by-laws contained or referred to in the certificate of shares and will also comply with all the rules and regulations of said association." The plaintiff's application was accepted, and he thereupon became a member, consciously and intentionally, of an association of the state of New York, and contracted that he would abide by their by-laws, and comply with all their rules and regulations. His subsequent application for a loan was entitled "Application for Loan from the Eastern Building & Loan Association of Syracuse, N. Y." He afterwards signed an application for an advance, addressed as follows: "To the Board of Directors of the Eastern Building & Loan Association of Syracuse, N. Y.," requesting the advance to be made, and again agreeing to comply with the charter and by-laws of the association, and all requirements defined by the committee of the board of directors. Thereupon sixty seven notes were prepared, sent to him for signature, and signed by him, in the following words:

On or before the last Saturday of March, 1893, I promise to pay three and $\frac{1}{10}$ dollars to the order of the Eastern Building & Loan Association of Syracuse, N. Y., at its office in Syracuse, N. Y. Value received.

Williamsport, Jan. 2, 1893.

Joseph C. Bennett.

When he gave his bond for the money loaned he obligated himself as follows "I, Joseph C. Bennett, am held and firmly bound unto the Eastern Building & Loan Association of Syracuse, N. Y., in the sum of $400, lawful money of the United States of America, to be paid to said Eastern Building & Loan Association of Syracuse, N. Y., etc. In the condition of the bond it is provided that if he pays to the association, repeating its name and place, $207.89 in sixty-seven equal payments, of $3.17 each, except three of $1.67 each, "payable monthly to said association, at its office in Syracuse, N. Y., on or before the last Saturday of this and each and every month," etc. The mortgage also executed by the plaintiff repeats the name and designation of the defendant, and its place; recites the bond, with its condition for making all the payments at the office of the company, at Syracuse, New York; and then grants to the defendant, repeating its name and place, certain described land of the plaintiff, situate in Lycoming county, Pennsylvania, with the usual proviso that, if the payments are all made to the defendant, the bond and mortgage should become void.

Thus, it will be seen that in every possible way in which the English language could express it the plaintiff entered into a written contract with the defendant to pay it, in sixty-seven different payments, every one of which was to be made at the office of the defendant in Syracuse, New York, a designated aggregate sum of money. What is the use of discussing the question whether this was a contract to pay money in the state of New York? What is there to discuss? Nothing. No other place of payment is mentioned or can possibly be implied. This one place is positively expressed over and over again, and many times over, in solemn instruments, signed and sealed by the plaintiff himself, and in sixty-seven different notes, also signed by the plaintiff. It is a waste of time to discuss so plain a matter. The fact that the plaintiff lived in Pennsylvania, and negotiated there with an agent of the defendant either for the membership or for the loan, is not of the slightest significance. The contract must be adjudged by its express terms, no matter where the parties were when it was made. And, when those terms are clear, explicit, involved in no doubt whatever, they must prevail; and it is the duty of the courts to enforce them according to their literal meaning. Nor is there the slightest ground for an allegation that the contract was made for the purpose of evading the usury laws of Pennsylvania. Who had such a purpose, and what is the evidence of it? Did the plaintiff have it, and, if so, did he communicate it to the defendant? If so, where is the evidence of it? There is none whatever. The defendant's business was transacted at its proper place of business in the state of New York. This business was a part of its regular business, done in its usual way; and, as a matter of course, the mere fact that this loan was made to a citizen of Pennsylvania cannot justify an inference that it was done with an intent to evade the laws of Pennsylvania. This business was done just as all its other business was done. The defendant had a lawful right to loan money wherever it pleased, and it would be most absurd to say that, because it lent money to a Pennsylvanian, it therefore intended to evade the laws of Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvanian had a right to borrow money in the state of New York if he chose to do so, and, if he contracted to pay it in the state of New York, he must be conclusively presumed to know that his contract would be governed by the law of that state. In all this there is not a shadow of an unlawful intent to evade the law of Pennsylvania. There was therefore nothing to submit to the jury on that question.

Judgment affirmed.

HARRISBURG NATIONAL BANK, Appt.,
v.

Elizabeth Reily BRADSHAW.

(178 Pa. 180.)

1. A statute excepting accommodation indorsement from the contracts which may be made by a married woman does not render invalid a renewal after marriage of such an indorsement made before marriage.
2. A married woman may confirm the act of her attorney in renewing, in excess of his authority, her indorsement on a note given before marriage, if she could have conferred the power on him in the first instance.
3. The facts that renewal notes are not made until after the old ones are overdue, and that the old ones are not protested for nonpayment, will not make the renewals new contracts beyond the power of a married woman to make if the original note was indorsed before her marriage and the renewals are in pursuance of a general understanding that they shall be made, and there was no intention that they should be new contracts.

NOTE.—The power of a married woman to execute a renewal of an obligation created before her marriage is a matter on which there are few precedents.

As to the wife's capacity to contract generally, see Prentiss v. Paisley (Fla.) 7 L. R. A. 640, and note.

For the somewhat kindred matter of the validity of a renewal by an incompetent person of an obligation created while competent, see Memphis Nat. Bank v. Sneed (Tenn.) ante, 274, and note.

(October 5, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Dauphin County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability as indorser on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts found by the trial court were as follows:

"(1) In July, 1889, Miss Elizabeth Reilly indorsed a note for $10,000 for the accommodation of her brother, John W. Reilly, which was discounted for him by the Harrisburg National Bank, with knowledge that she was an accommodation indorser, and when this note matured on November 4, 1889, she in like manner indorsed a like note in renewal of the first. Before the second note matured, she became the wife of Walter J. Bradshaw, and executed, jointly with him, a power of attorney to G. M. McCauley. . . . (2) After her marriage and the execution and delivery of this power of attorney, she removed to Helena, Montana, where she resided when the second note matured on March 7, 1890. On that day the attention of her attorney was called to this note by the president of the bank, who asked him to indorse a note in renewal. Mr. McCauley expressed doubt whether he had authority so to do, and the president said, if he would indorse it, it would be satisfactory, which he then did. He had no knowledge of the execution of the note until this time, and Mrs. Bradshaw had not mentioned it to him, nor given him any authority to act for her, except the power of attorney above referred to. No protest or notice of nonpayment was made or given as to the note which then matured. At this time the balance to the credit of John W. Reilly on the books of the bank was $2,558.06. (3) Thereafter, at intervals of four months, until August 17, 1894, notes, each in renewal of the preceding one, were given to the bank with the accommodation indorsement of Elizabeth R. Bradshaw, the defendant. None of these renewal notes were protested, and there were intervals of, in some cases, two or three days, and in others as many weeks, between the maturity of a given note and the indorsement and delivery of the renewal. Most of the notes, when matured and renewed, were delivered to the attorney of John W. Reilly and Mrs. Bradshaw, and the renewal interest was paid by him on account of John W. Reilly. (4) When the last note matured, on December 20, 1894, it amounted, with interest, to $10,817, and it was duly protested, and notice of nonpayment was sent to the defendant."

Messrs. Robert Snodgrass and Wolfe & Bailey, for appellant:

All of the notes, subsequent to the original, were renewals and were so marked. They were not payments in any sense, nor were they shown to have been tendered or accepted as such. They could not have been considered as payments unless it was clearly shown that they were so intended.

Inst. § 1266; Ritter v. Singmaster, 73 Pa. 400; Brown v. Scott, 51 Pa. 357.

If, then, the renewals in question were not payments; but operated simply as a suspension of the right of action, the obligation evidenced by the contract remained, and necessarily related back to the origin of the debt.

Oerholt v. First Nat. Bank, 83 Pa. 490; Stephens v. Monongahela Nat. Bank, 88 Pa. 157, 83 Am. Rep. 438.

The true test of liability in the present case must depend upon the question whether or not an antenuptial contract of indorsement falls within the prohibition of the acts of 1887 and 1893. Their plain import is to enlarge the powers of married women, and to confer upon them all the powers of a feme sole except in certain specified particulars.

Real Estate Invest. Co. v. Roop, 132 Pa. 496, 7 L. R. A. 211; Koechling v. Henkel, 144 Pa. 215.

Antenuptial contracts are substantially in the same position as before, except that they may recognize such contracts, and bind themselves in relation thereto, more effectually than they could under previous laws.

Glyde v. Keister, 82 Pa. 87; Finley's Appeal, 87 Pa. 453.

Since the acts of 1887 and 1893 she can confess a judgment, or do any other act in recognition of her liability in such cases, to the same extent as if she were a feme sole.

Adams v. Grey, 154 Pa. 258; McCormick v. Bottorff, 155 Pa. 381; Mitchell v. Richmond, 164 Pa. 566.

The notes given before marriage are not separable from the renewals made after marriage, but the liability of the defendant is to be drawn from the transaction as a whole, and not from any single part of it.

Mahon v. Gormley, 24 Pa. 80.

Demand and notice are not parts of the contract, but merely steps in the remedy, which may be waived by the indorser.

Barclay v. Weaver, 19 Pa. 396, 57 Am. Dec. 661.

A subsequent promise to pay the note by an indorser who has full knowledge of all the facts, amounts to a complete waiver of the want of due notice.

Sherer v. Easton Bank, 83 Pa. 134.

Mr. S. J. M. McCarrell for appellee.

Fell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this case relates to the power of a married woman to bind herself by the renewal of an accommodation indorsement made before her marriage. The defendant, when single, indorsed a promissory note at four months for $10,000 for the accommodation of the maker, her brother. Once before marriage she renewed her indorsement, and after her marriage she renewed it as the notes became due, at intervals of four months, for the period of nearly five years. The last of the series of notes was protested, and this suit brought upon it. The statement was drawn and the case presented by the plaintiff upon the theory that the notes given before marriage and the renewals after marriage were parts of a continuing transaction, and that the defendant's liability was to be drawn from the whole of it. The marriage of the defendant did not affect her relation to obligations into which she had previously entered so as to release her from an antenuptial contract, and it is conceded that the protest of the first note which became due after her marriage would have fixed her liability as to it; but it is claimed that she was without power, after marriage, to renew her indorsement, as she is not permitted by the act of June 8, 1893, to become an accommodation indorser. The learned judge, before whom the case was tried without a jury, held as conclusions of law that the defendant was discharged from liability upon the note indorsed by her before marriage and which matured thereafter by the failure of the bank to protest it for nonpayment; that the failure to protest was not waived by the indorsement of new notes from time to time; and that she was not bound by the indorsements made after marriage, for the reason that she was incompetent to incur liability as an accommodation indorser. The primary question is whether a married woman is bound by the renewal of an existing valid contract, entered into before marriage, when the contract is one which the law does not authorize her to make after marriage. The act of 1893 gives a married woman the same right to acquire, control, and dispose of property and to make contracts in relation thereto that she possessed before marriage. The limitation placed upon the power conferred is that she "may not become accommodation indorser, maker, guarantor, or surety for another." The purpose of the limitation is to protect her from contracts not connected with the management of her estate, and from which she could derive no advantage. As to contracts relating to her own estate or affairs, the existing restraint was removed. It remains as to a class of contracts into which she might be induced or constrained to enter for the benefit of others. The defendant was liable on the indorsement of the note which became due two months after her marriage. True, her liability was conditional only, but it would have been fixed and made absolute by protest and notice. By the renewal of her indorsement she did not enter into a new obligation for the benefit of another, but she continued and extended for her own benefit an existing obligation by which she was bound. By so doing she did not "become an accommodation indorser," and enter into a new forbidden contract. The contract already existed and its continuance was for the relief and benefit of her estate. A construction of the act which denies a woman, after marriage, the power to continue an antecedent obligation, would in many cases impose a hardship upon her. If she cannot continue, the alternative is to pay, however great may be the loss to her estate. Such a construction is not required by the letter of the act, and would not be in harmony with its spirit. The proviso of the act of 1887, which is incorporated into the act of 1893, is for the protection of women after marriage from a class of contracts in which they have no direct interest, and from which their estates can derive no advantage. The renewal of an obligation contracted before marriage, we think, does not come within the meaning of the act, although the obligation may belong to the prohibited class. The bank could have bound the defendant to the payment of the note absolutely by protest. She could have bound herself by a waiver of protest. The renewal of her indorsement at the maturity of the note was but the recognition and continuance of an obligation which she had before assumed, and which was binding upon her. Whether the power of attorney given by the defendant to G. M. McCauley authorized the indorsement made by him of the note of March 7, 1890, is not material. If she had power to renew the indorsement after marriage, she could do it by her attorney, and if the power under which he acted was not broad enough, it was competent for her to ratify and confirm his act. This she did. The indorsement of notes in renewal by the defendant after she had been released from liability on preceding notes because of the failure of the bank to protest them for nonpayment was not, under the circumstances, the assumption of a new liability as accommodation indorser. After her marriage she resided in Montana. The notes were sent to her by her attorney for indorsement. Most of them were returned to the bank before the maturity of the notes which they were intended to renew. The bank relied upon her carrying out in good faith the understanding which existed between them as to renewals. She did carry it out. It was not at any time the intention of either party that she was assuming a new obligation for her brother, but it was the intention of both that the renewals should be as of the dates of the notes renewed; that there should be no gap; and that she was continuing her own obligation, entered into before marriage, by which she was bound. While the defendant was not authorized, after marriage, to enter into a new contract as accommodation indorser, it was competent for her to continue her valid antenuptial contract. In dealing with this the act of 1893 imposed no limitation upon her power. She could have taken advantage, as could any indorser, of the failure of demand and notice by the holder of the note, or she could overlook the omission and recognize and reassert her liability by a new indorsement. By so doing she was not entering into a new contract not authorized by the act. Substantially the same principle was asserted in Brunner's Appeal, 47 Pa. 67. Under the act of 1848 a married woman was liable on her antenuptial contract, but was without power to confess judgment for a debt due by her. It was held in the case cited that she could agree to the revival of a judgment entered after marriage by virtue of a power of attorney signed by her before marriage, for the reason that it was not the creation of a new liability by the renewal of one already existing. We are of opinion that under the findings of fact judgment should have been entered for the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed, and set aside, and now, October 5, 1896, judgment is entered for the plaintiff for the amount of the note of August 17, 1894, with interest and costs of protest, $12,202.06.

Marietta HELLER

v.

ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF LIVERPOOL, App't.

1. Insurance against loss by reason of having to pay rent for a building under a lease while it is untenable by reason of fire will cover the time during which the landlord is in possession for the purpose of rebuilding the burned building, under an agreement with the tenant that such possession shall not affect the tenant's liability for rent under the lease until the completion of the new building.
2. An insurer against loss by reason of liability for rent under a lease while the building is untenable because of fire is not relieved from any part of his liability by the fact that the tenant receives from his landlord a sum derived from a policy insuring the landlord against loss of rent because of fire, at least if the combined amounts will not wholly reimburse to the tenant the rent he is compelled to pay under his contract while the building is untenable.

(Mitchell, J., dissents.)

(October 5, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion. See also Royal Ins. Co. v. Heller (Pa.) 7 L. R. A. 411.

Messrs. Francis H. Bohlen and M. P. Henry, for appellant:

The entry of the landlord to rebuild, even with the consent of the tenant, suspends the rent.

Magaw v. Lambert, 8 Pa. 444; Briggs v. Thompson, 9 Pa. 840; Hoeverler v. Fleming, 91 Pa. 824; Auer v. Penn., 92 Pa. 446; Taylor, Land. & T. § 880; Gilbert, Rents, 145.

If the tenant loses the benefit of the enjoyment of any portion of the demised premises, the rent is thereby suspended.

Upton v. Townsend, 17 C. B. 30.

Fire insurance is purely a contract of indemnity which does not differ essentially from a bond of indemnity or the guaranty of a debt.

1 Phillips, Ins. § 4; Wood, Fire Ins. note 2, p. 14; Porter, Ins. p. 2.

If the insured parts with any right of reclamation for the loss to which he is entitled, from another party, the insurer is pro tanto discharged.

Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Fidelity Title & T. Co. 123 Pa. 516; Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Storrow, 5 Paige, 285.

The right to be relieved of the payment of the rent by the landlord's entry to rebuild is one of the advantages of the tenant's position, by which his liability may be relieved or reduced, under the rule of tenancy in Pennsylvania, which treats the lease as giving an estate in the land, and not as a contract for the use of a building, the destruction of which puts an end to the contract according to the rules of the civil law.

Viterbo v. Friedlander, 120 U. S. 707, 80 L. ed. 776.

An agreement not to avail himself of the right which the law gives the tenant to be relieved of rent while the landlord is in possession for the purpose of rebuilding is a voluntary concession, and not a liability within the meaning of the policy of insurance, for which indemnity can be claimed from one who stands in the secondary position of an insurer. Such a concession cannot increase the loss to the tenant's insurers.

Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Storrow, supra.

Liability for rent, continued by voluntary agreement of the tenant beyond the time when it otherwise would have ceased is not a liability in the meaning of the contract of insurance.

It required an additional agreement by the tenant to continue this liability, which under the lease would have ceased. The rent became collectible by virtue of the new agreement, and not of the original lease. The old lease became a part of the new agreement as if incorporated in it.

Ex parte Vitale, 47 L. T. N. S. 480; Re Application of Washington Park Comrs. 52 N. Y. 181; Bradstreet v. Rich, 74 Me. 303; Sewall v. Henry, 9 Ala. 24; Pilow v. Brown, 28 Ark. 240; Bradley v. Marshall, 54 Ill. 173; Smith v. Turpin, 20 Ohio St. 478.

It is no answer to say that the landlord was not bound to rebuild and could have continued to exact rent after the building was destroyed.

Heller v. Royal Ins. Co. 183 Pa. 152, 7 L. R. A. 411; Porter, Ins. p. 10.

Double indemnity cannot be recovered.

Mr. M. Hampton Todd, for appellee:

Not only had the plaintiff a right to agree with her landlord that he should enter and rebuild, but it was her duty to permit him to do so, and in so doing she did not discharge the defendant for rent accruing after the date of entry from liability to her on its covenant to indemnify her for loss arising from having to pay rent for the destroyed premises.

2 Wood, Fire Ins. p. 1056, § 492.

Mrs. Heller was bound to pay her rent whether the premises were rebuilt or not.

Bussman v. Ganster, 72 Pa. 285.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Five adjoining buildings forming a single store, at corner of Arch and Eighth streets, Philadelphia, were destroyed by fire, January 23, 1888. They were owned by Thomas K. Peterson, trustee, etc., who, by lease dated June 15, 1887, rented them to Marietta Heller, this plaintiff, for the term of three years from the 1st of January, 1888, at an annual rental of $8,500, payable monthly, and she was in possession at the date of the fire. The Royal Insurance Company,

NOTE—On the question, What constitutes double insurance for the purpose of apportionment of loss?—see Clarke v. Western Assur. Co. (Pa.) 15 L. R. A. 127, and note.

this defendant, on the 26th of January, 1887, issued to plaintiff a policy of indemnity against damage to her interest as lessee of the buildings, by fire, in the sum of $6,000. In the policy is this stipulation: "It being understood that this policy is to indemnify the assured for any loss accruing to her by reason of having to pay rent for the within described building [during] such time or times as the building may be untenable by reason of fire or fires occurring during the continuance of this policy; loss not to be limited by date of expiration of the policy; it being understood that the sum insured is the annual rental of the property, and the amount of loss is to be computed on that basis." Peterson, the landlord, also took out in the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company a policy covering the term of the lease, indemnifying him against loss of rents by fire in the sum of $8,500, in which was this clause:

It is understood and agreed that in case the above-named building, or any part thereof, shall be rendered untenable by fire, this company shall be liable to the assured for the actual loss of rent ensuing therefrom, not exceeding the sum insured, which shall be taken as the yearly rent of the premises, and this company shall be liable only for such proportion of any loss as the sum hereby insured bears to the annual rent of the building; the assured agreeing to rebuild or repair said premises in as short a time as the nature of the case will permit. Loss to be computed from the date of the occurrence of said fire, and cease on said building being rendered tenable.

Note. In case the assured shall elect not to rebuild or repair said premises in as short a time as the nature of the case will admit, then the loss of rent shall be determined by the time which would have been required for such purpose.

Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company.

After the fire the property was unoccupied for any purpose until the 24th of July following, a period of six months, when plaintiff entered into an agreement with her landlord that he would within seven months erect a new and better building on the lots covered by the old buildings, and make it larger, by extending it over three adjoining lots. Further, plaintiff agreed that she would accept a lease of the new building for a term of five years at an annual rental of $17,000, payable monthly. There were further stipulations that nothing in the agreement was to affect plaintiff's liability for rent under the old lease until the completion of the new building, and that the entry of the landlord for the purpose of rebuilding was not to be deemed an eviction by him or a surrender by her. It was further stipulated that nothing in the agreement was to affect the right of either on policies of insurance which each held for rent. After the fire this defendant denied any liability, except a proportionate one on loss of rent under both policies, which was, with interest, $3,096.50, and which it paid to plaintiff without prejudice to her alleged right to claim her entire loss. The Pennsylvania Company, although disclaiming all liability, paid the landlord $2,000 for the benefit of Mrs. Heller. The plaintiff paid the landlord the rent for one year, the time the premises were untenable, and claimed that defendant was liable on its policy to her for a balance of $3,000, with interest, payment of which being refused, she brought suit. The defendant filed an affidavit of defense averring that the agreement to rebuild was a collusive arrangement between the parties at the suggestion of the landlord's insurance company, by which that company was to escape any payment on account of the loss. The court below entered judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. On appeal this judgment was reversed, this court holding that the facts tending to show collusion would, if proved, not relieve the landlord's insurance company from payment of its proportion of the loss, and the evidence tending to show fraud was for the jury. This case is reported in 183 Pa. 152, 7 L. R. A. 411. When the record was remitted the defendant, instead of pleading and going to trial, filed a demurrer to plaintiff's statement of facts, as not being sufficient in law to warrant judgment. The court below sustained the demurrer, and plaintiff appealed. This court, in an opinion by the chief justice (see 151 Pa. 101), held that under the circumstances as averred by plaintiff, the averment of fraud in the affidavit having dropped out of the case, she was entitled to recover on her claim set out of record; that the facts neither constituted an eviction by the landlord, nor a rescission of the contract under which the plaintiff was answerable for rent, and for aught that appeared the transaction was a perfectly honest one. So the judgment was reversed and a procedendo awarded. On the trial of the case in the court below, considerable evidence was given tending to show correspondence and negotiations between the parties and the insurance companies, principally with a view to adjustment without suit of their respective rights; but the court being of opinion that no available defense had been proved, at the close of the evidence directed a verdict for the plaintiff for $3,000 and interest. We now have this appeal, assigning six errors. It is unnecessary to discuss them in detail. When the case was last here Chief Justice Sterrett says, with this agreement before him: "It neither constituted an eviction by the landlord nor a rescission of the lease under which plaintiff was liable for the rent as to which she was insured by defendant company." There is nothing new in the case now to affect the correctness of this conclusion. The parties in open court abandoned any averment of fraud in the making of this agreement. That being the case, defendant's liability remains according to its contract. That stipulates that it was to "indemnify the assured for any loss accruing to her by reason of having to pay rent for the within-described building [during] such time or times as the building may be untenable by reason of fire." It was untenable during the entire period covered by her claim, by reason of the fire. The occupation of the lot by the landlord for seven months, in rebuilding, in no reasonable construction of this clause rendered the premises tenable, while the agreement with the landlord expressly stipulated her liability for rent was to continue during this period. Therefore what rent she paid was her loss, and this the defendant contracted should be made good. Nor does the fact that the landlord paid over to her $2,000 received by him from the Pennsylvania Company affect her contract right against this defendant. She received that from a source outside of, and independent of, her contract for indemnity, just as she might have received a gift of that amount from any friend who desired to aid her. Defendant lost nothing, and the $2,000 did not even reimburse her in full for her loss. She paid rent for unoccupied premises, $8,500. She claims from this defendant $6,000, less the $3,000 already paid her. She has received from her landlord

$2,000, leaving her still a loser for the year the building was not tenantable, $500. As is well said by the learned judge of the court below: "Its [defendant's] burden has not been increased, nor has it been deprived of any right it possessed. . . . The landlord and tenant had a lawful right to make the agreement they did make, and, the risk and loss of the defendant company not having been increased thereby, it is liable for the amount due on its policy."

The judgment is affirmed.

v.

DISTRICT COURT OF FIRST JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

(.....Nev.....)

1. A county is not a municipal corporation, in the full sense of the term. It is only a quasi corporation, and possesses such powers and is subjected to such liabilities only as are specially provided for by law.

2. Section 25, art. 4, Nev. Const., which requires the legislature to establish a system of county governments which shall be uniform throughout the state, means that all county governments must, in all essential particulars, be alike.

3. The act of the legislature of March 15, 1895 (Stat. 1895, p. 73), entitled "An Act to Incorporate Storey County and Provide for the Government Thereof," is void because in conflict with that section of the Constitution, in many particulars.

4. It is also a local and special act regulating county business, and consequently is in conflict with § 20 of art. 4, which forbids such legislation.

PETITION for a writ of prohibition to prevent respondent from taking jurisdiction of a prosecution against petitioner for the alleged illegal keeping of a saloon where intoxicating liquors were sold. Refused.

Statement by Bigelow, J.:

Original application for a writ of prohibition. The petitioner was convicted in a justice's court of the offense of keeping a saloon in the city of Virginia, wherein liquors were sold by the glass, without having obtained the license therefor required by an ordinance of said city. From this conviction he appealed to the district court of the first judicial district, Storey County, where his demurrer to the complaint upon the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him, and that the court had no jurisdiction of the offense charged, was overruled, and the case set for trial. Thereupon he filed his petition herein, setting out the above facts, and asking that the court be prohibited from proceeding further in the trial thereof. The defendant demurs upon the ground, among others, that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a proper ground for the issuance of the writ.

Mr. F. M. Huffaker, for petitioner:

When the act of 1895 leaves the business of Storey county to be as heretofore in all respects and the system of county government untouched, how can it be claimed that an act creating a municipal corporation of Storey county is either a regulation of county business, or an establishment of a system of county government?

The legislature, by the act of 1895, simply merged said city and town business into the county business, which the legislature had a perfect right to do.

Meers, Langan & Knight, for respondent:

The act of March 15, 1895 (Nev. Stat. 1895, p. 73, chap. 80), is unconstitutional and void, in so far as it in any way affects the action sought to be restrained.

Instead of having a county government similar to other county governments of the state we have a "municipal corporation" known as "Storey county."

Counties are "quasi corporations" in contradistinction to "municipal corporations."

Meagher v. Storey County, 5 Nev. 244; State v. Trolson, 21 Nev. 419.

Bigelow, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question involved in this case is the validity of the act of the legislature entitled "An Act to Incorporate Storey County and Provide for the Government Thereof," approved March 15, 1895 (Stat. 1895, p. 78). Its constitutionality is attacked upon several different grounds, of which it will be necessary to notice but one or two. Section 1 of the act describes Storey county, not by name, but by metes and bounds, and then creates the territory so described into a municipal corporation by the name of "Storey County," with large and varied powers,—among them, that of having a common seal; of holding and enjoying both real and personal property, either within or without the municipality, and the same to buy, sell, and mortgage; to receive bequests, gifts, and donations of property, either in fee simple, or in trust for charitable or other purposes, with power to manage, sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of the same in accordance with the terms of the trust. Section 2 provides that all buildings, lands, and property, all rights of property and rights of action, all moneys, revenues, and incomes, belonging or appertaining to Storey county (evidently referring to the county as it now exists), to the city of Virginia, or the town of Gold Hill, shall be vested in Storey county; meaning, by the name as now used, the new municipality. Section 3, that the new municipality shall succeed to all property rights, all books, records, etc., of Storey county, Virginia City, or Gold Hill, and shall become subject to all liabilities of those organizations. Section 4, that Storey county (evidently the municipality) may sue for and recover all property, etc., belonging to either said county, city, or town, and that all existing suits, actions, and proceedings to which "said county," or the city, or town, is a party, are to be continued by or against "said county." Section 7, that all county moneys are to be kept in one fund, to be known as the "County General Fund." Section 10, that the board of commissioners may levy a tax for county purposes, not exceeding the sum of $3.50 on each $100 valuation of the property therein.

A comparison of this act with the existing laws governing all the other counties in the state seems to demonstrate that it is in conflict with § 20 of art. 4 of the Constitution, which forbids local and special laws regulating county business; with § 25 of the same article, which requires the legislature to establish a system of county governments which shall be uniform throughout the state. Clearly, a county is not a municipal corporation. If it were, there would have been no occasion for this act changing Storey county into a municipality. It is, at the most, only a quasi corporation, and possesses only such powers, and is subjected to only such liabilities, as are specially provided for by law. Mr. Beach, in his work on Public Corporations, states the distinction between them as follows: "Municipal corporations embrace incorporated cities, villages, and towns, which are full-fledged corporations, with all the powers, duties, and liabilities incident to such a status, while public quasi corporations possess only a portion of the powers, duties, and liabilities of corporations. As instances of the latter class may be mentioned counties, hundreds, townships, overseers of the poor, town supervisors, school districts, and road districts." Beach, Pub. Corp. § 3. And again, in § 6, the same author says: "The preceding sections indicate the essential differences between the municipal and the public quasi corporation. The latter may be defined to be an involuntary political or civil division of the state, created by general laws to aid in the administration of government.

Counties, townships, school districts, road districts, and like public quasi corporations do not usually possess corporate powers under special charters; but they exist under general laws of the state, which apportion the territory of the state into political divisions for convenience of government, and require of the people residing within those divisions the performance of certain public duties as a part of the machinery of the state, and, in order that they may be able to perform these duties, vest them with certain corporate powers." A county is certainly very far from being the complete corporation that is created by the act in question, with all, and probably more than all, the powers that can be vested in a municipal corporation. This, of itself, is sufficient to destroy the uniformity that the Constitution requires to exist in the several county governments. In Singleton v. Eureka County, 22 Nev. —, we had occasion to consider this clause of the Constitution at some length, and there concluded that it meant that such government must, in all essential particulars, be alike. State, Atty. Gen., v. Boyd, 19 Nev. 43, is to the same effect. But Storey county, as created into a municipal corporation by this act, is not like the other counties, either in form or substance, and therefore the act is in conflict with the Constitution. With the law in question in force, it would be an interesting study to determine just what position Storey county that used to be, the city of Virginia, and the town of Gold Hill would be in. While there is no provision for their disestablishment, there can be little doubt that the framers of the law intended that they should practically cease to exist. If not totally destroyed, it was certainly intended that the breath of life should be taken from them. All property, all rights of action, all revenues and incomes, all books, records, claims, demands, etc., theretofore belonging to Storey county, are transferred to the new municipality.

Without property, without records, without rights in anything, either in possession or in action, its bones are marrowless, and it has nothing in common with the living organizations in the other counties. It is no answer to say that the new municipal corporation has taken its place, and has all the powers, duties, and liabilities that the county formerly had; for it is an entirely different system of government, whereas the Constitution requires them to be the same. Nor is this true merely in matters of form. The municipality has different and additional powers from those possessed by the counties. No county has a common seal; nor can it hold property outside its boundaries, or even inside, except for a few purposes, nor purchase, sell, or mortgage property generally, nor hold and manage it in trust for any purpose, while the municipality of Storey county is authorized to so hold it for all purposes. Other counties must have at least three funds for county purposes,—a general fund, an indigent fund, and a contingent fund (Gen. Stat. § 2008), but this municipality is to have but one. Other counties can under no circumstances levy a tax for county purposes of more than $2 upon each $100 of property valuation (Stat. 1891, p. 22), while the new Storey county can levy $3.50. In fact, were it not that the municipality has the same name and the same boundaries as Storey county, it would be fully as difficult to point out wherein the two governments are uniform as that wherein they differ. In addition, as the act is confined to Storey county, it is both local and special; and, as it unquestionably regulates the business of that county, it is also invalid for that reason.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

Re SPITZ BROTHERS' ASSIGNMENT.

(.....N. M.....)

Individual partners cannot claim their statutory exemption out of the partnership property in case of insolvency, in the absence of a statute expressly authorizing them to do so.

(September 1, 1896.)

APPEAL by petitioners from a judgment of the District Court for Bernalillo County refusing to recognize their right to exemptions in certain partnership property which they had assigned for the benefit of creditors. Affirmed.

Statement by Laughlin, J.:

On the 8th day of December, 1894, the firm of Spitz Bros., a copartnership composed of Edward Spitz and Berthold Spitz, made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors to M. W. Flourney, as assignee. The firm of Spitz Bros. were, and had been for some time previous to the date of the assignment, doing a general mercantile business at Albuquerque, in Bernalillo county, and at Cerrillos, in Santa Fé county, New Mexico. The deed of assignment is in the usual and proper form, and conveyed to said Flourney, as assignee, in trust, certain tracts and parcels of real estate (describing the same), "and also all the goods, chattels, and effects and property of every kind—real, personal, and mixed—of said firm of Spitz Brothers, and the said Edward Spitz, and the said Berthold Spitz, together with all claims and demands whatsoever and where-soever, including choses in action, suits now pending, and judgments, except, however, so much as may, under the laws of the territory of New Mexico, be exempt to each of the above grantors." Thereafter, on the 23d day of January, 1895, the said Edward Spitz and Berthold Spitz filed their separate petitions in the district court for Bernalillo county in which petitions they each stated under oath that each was a resident of the territory, the head of a family, and was not the owner of a homestead, and that there was a clause in the said deed of assignment expressly reserving from the said conveyances so much property conveyed as was, under the laws of this territory, exempted to each of said petitioners; and prayed for an order on the said assignee requiring him to set apart from the proceeds of said estate, and to pay over to each of said petitioners, the sum of $500, as the equivalent of the amount of exemptions allowed in such cases to residents and heads of families who do not own a homestead. The district court granted the prayer, and issued a rule on the assignee to pay over the amounts claimed in the petitions, or show cause at a fixed date, if any reason he had, why not. The assignee answered the rule, and showed that neither said Edward nor Berthold Spitz, nor their agent nor attorney, ever selected any property, real or personal, from assets of said estate in his hands as assignee, nor claimed any of said property as an exemption, and that the appraised value of the assets of said estate of said Spitz Bros. amounted to $4,366.96, and that the partnership debts of said firm of Spitz Bros. amounted to the sum of $10,000 or more. After hearing on the answer to the rule, the court found that neither the said Edward nor the said Berthold Spitz was entitled to any exemptions out of the partnership assets, except out of any residue which might remain after all the partnership debts were paid out of the partnership assets of said firm, from which ruling petitioners appealed to this court.

Property owned by a debtor as a member of a partnership is alike within the letter and spirit of the exemption laws. The language of the act should be construed in harmony with its humane and remedial purpose. Its design was to shield the poor and not to strip them. The interest it assumes to protect is that belonging to the debtor, be it more or less. Whatever it be, within the limitation of the statute the debtor's interest is exempt, in view of his own necessity and of the probable destitution to which his loss might reduce the family depending on him for support.

Laughlin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants assigned three grounds of error in the court below for reversal, but only one of which will be considered, as that is sufficient for a full determination of the case on its merits. That assignment is in the following words, to wit: "Third, the court erred in refusing to grant to the respective petitioners the exemptions prayed." The provisions of the statute under which appellants seek to establish their right to the exemptions claimed in their petitions in this case are as follows, to wit:

"Sec. 1. Every person who has a family, and every widow, may hold the following property exempt from execution, attachment, or sale for any debt, damage, fine, or amercement, to wit: . . ."

"Sec. 19. Any resident of this territory, who is the head of a family, and not the owner of a homestead, may hold exempt from levy and sale real and personal property to be selected by such person, his agent or attorney, at any time before sale, not exceeding $500 in value, in addition to the amount of chattel property otherwise by law exempted."

"Sec. 10. This act shall be so construed as to apply to all species of indebtedness, against exempted property, except taxes. . . ." Laws 1887, p. 72.

The act of the legislature under which this assignment was made and authorized provides as follows, to wit:

"Sec. 35. All property, both real and personal, exempt from execution under the laws of this territory shall not be conveyed by deed of assignment, and if enumerated therein shall not pass to the assignee, but shall be reserved for the benefit of the assignor, or his family, to be set off and appraised by the appraiser mentioned in the first part of this act." Laws 1889, p. 158.

The quotation of the last statute is given in full, to show that the appellants lost none of their rights by the deed of assignment, if any they had under the exemption statute. And this leaves for determination the proposition contended for by counsel for appellants with much force and seriousness, which is, Can each and every member of an insolvent partnership, who is a resident of the territory, the head of a family, and not the owner of a homestead, claim and hold out of the partnership assets of the insolvent firm $500, or the equivalent in property? We think not. Appellants contend in their brief in support of this proposition that property owned by a debtor as a member of a partnership is alike within the letter and spirit of the exemption laws. The language of the act should be construed in harmony with its humane and remedial purpose. Its design was to shield the poor, and not to strip them. The interest it assumes to protect is that belonging to the debtor, be it more or less. Whatever it be, within the limitations of the statute, the debtor's interest is exempt, in view of his own necessity, and of the probable destitution to which its loss might reduce the family depending on him for support. Freeman, in his work on Executions (§ 231), says: "It often happens that property designated as exempt by statute belongs to two or more persons, either as cotenants or copartners. The question then arises whether this property must be treated as exempt to the same extent as if held in severalty,"—and says that "cotenants and copartners have been placed on the same footing in a majority of the states, and both have been given the full benefit of the exemption laws. This position, even where the words of the statute do not clearly indicate an intent to deal with undivided interests, is made tenable by the general rule that these statutes must be liberally construed, so as to promote the policy on which they are based, and accomplish the purposes to which they are directed." The proposition stated here, that the question had been so decided by a majority of the states, may have been true at the time the text was written; but it is not true at this time, as it will be found on an examination that a majority of the state courts and Federal courts have held that partnership property is in the nature of a trust fund, and held for the benefit of the creditors of the partnership, and that the partners cannot claim and hold exemptions out of the partnership assets. In support of the propositions stated by Mr. Freeman, supra, and contended for by the appellants, the following citations are made: Stewart v. Brannen, 37 N. Y. 350, 93 Am. Dec. 578; Gilman v. Williams, 7 Wis. 329, 76 Am. Dec. 219; Skinner v. Shannon, 44 Mich. 86, 38 Am. Rep. 232; McCoy v. Brennan, 61 Mich. 362; Waite v. Mathews, 50 Mich. 392. In Skinner v. Shannon, supra, the court says: "That the several members of a copartnership come within the language of the statute and Constitution, there should be no question, and that they, by becoming members of a firm, do not place themselves beyond the pale of the reason of the law, would seem clear. The same reason which exists for protecting an individual engaged in carrying on business would seem to apply with equal force to each and every member of a firm. The whole object of the law is to prevent a person from being stripped of all means of carrying on his business, and in this respect no distinction can exist between those who are members of a firm and those who are not. . . . The creditor, in selling goods to an individual, knows that a certain portion of his debtor's property is not, and will not be, subject to his demands. And so, if he sells to a firm, and the firm or each member thereof is entitled to a statutory exemption, the creditor sells in view of the hazard." In the case of Blanchard v. Paschal, 68 Ga. 32, 45 Am. Rep. 474, which is similar in all respects to the case at bar, the court says: "The theory of the plaintiff in error is that the partnership property must go to the payment of the partnership debts, before any individual interest can exist, whereas, in fact and in law, the individual members of the firm are the real owners of the partnership property. And although the law directs how debts shall be paid, it never loses sight of the fact that a partnership is made up of individuals who own the assets." It will be seen on a careful examination of all the authorities in support of this proposition that the courts so holding have apparently ignored a well-settled principle of law; that is, that the assets of an insolvent firm is a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors of the firm. This position is supported by Federal as well as state authorities, in a long line of well-reasoned cases, as well as by a number of text-writers. "The joint property is deemed a trust fund, primarily to be applied to the discharge of the partnership debts against all persons not having a higher equity. A long series of authorities (as has been truly said) has established this equity of the joint creditors, to be worked out through the medium of the partners; that is to say, the partners have a right, inter se, to have the partnership property first applied to the discharge of the partnership debts, and no partner has any right except to his own share of the residue; and the joint creditors are, in case of insolvency, substituted in equity to the rights of the partners, as being the ultimate cestuis que trustent of the fund to the extent of the joint debts." Story, Eq. Jur. 5th ed. § 1253; 5 Kent, Com. 86. "Whenever, a partnership becoming insolvent, a court of equity takes possession of its property, it recognizes the fact that in equity the partnership creditors have a right to payment out of those funds in preference to individual creditors, as well as superior to any claims of the partners themselves. And the partnership property is, therefore, sometimes said, not inaptly, to be held in trust for the partnership creditors." Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & I. Co. 150 U. S. 885, 37 L. ed. 1117. "It has repeatedly been determined, both in the British and American courts, that the property or effects of a partnership belong to the firm and not to the partners, each of whom is entitled only to a share of what may remain after payment of the partnership debts and after a settlement of the accounts between the partners; consequently that no greater interest can be derived from a voluntary sale of his interest by one partner, or by a sale of it under execution. In Taylor v. Fields, 4 Ves. Jr. 396, it was said, that a party coming into the right of a partner, . . . 'comes into nothing more than an interest in the partnership, which cannot be tangible, cannot be made available, or be delivered but under an account between the partnership and the partner, and it is an item in the account that enough must be left for the partnership debts.'" Fourth Nat. Bank v. New Orleans & O.R. Co. 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 624, 20 L. ed. 83. "It is a rule, too well settled to be now called in question, that the interest of each partner in the partnership property is his share in the surplus, after the partnership debts are paid; and that surplus only, is liable for the separate debts of such partner." United States v. Hack, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 271, 8 L. ed. 941; Murill v. Neill, 49 U. S. 8 How. 414, 12 L. ed. 1185. There seems to be no doubt at this time but that the partnership assets of an insolvent firm constitute a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors of the partnership. And the only way in which individual partners of the insolvent firm could avail themselves of an exemption out of the partnership assets, before the partnership debts are paid, would be by a direct statutory remedy, and we have no such statute here. It is true that in the case of Stewart v. Brown, 37 N. Y. 350, 98 Am. Dec. 578, the court held that, where the word "person" was in the statute, it meant "persons" in the plural, and that construction was given because of a general statute in that state. And, while we have a statute to the same effect (Comp. Laws 1884, § 2614), such a construction as placed upon the statute by the court in the case above cited is, in our opinion, unwarranted, in the face of the authorities above cited. Bates, in his work on the Law of Partnerships (§ 1181), says: "On execution against the partnership property on judgment for a partnership debt, no exemption or homestead is allowed either to the partnership as a body or to the individual members thereof, out of the joint assets. The partnership as a body cannot claim it because the homestead and exemption statutes apply to several and not to joint claims, and the partnership is neither an entirety, an individual, nor the head of a family. An individual partner cannot claim it, because no partner has a proprietorship in any specific chattel, his interest being a share in the surplus after payments of debts and copartners' claims,"—but that "the contrary rule prevails in Georgia, Michigan, New York, North Carolina, Texas, and Wisconsin." In the case of Re Handlin, 8 Dill. 290, Circuit Judge Dillon says: "There is no exemption to the firm, as such; nor is it contended that there can be. But each of the partners claims an individual exemption to the amount of $2,000 out of the firm property, and at the expense of the firm creditors; and if the claim is valid, it would be equally so if there were six partners, instead of two. . . . While the adjudged cases relating to the question under consideration are not uniform, a careful examination of all of them justifies me in saying that they are quite decisively against the proposition that individual exemptions can be allowed out of the partnership estate, at the expense of the joint creditors." The supreme court of Kansas, in a very able opinion, in the case of Guptil v. McFee, 9 Kan. 30, says: "But if we adopt the theory, which is the true one, that the exemption is in favor of individuals only, and not in favor of copartnerships or corporations, we are equally led to the conclusion that partnership property is not exempt from execution." And in Pond v. Kimball, 101 Mass. 107, the supreme court of that state, as early as 1869, held that, "property belonging to the firm cannot be said to belong to either partner as his separate property. He has no exclusive interest in it. It belongs as much to his partner as it does to him, and cannot in whole or in part be appropriated (so long as it remains undivided) to the benefit of his family. It may be wholly contingent and uncertain whether any of it will belong to him on the winding up of the business and the settlement of his account with the firm." There is almost a limitless number of adjudicated cases supporting this doctrine, both Federal and state, and it is only necessary to cite a few in addition to those already referred to: McCrimmon v. Linton, 4 Colo. App. 420; Aiken v. Steiner, 98 Ala. 355; Richardson v. Adler, 46 Ark. 43; Kingsley v. Kingsley, 39 Cal. 665; State, Peck, v. Bowden, 18 Fla. 17; Ex parte Hopkins, 104 Ind. 157; Hoyt v. Hoyt, 69 Iowa, 174; Terry v. Berry, 13 Nev. 514; Short v. McGruder, 22 Fed. Rep. 46; Hawley v. Hampton, 160 Pa. 18.

A long list of Federal decisions are cited by counsel for appellee receiver from the bankrupt register in support of these authorities.

If the contention made by the appellants is sound,—that each of the partners of an insolvent copartnership is, under the statute, entitled to claim and have an exemption of $500 out of the partnership assets at the expense of the partnership creditors, as the equivalent of his homestead, when he is not the owner of one,—then it is sound as to any number and all the copartners under like circumstances; and if one member of the copartnership furnishes all the capital, and the others conduct the business as profit partners only, and contract partnership obligations, and become insolvent, then each of the profit partners would be entitled to an exemption out of the assets at the expense, first, of the partnership creditors, and, secondly, at the expense of the partners who furnished all of the capital for the enterprise or business, if he should happen to have private property out of which the partnership debts could be collected; thus affording the profit partners an opportunity to secure and hold the exemptions out of the property in which they never had any interest, and out of a business in which they never invested a dollar of their own money. Such a proposition is neither sound in morals nor in law. There is no principle of the law better settled than that partnership assets must first be applied to the payment of partnership debts. And to attempt to establish any other rule would be to encourage the thriftless and unscrupulous at the expense of the fruits of honest labor, and would be contrary to business principles, and tend to destroy commercial confidence. Suppose one partner had put into the business three fourths, and the other one fourth; it would be clearly unjust and inequitable to hold that he who had put into the business only one fourth of the capital should be permitted to withdraw from the firm assets an equal moiety with him who had invested three fourths of the capital; and, if the principle contended for is sound with respect to any partnership, it is sound with all partnerships.

It is contended by appellants' counsel, with considerable force, that statutes allowing exemptions should be and are construed with great liberality in favor of the "poor debtors." That, no doubt, is true, and it is the proper construction; but this is not the class of cases requiring a liberal or sympathetic construction, because common experience of every-day life teaches that in perhaps a majority of the cases of insolvency the members of the insolvent firm, while doing a thriving business on the capital of their creditors, live in opulence, contract obligations with that other class of people known as "poor creditors," who are unable to lose the results of their honest toil for the benefit of those who have lived in luxury while holding themselves out to the world as amply and financially responsible for all their obligations, and then make a deed of assignment, and, as if by the hand of the magician, they are converted into "poor debtors," and raise the alarm that they are being pursued and oppressed by their creditors. Our statute is fairly liberal in providing exemptions to the poor and needy. It exempts a homestead to the heads of families, to the amount of $1,000, and the proceeds of the homestead when sold to that extent for one year, and other personal property amounting to several hundred dollars, and the personal earnings of the debtor, or his minor child or children, for three months, and it is this class of debtors upon whom the law always sheds its mantle of charity in its protecting care of the weak against the strong, and in whose favor the law is, and should always be, construed liberally.

There was no error in the court below in refusing to grant the prayer for exemptions as prayed for by the appellants, and for the foregoing reasons the judgment of the Lower Court is affirmed. And it is so ordered.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

George W. McCONNELL.

v.

David LEMLEY, App't.

(49 La. Ann. —.)

*1. A member of a surprise party visiting the house of a friend for the purpose of spending an evening in social amusement, sustaining injury by means of a falling gallery.—Held, that she cannot recover damages of the owner of the building, who had leased it as a place of residence to the friend whose house the party visited.

*2. Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 670, 2322, must be construed together as laws in pari materia; and, being thus construed, they exclusively relate to the injuries which may be inflicted by falling walls, or materials composing them, upon neighbors or passers-by, and not to those resulting to occupants of the buildings, or guests therein assembled.

(April 6, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff's daughter which were alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

*Headnotes by WATKINS, J.

NOTE.—Liability of landlord for injuries to tenant's guests and servants from defects in premises.

McCONNELL v. LEMLEY and STENBERG v. WILCOX, although somewhat distinguishable on their facts, are not decided squarely upon this distinction. And they contain expressions which indicate that the courts by which they were decided entertain somewhat different views of the law which should govern them. In McCONNELL v. LEMLEY the court says: "The guests of the tenant have no claim against the landlord for damages they have sustained while on the premises." In STENBERG v. WILCOX the court makes the express or implied knowledge of the guest as to the defect a material element in the consideration of the landlord's liability. It appears to be the first case in which that element has appeared. The person whom the tenant invites upon the premises is universally regarded as so far identified with the tenant that his right of recovery against the landlord is the same that the tenant's right would be had the accident happened to him. The guest is regarded not as a stranger with independent rights. Consequently the question whether or not the guest knew or might have known of the defect has been treated as immaterial.

Duty the same towards tenant and tenant's guest or servant.

In Bowe v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 380, 44 Am. Rep. 471, which was an action by the wife of the tenant for injuries caused by a defect in the premises, the court says persons who occupy by permission of the tenant or as members of his family cannot be considered as occupying by invitation of the landlord, so as to create a greater liability on the part of the landlord to them than to the tenant.

In Cole v. McKey, 68 Wis. 500, 37 Am. Rep. 203, which was the case of an injury in a common pas-

Meurs. James Wilkinson, R. H. Lea, and Farrar, Jonas, & Kruttschnitt, for appellant:

Article 2322 of the Civil Code provides that "the owner of a building is answerable for the damage occasioned by its ruin, when this is caused by neglect to repair it, or when it is the result of a vice in its original construction."

This article applies, and was intended to apply, only to passengers on the public highways and to neighbors, and it was not intended to apply to persons voluntarily entering private premises, and there suffering an injury.

This is the necessary result of a comparison of article 2322 with article 670 of the Civil Code.

Camp v. Church of St. Louis, 7 La. Ann. 825.

At common law, both the authorities and the text-writers are in our favor.

Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 96 N. Y. 245, 50 Am. Rep. 659; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 711, p. 598; Buswell, Personal Injuries, p. 124; Whittaker's Smith, Neg. pp. 83, 84.

The French authorities sustain the same view.

Fuzier Herman, Code Annoté, Commentary on C. N. art. 1886, No. 16, and authorities there cited, including particularly: Demolombe, Vol. 31, No. 659; Aubry & Rau, vol. 4, p. 772, § 448, note 14; Larombière, Commentary on article 1889, No. 3; Laurent, Vol. 20, No. 644.

anyway, the court says the rightful subtenant, servant, employee, or even customer of the lessee is in the same condition as to right to recover for injuries that the tenant is, because he enters under the same title and hence assumes the same risks.

In Martin v. Richards, 155 Mass. 361, in which the action was by the tenant, his wife, and the administrator of his deceased child, the court says it is agreed that the same disposition is to be made of the three cases, and therefore the court treats the cases as an action by the tenant alone.

In Minor v. Sharon, 113 Mass. 477, 27 Am. Rep. 122, minor children of the tenant sued for injuries caused by their contracting small pox, with which the tenement was infected to the knowledge of the landlord, but which fact he did not communicate to the tenant. The action by the children was tried with the action by the father for a similar cause, and the court places the liability on the same ground, and approves a finding in favor of plaintiffs.

In Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, 7 Am. Rep. 548, although the injury was to the wife of the tenant, the husband was joined as plaintiff in the action, and the court treats the case as one of landlord and tenant.

Landlord not generally liable.

Invited guests of a tenant must seek their remedy against him, and not against the landlord, for injuries caused by defective repair of the leased premises. Marshall v. Heard, 59 Tex. 206.

If a guest enters and while upon the premises is injured without his own fault by some defect in the premises he must seek his damages from him whose invitation impliedly assured him he could enter safely, and who alone is responsible for the defect which caused the injury. In such a case the guest can have no greater claim against the lessor

Even as to passengers and neighbors, the owner of a building is answerable for the damages occasioned by its ruin only where it is caused by his neglect to repair it, or when it is the result of a vice in its original construction.

Burton v. Davis, 15 La. Ann. 448; Civ. Code, art. 2822.

Even a subtenant cannot acquire greater rights than the tenant.

Talley v. Alexander, 10 La. Ann. 627; Norton v. Ormsby, 1 Mart. N. S. 875.

Any person entering upon the premises enters either under the contract of lease, or as a trespasser.

Upon the first hypothesis, the rights of such person cannot be greater than those of the tenant. Upon the second, there is no privity of contract between the person entering and the owner of the property, and if the person entering be injured, he, or she, must look to the person with whom he or she had an implied contract as to his or her safety as a guest.

O'Connor v. Illinois O. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 339.

The tenant cannot recover damages by reason of the failure of the landlord to make repairs, when the rent is sufficient to enable the lessee to make them, because in such a case the lessee is authorized to make them himself and to deduct the cost from the rent.

Lewis v. Pepin, 33 La. Ann. 1417; Caldwell v. Snow, 8 La. Ann. 892; Pesant v. Heatt, 22 La. Ann. 292; Diggs v. Maury, 23 La. Ann. 59; Larguier v. White, 29 La. Ann. 156; Laurence v. Letièvre, Manning's Unreported Cases, p. 11.

than the lessee himself and the members of his family have. McKenzie v. Cheatham, 3 Me. 543.

In Jaffe v. Harteau, 56 N. Y. 398, 15 Am. Rep. 438, where the plaintiff, wife of a sublessee of the property, was injured by an explosion of a water boiler on the property, the court held the landlord not liable, the evidence showing that there was no reason to believe that the owner knew of the unsafe condition of the boiler. The court says the owner of a building is not, in the absence of fraud or any agreement to that effect, liable to the tenant or others lawfully on the premises by his authority for their condition, or bound to see that they may be safely and conveniently used for the purposes for which they are apparently intended.

Although the landlord puts fixtures in a store in an unsafe manner, and neglects to remedy the defect when notified of it by the tenant, he will not be liable for injuries to the tenant's customer caused by the defect, since the remedy of the customer is solely against the one who invited him into the dangerous place. Burdick v. Cheadle, 28 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767.

The owner of property leased for business purposes is not, in the absence of covenant in the lease, bound to repair the premises, and therefore is not liable to the employee of the tenant for injuries caused by defects in a stairway used in connection with the premises. Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58.

Where the daughter of a lessee who had covenanted to keep the premises in repair was injured by the falling of a veranda, the court held that she could not be considered a stranger, and had no right of action against the lessor for the injury so received. Mehr v. McNab, 24 Ont. Rep. 653.

Defect in premises when let.

A landlord who lets a house in a dangerous state

Messrs. Frank E. Rainold and A. G. Brice for appellee.

Watkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff seeks to recover $10,000 damages of the defendant, as owner of the house at the corner of Julia and St. Charles streets, in the city of New Orleans, it being at the time occupied as a residence by one W. H. Burgess as his tenant, under the following circumstances, as related in his petition, viz.: "On the 16th November, 1894, Burgess entertained a party of friends at his home. They had come as a 'surprise party,' and were welcomed by Burgess as guests. Among them was the daughter of plaintiff, and she was made welcome by the host and his wife. A little after 1 o'clock, Miss Virgie McConnell was standing on the veranda or gallery that surrounded the dwelling, and on which a number of doors opened. She had stepped upon the gallery for the purpose of enjoying the fresh air, as the evening was a warm one, while the other young ladies were putting on their hats, preparatory to leaving. While she was standing on this gallery, which was a structure extending along both the Julia and St. Charles street sides of the house, being about 12 feet wide, with a railing encircling it, the fire bells rang, and about a dozen of the guests came out to watch the fire engine pass. The engine house was nearly opposite, and they viewed the preparations of the firemen, and departure of the engine out Julia street, towards the woods. . . . The engine had scarcely crossed St.

is not liable to his tenant's customers or guests for accidents happening in consequence during the term. Robbins v. Jones, 15 C. B. N. S. 221, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 1, 10 Jur. N. S. 229, 9 L. T. N. S. 523, 12 Week. Rep. 248.

In Burchell v. Hickson, 50 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 101, plaintiff, a child four years old, went with his sister to a house which had been let without any agreement as to repair, and fell through a broken rail at the top of a flight of steps and was injured. The court does not discuss the question of liability as between defendant and the tenant, but places its ruling for defendant upon the ground that defendant never invited such a person as plaintiff to come to the premises without an attendant, and if he had an attendant there was no concealed danger, which alone would render defendant liable.

In Ten Broeck v. Wells, F. & Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 639, where the plaintiff, a guest at a hotel, received an injury by falling from the front steps because of the absence of a railing, and sued the owner of the hotel, who had leased it to a third person, the court held that the defect being patent the risk was assumed by the guest, and she could not recover for injuries caused by it.

The owner of a building leased to a tenant who occupies it is not liable for injuries to a person who is injured by falling down an embankment while walking from the street to the house for the purpose of transacting business with the tenant, although the premises were in that condition when they were leased. Mellen v. Morrill, 126 Mass. 545, 30 Am. Rep. 655.

The landlord is not "able to any person entering under the title of the tenant or upon the premises by his invitation, where there is no agreement to repair and he has not been guilty of any fraud or concealment as to the safe condition of the prem-

Charles street before the section of the gallery upon which Miss McConnell, with about seven or eight other guests, was standing, suddenly gave way and fell, and precipitated her and others to the hard flag pavement of the sidewalk, a distance of about 18 feet. Two others fell on top of her. Her right leg was broken above the knee, and she was bruised all over the body. She remained six weeks in bed in the Charity Hospital, suffering excruciating pains and agony; and she could not walk without a crutch for months after the accident. After healing, her injured leg was found to be shorter than the uninjured one. Dr. Schmitt, who had not measured the extent of the shortening, thought it was between $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ inch. Dr. E. J. Graner, who made a critical examination, testified that it was about $\frac{1}{2}$ inch. Both physicians concur in pronouncing the injury permanent, and that Miss McConnell will be a cripple for life. She will always limp. The cause of the falling of the gallery was fully proved. It was rotten to such an extent that no repairs could have rendered it safe. The inspector of public buildings of the city of New Orleans, Mr. Peeler, made an examination of that portion of the structure that did not give away, and ordered it torn down, as dangerous to human life."

Admitting his ownership of the premises in question and the lease of Burgess, the defendant, for answer, avers that it was rented for the uses and purposes of a residence, and was in thoroughly good condition at the time the accident happened, and that it was amply safe for its usual, ordinary, and contemplated purposes; that there was no defect in said gallery which was apparent to an observer, and that he had effected all the repairs which were necessary a short time before the accident, and, if any further repairs were desired, it was the duty of the tenant to have notified him to make same, and, in default of his so doing, to have made same, and deducted the cost from the amount of rent due or to become due. He denies that plaintiff's daughter went on the premises with the knowledge or consent of himself, or even with the request or at invitation of his tenant. He avers that his tenant possessed and used the gallery daily, and, had same been in the dangerous condition it is represented to have been, it would have been the duty of the tenant to have warned the young people composing the surprise party of the danger there was of crowding thereon, as they are admitted to have done; that the proximate cause of the accident and of the injury which was inflicted upon plaintiff's daughter was the sudden rushing of the dozen of young ladies out upon the gallery simultaneously, same not having underneath any proper and suitable support, as is usual when it is expected to be resorted to by an unusual assembly of persons. As matter of law it was contended by the defendant's counsel: That the precept of our Code which provides that the owner of a building is answerable for the damage occasioned by its ruin, when this is caused by neglect to repair it (Rev. Civil Code, § 2322), applies only to passers-by upon the public highway and to neighbors, and not to persons voluntarily entering upon private premises, and there suffering, and the defects in the premises are obvious. Harpel v. Fall (Minn.) 65 N. W. 913.

A landlord is not liable for injuries caused by a fall of a child of a subtenant by reason of the absence of a fence between the property and the street when the fence was removed before the beginning of the term during which the injury occurred. Peterson v. Smart, 70 Mo. 34.

In Moyrhan v. Allyn, 163 Mass. 270, which was a case of an injury on a platform used in common by all the occupants of a tenement building, the court refused to permit a recovery on the ground that the defect was patent and in the same condition when the lease was made, and that it was the duty of the tenant to provide against injuries upon it.

The owner of a building is not liable for injuries to a child of his tenant which were caused by its attempted use of a fire escape as a balcony. McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126, 26 Am. Rep. 555.

But in the trial court there had been a recovery by plaintiff upon the ground that the fire escape was required by statute, and therefore the landlord was liable for not providing a safe one. McAlpin v. Powell, 1 Abb. N. C. 427.

A child injured by falling from a window upon a roof and through an unprotected skylight therein cannot recover therefor against the landlord, although the landlord owed the duty of maintaining the roof in a safe condition for the tenant to hang clothes over. Miller v. Woodhead, 104 N. Y. 471.

A landlord is not liable for the death of a child of a visitor of his tenant who is drowned in an open hole 58 feet from the rear of the dwelling house, which was dug at tenant's request. Moore v. Logan Iron & S. Co. (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 508.

The owner of an hotel is not liable for injuries to a guest by reason of defects in the walk or platform forming the approach to the building. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mangum, 68 Tex. 342.

The owner of an hotel is not liable to a guest for the fall of an awning known to be unsafe, unless he is bound by the lease to keep the awning in repair. Fellows v. Gilbubier, 82 Wis. 630, 17 L. R. A. 577.

A landlord is not liable to a servant of his tenant for injuries occasioned by a dangerous condition of the premises existing at the time of the lease, although he subsequently promises without a new consideration to repair the premises, if there is no covenant to repair in the lease. Peres v. Rabaud, 76 Tex. 191, 7 L. R. A. 620.

In Lower Canada the landlord is bound to deliver his premises to the tenant in good repair, and the owner of property is liable for injuries caused by its ruin through want of repair, and the wife of a tenant may recover for injuries caused to her soon after taking possession by the giving way of a portion of the building through want of repair. Simmons v. Elliott, Mont. L. R. 5 S. C. 182.

There is a case in one of the lower courts of New York which seems to be out of harmony with the line of authorities upon this question.

The child of a tenant may recover for injuries received by the falling upon it, in the yard, of a large stone which had been left standing perpendicularly against the fence in such a way as to be a trap for children, if it was there when the premises were leased. Schmidt v. Cook, 12 Misc. 449.

If the stone was in the condition described, the defect would certainly be patent, and the tenant and consequently his child would assume the risk.

Effect of concealment by landlord.

If the landlord is guilty of anything like bad faith, so that he leases the premises with a concealed defect upon them, he will be liable for the injuries caused by such defect. What will render him guilty of bad faith has not been fully deter-ing an injury. That a person who thus enters the premises of another by the permission of the tenant is, with respect to the owner, a mere licensee, and sustains a relation to him somewhat like that of a subtenant, and can acquire no greater rights than the principal lessee; and if he enters without permission of the lessee, he is a trespasser, without any privity of contract with respect to the owner, through the medium of the lease. That a tenant cannot recover damages of the landlord by reason of his failure to make repairs, when the arrearages of rent are sufficient to enable the lessee to make them in case of the lessor's failure to make same after he has received due notification of the necessity of same being made. And he avers that at the time of the happening of the accident the tenant was in arrears a sufficient amount to have defrayed the cost of the necessary repairs.

On the trial there was judgment for $2,500 against the defendant, predicated upon the verdict of a jury, from which he has appealed; and in this court plaintiff has demanded that this allowance be increased to $5,000.

The proof at the trial substantially conforms to the foregoing statement pro et con. It shows: That shortly after he rented the premises to Burgess the defendant sent carpenters to the leased premises, with instructions to place it in good order, and that materials were ordered and delivered for that purpose, and used by the carpenters. That all the repairs necessary were voluntarily made by the defendant, and that no demand was subsequently made by the tenant for additional repairs.

Of course if he knows of the concealed defect, and fails to make it known to the tenant, he will be guilty of bad faith. The point which is not settled is whether or not the landlord owes any active duty to search for concealed defects. The idea that he owes such duty seems to have arisen very recently, and very little discussion of the matter is found in the reports. If such duty is found to exist, then it logically follows that if he fails to give the property such examination as a landlord should give his property before renting it for the use to which he knows the tenant will apply it, and such examination would have disclosed the defect, he will be guilty of actionable negligence. This is the rule of reasonable care and diligence which is applied in STENBERG v. WILCOX. But the adoption of that rule immediately raises the further question whether the care required of the landlord for the discovery of defects is greater than that required of the tenant. STENBERG v. WILCOX implies that it is, and is apparently supported by statements in some of the cases. But the old cases applied the rule of caveat emptor to the tenant, and the most that can be said is that the doctrine that the landlord has the duty to search for concealed defects is a new one, recently broached, and has not yet received consideration enough by the courts, at least in cases involving liability to tenant's guests or servants to indicate what rule will be adopted. See note to Hines v. Wilcox, post.

If the premises contain a hidden defect which by reason of its location is likely to cause injury, and the landlord knows of the defect but fails to notify the tenant of it, the landlord will be liable for injuries to the tenant's child which are caused by reason of its presence. Coke v. Gutkese, 80 Ky. 508, 44 Am. Rep. 499.

If the owner of an hotel places therein a chandelier which is hung so insecurely as to be in danger

That at the time of the accident the tenant was in default in making payment of his rent, and was subsequently notified to vacate the leased premises on account of his nonpayment of rent. That the gallery was not in a condition to stand this unusual strain is not denied, but, on the contrary, was generally known among the guests; and that during the course of the evening that the accident happened the visitors were warned and admonished to desist from dancing, as the gallery would not stand the strain it would produce. That, notwithstanding that warning, the guests rushed out on the gallery when the fire bell rang, causing it to give way and fall beneath their accumulated weight, causing the injury complained of to the plaintiff's daughter. Plaintiff's counsel puts his client's right of recovery upon the following provision of our Code, viz.: "The owner of a building is answerable for the damage occasioned by its ruin, when this is caused by neglect to repair it, or when it is the result of a vice in its original construction." Rev. Civil Code, § 2322. And the further provision, viz.: "Every person is responsible for the damage he occasions, not merely by his act, but by his negligence, his imprudence, or his want of skill." Id. § 2316. These provisions of the Code treat of offenses and quasi offenses towards the general public, and they impose upon the owner of a building the general duty of keeping it in such a state of repair and preservation that it will not occasion damage to anyone; and, in case of his failure so to do, they declare that he is answerable in damages to one who shall suffer injury in consequence of his

of falling, but which defect is not patent, he will be liable for injuries to a servant of the lessee who is injured by the fall. Reichenbacher v. Pahlmeyer, 8 Ill. App. 217.

A railroad company over whose tracks another company by virtue of a contract runs its trains, is liable in tort to the latter's brakeman, who, while in the due performance of his duty on the employer's train, receives a personal injury solely by reason of the negligent construction of the owner's station house. The court says it is settled law that when the owner lets premises which are in a condition which is unsafe for the avowed purpose for which they are let, or with a nuisance upon them when let, and receives rent therefor, he is liable, whether in or out of possession, for the injuries which result from their insecurity to persons lawfully upon them. Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 80 Me. 63.

That statement of settled law is true only when applied to one of the exceptions to the rule, and cannot be accepted as an accurate statement of the general liability of the landlord to the tenants, guests, or servants.

A landlord is not liable for injuries to a visitor of his tenant which are caused by a defect in the premises at the time they were leased, unless he knew, or by reasonable diligence might have known, of their dangerous condition. Borman v. Sandgren, 37 Ill. App. 160.

A landlord is not liable to an employee of his lessee for illness caused by defective plumbing where he is not charged with fraud or deceit, or with any more knowledge of the defects than the lessee had. Angevine v. Knox-Goodrich (Cal.) 18 L. R. A. 264.

A landlord is not liable to the employee of a tenant for injuries caused by an explosion of gas in adjoining property owned by him by reason of de-neglect, imprudence, or want of skill. But counsel for the defendant contend that the article first cited must be construed in connection with the provisions of article 670, which are as follows viz.: "Everyone is bound to keep his buildings in repair, so that neither their fall, nor that of any part of the materials composing them, may injure the neighbors or passengers, under the penalty of all losses and damages, which may result from the neglect of the owner in that respect." (Our italics.) These articles have been frequently construed by this court, but in no case of which we are aware have they been applied to a case circumstanced as this case is. They have been construed as applying to persons injured while walking along the street. Hoss v. New Orleans, 12 La. Ann. 481; Barnes v. Beirne, 38 La. Ann. 280; Tucker v. Illinois C. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 114. And they have been applied to persons occupying an adjoining building, who have sustained injuries by reason of another building falling against and demolishing it. Knoop v. Alter, 47 La. Ann. 570; Steppe v. Alter, 48 La. Ann. 363. These are obvious and necessary safeguards the law has provided for the denizens of towns and cities, to whom old and dilapidated or badly designed and constructed buildings are a constant menace while attending to the ordinary and every-day concerns of life. But it is not readily perceptible upon what principle of duty or equity these precepts of the Code are to be extended to the accidental occupants of a house, having no contractual relations with either the proprietor or his tenant. But it must be observed that the articles cited do not rest upon contractual relations at all, but the liability of the owner arises ex delicto alone. He is held liable because he is deemed guilty of a fault in not keeping his building in such a safe condition as it will not do any member of the public an injury. It is the thing which offends, and the owner suffers the consequences of the offense. The imposition of the penalty results from the idea that the faulty or defective building is an invasion of the security that municipal government guarantees to the citizen or wayfarer in the public thoroughfare of the city. This reason and spirit of this rule does not seem to apply to the person who seeks admission to the premises, or who goes there upon the invitation of the owner or tenant, either on business or pleasure; for in such case the ordinary rules of trespass or contract would apply. Visitors are, in a certain sense, members of the family. Looking at the evidence as we have related it, it is manifest that, if the members of the surprise party had passed along the banquette underneath the gallery of defendant's house, and had not entered the building at all, it would not have fallen, and plaintiff's daughter would have suffered no injury; consequently, we must look to some different principle of law on which, if at all, the defendant can be held bound. In our opinion, the guests of the tenant have no claim against the landlord for damages they have sustained while on the premises. The guests of the tenant are not guests of the landlord. During the term of the lease the owner may be said to have, for a consideration, parted with fects in gas fittings put in by a former tenant, where there is nothing to show that the latter was guilty of negligence in having the work done, or that the landlord knew that there were defects in the fittings. Metzger v. Schultz (Ind. App.) 43 N. E. 898.

In Gwinnell v. Eamer, L. R. 10 C. P. 658, 32 L. T. N. S. 836, a person went up to the window of a leased building for the purpose of conversing with another person in the room, and in so doing stepped upon a grating which gave away, and he was injured. It did not appear that the landlord knew of the unsafe condition of the grating and the lease contained a covenant binding the tenant to repair. The court held that the owner was not liable for the injury.

One branch of the question of the landlord's bad faith is the construction of a building which is not sufficient for the use to which it is put.

The owner of a storehouse which was erected under his own superintendence to lease to the United States government is liable to a person whose goods are destroyed by the falling of the building in consequence of its insufficiency for the purpose for which it was erected. Carson v. Godley, 25 Pa. 111, 67 Am. Dec. 404.

That case followed the principle of Godley v. Hagerly, 20 Pa. 387, 59 Am. Dec. 731, which was the case of the fall of a building used for a government storehouse and the injury of a laborer at the time rightfully upon the property.

But in the latter case it appeared that the owner built loosely, carelessly, unskillfully, and negligently, at the same time knowing that the building was to be used as a government storehouse which would require a well-constructed building. Of course such conduct made him guilty of bad faith.

Effect of duty to repair.

The agents of a foreign owner having full charge of a building which they hold for rent, who lease it 34 L. R. A.

with a heavy door on it in a dangerous condition at the same time, promising to put it in a safe condition, will be liable to a person who goes there to deliver goods to the tenant, and who is injured by the falling of the door. Baird v. Shipman, 38 Ill. App. 508.

If the landlord has agreed to keep the premises in repair, and after notice neglects to do so, he will be liable to an employee of the tenant, who is injured by the defect. White v. Sprague, 9 N. Y. S. R. 220.

The owner of a wharf which is let under the agreement that the owner will make the necessary repairs will be liable to a person who goes upon the wharf for the purpose of delivering goods on board a vessel loading at the wharf who is injured by falling into a hole in the planking which is caused by decay and has existed for some time. Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 63 Me. 552, 15 Am. Rep. 508.

In case a tenant sublets a portion of the premises, and the goods of the subtenant are injured by the falling of the walls, he cannot recover of the landlord for the injury unless the landlord had notice or knowledge of the subletting, since he was under no obligation to keep the premises in repair for the subtenant. Donaldson v. Wilson, 60 Mich. 83.

Under the Georgia Code the landlord has the duty of maintaining the premises in repair, and if he permits steps leading to a rented storehouse, and which also lead to his own storehouse, to get out of repair to the injury of one who goes to the storehouse to transact business with the tenant, he will be liable therefor. Archer v. Blalock, 97 Ga. 719.

If the landlord has not been notified by the tenant to repair he cannot be held liable for injuries to a guest of the tenant which were caused by the defective condition of the premises. Ploen v. Staff, 9 Mo. App. 309.

his exercise of the right of ownership. If the tenant be neglectful of the safety of his guests, they have their recourse against him personally, and not against the owner of the building. In such case it is the duty of care the occupant owes his guest, and not the duty the owner of the building owes to the public, that controls the recourse of an injured party. If, on plaintiff's theory, a person, upon invitation of a tenant, should enter any old and dilapidated building, and suffer injury, and the owner would be responsible, the consequences would be disastrous to landlords; for who could afford to lease property under the circumstances, and take the risk of suffering thousands of dollars in damages for the carelessness or imprudence of tenants on their failure to make, as in instant case, some trifling repairs, the cost of which he could have easily reimbursed himself from the arrearages of rent in his hands. We are fully convinced that the articles of the Code on which plaintiff's counsel rely were never intended to govern this kind of a case; and this becomes more evident when we take into consideration the article of the Code which counsel for the defendant has cited as being in pari materia. Counsel has also referred us to several pertinent common-law authorities, but we prefer to rest our decision upon the principles of our own statutes. But if, on the other hand, the members of the surprise party were uninvited, and to be treated and considered as trespassers, or mere licensees, the plaintiff's only recourse must be against the person by whose tacit permission they were on the premises. O'Connor v. Illinois C. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 399; Snyder v. Natchez, R. River & T. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 302. But, in any event, the evidence satisfies our minds that the defendant, as owner of the building, has exonerated himself from liability by making all the repairs which he supposed to have been necessary to the safety and security of the building; and, if any fault there was on his part, the tenant and his guests contributed in some degree to the accident by not desisting from rushing out upon the gallery as they did, after having been warned against the danger of dancing on it. A case for damages is not made out.

It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed, and it is further ordered and decreed that the plaintiff's demands be rejected, at his costs in both courts.

The owner of an hotel is not liable to the guest of the lessee for injuries caused by a fall into an elevator well by reason of a defect in the door spring, although he had agreed to make repairs, if he had no notice of the defect and it was not shown to have existed any length of time. Hutchinson v. Cummings, 156 Mass. 330.

Where the premises were not out of repair when they were leased, and the owner made no covenant to repair, the mere fact that a portion of the outside wall became out of repair and fell on a servant of the tenant will not give him a right of action against the owner of the building for the injuries. Nelson v. Liverpool Brewery Co. L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 311, 46 L. J. C. P. N. S. 675, 25 Week. Rep. 877.

The owner of land which is leased for a lumber shed and a way appurtenant to it is not liable for an injury to a customer of the lessee by reason of a defect in the way. Abbott v. Jackson, 84 Me. 449.

In the absence of covenant by the landlord to repair, he is not liable to a tenant of the lessee for injuries received by reason of the premises becoming out of repair. O'Brien v. Capwell, 59 Barb. 497.

A child of a tenant cannot recover for injuries caused by the giving way of a railing along a piazza which had been constructed for hanging out clothes, if it was in good condition when the lease was made and had been to the knowledge of the tenant gradually decaying until its condition had had become dangerous. Flynn v. Hatton, 48 How. Pr. 383.

If the landlord has paid the tenant to repair the defect, the landlord will not be liable to a visitor of the tenant injured by reason of the defect. Sterger v. Van Stolen, 23 N. Y. S. R. 637.

The landlord who has leased premises to an athletic association is not liable for injuries to a visitor by falling against a glass door upon slipping on a walk between the bath room and the dressing room, although the door is needlessly standing in the passageway, where it does not appear that it was there when the premises were leased. Heath v. Metropolitan Exhibition Co. 33 N. Y. S. R. 823.

The owner of a mill is not liable to an employee of the tenant for injuries caused by defects in the machinery in the mill. Johnson v. Tacoma Cedar Lumber Co. 3 Wash. 723.

A landlord is not liable to a visitor of his tenant for an injury resulting from the condition of the premises caused by the tenant's own act. Eyre v. Jordan, 111 Mo. 424.

If the act of the tenant makes the premises dangerous the owner is not liable to a person employed by the tenant to do work on the premises. Handy-side v. Powers, 145 Mass. 123.

The owner of a building is not liable for injury to an employee of a lessee of one floor who is injured by attempting to pass between a partition erected by the lessee and a shaft placed there by the landlord before the lease, since the act of the lessee, if anything, caused the premises to be unsafe. Ryan v. Wilson, 87 N. Y. 471, 41 Am. Rep. 384, 63 How. Pr. 172, Affirming 12 Jones & S. 273.

The owner of an hotel who gives the lessee the right to complete an uncompleted portion of the building is not liable for injuries to a guest who is injured by defects resulting solely from the improvement. Glass v. Colman, 14 Wash. 635.

Structure for use of public.

There is some tendency by the courts to require greater care and hold the landlord to a stricter liability in case the structure is designed for public use or will be frequented by the public.

Owners of a wharf who let it are liable for injuries to an employee of the tenant who is injured by reason of defects which are not so hidden that they could not have been discovered by such examination as the uses to which the wharf will be placed reasonably require. Wendell v. Baxter, 12 Gray. 494.

The owners of a pier are liable for injuries sustained by reason of its defective construction and dangerous condition, notwithstanding the premises are in possession of the lessee, who has covenanted to keep them in repair if the defects existed when the owners leased the property. Moody v. New York, 43 Barb. 232, 34 How. Pr. 238.

The owner of a wharf who leases it knowing of a defect in it will be liable to one rightfully using the wharf for injuries caused by the defect. Joyce v. Martin, 15 R. I. 553.

James M. WILCOX, Jr.

(36 Tenn. 163.)

A landlord is liable to a boarder on premises leased for a boarding house for injuries sustained by reason of the unsafe and dangerous condition of the premises, which was known to, or might by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence have been known to, the landlord at the time of the lease, but not to the boarder.

thereon for injuries caused by the defect. Swords v. Edgar, 50 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 296.

Where the owner of a wharf leased it to a tenant, and at the time of the lease it was in an unsafe condition, and the owner then knew or could by reasonable diligence have known of such condition, he will be liable to one lawfully thereon for injuries received by reason of such unsafe condition. Albert v. State, Ryan, 66 Md. 325, 59 Am. Rep. 159.

The lessor of a wharf is not liable for injuries to an employee of the lessee caused by defects in the wharf, unless it is shown that he knew or with reasonable care might have known of the existence of the defect when the wharf was leased. State, Bashe, v. Boyce, 78 Md. 469.

But even in these cases the rule governing other cases of the general class has sometimes been applied.

Thus, a lessee of a pier, who has covenanted with the owner to repair and has sublet without any covenant with the subtenant to repair is not liable to a person rightfully on the pier for injuries caused by a defect in the pier which arises after the lease was made. Cianoy v. Byrne, 56 N. Y. 129, 15 Am. Rep. 391.

In Stratton v. Staples, 59 Me. 94, where plaintiff was injured by falling into an unguarded railway communicating with the basement while going into a rented store for the purpose of finding the owner of the building, the owner was held liable for the injury.

A person who builds stores several feet from the sidewalk, and connects them with the walk by a pavement leaving an unguarded opening to admit light to the basement in front of the show window of one store, and leases the store in that condition, will be liable to a person who upon going to look at articles in the window falls into the opening and is injured. Tomie v. Hampton, 129 Ill. 352.

The owner of a building, who has leased it for a public entertainment with an understanding that he shall have control of all receipts at the box office until a certain sum is realized, is liable to a person injured by the fall of the front platform upon which he was standing waiting for the doors to open. *Oxford v. Liability of reversioner.

In Gandy v. Jubber, 5 Best & S. 78, 33 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 151, 10 Jur. N. S. 632, 9 L. T. N. S. 800, 12 Week. Rep. 628, the plaintiff was injured upon turning away from speaking to the tenant who stood in the doorway of her house, by falling through a grated covering over an opening adjoining the footpath of the highway. The court discusses the question of the liability of a reversioner who received the title while the tenant was in possession, but the discussion goes upon the general question of liability, and the fact that plaintiff might have been considered the tenant's guest is not noticed. The court of Queen's bench decided in favor of the plaintiff, but the exchequer chamber (5 Best & S. 485, 13 Week. Rep. 1022) recommended the plaintiff to accept a set processum, which was accordingly done.

Persons who acquire title by descent to a pier during the period of an outstanding lease are not liable for defects in the property, although they existed when the lease was made. Abern v. Steele, 115 N. Y. 208, 5 L. R. A. 449, Reversing 48 Hun, 517.

It was not necessary to show that the landlord had actual knowledge of the defect complained of. His duty was due care, and ignorance was no defense.

The learned trial judge gave the law to the jury in direct conflict with the well and thoroughly established doctrine of both the American and English courts.

Messrs. R. McPhail Smith and R. T. Smith, for appellee:

The responsibility of a landlord for the condition of the premises is different in different cases:

1. To strangers—third persons—the public—synonymous terms.
2. To the tenant and those upon the premises by the tenant's license or invitation.
3. In exceptional cases of fraudulent concealment or culpable negligence as to defects not ascertainable by the tenant by ordinary care in examining the premises.
4. Property public in character, such as railroads, docks, wharves, piers, places of public entertainment.

Contributory negligence.

A guest of a tenant, who after dark attempts to go along a passageway to the rear of the house without knowing what is there, while the building is in a dilapidated condition, is guilty of such negligence that he cannot recover from the owner if he is injured by falling down some steps which are out of repair. Kammerer v. Gallagher, 58 Ill. App. 561.

The owner of property upon the rear of which are leased buildings is not liable for injuries to a visitor to one of the buildings who attempts to reach it by going through an unfinished house upon the front of the lot, where he provided a way through an adjoining lot and subsequently opened an alley along the front of the house, although the alley was temporarily closed at the time the visitor attempted to go through the house. Boulston v. Clark, 3 R. D. Smith, 366.

Portion of building in landlord's possession.

If the owner of the building is himself using and exercising control over the portion of the building which is defective, he will be liable for injuries to employees of the lessee. Poor v. Sears, 154 Mass. 530.

But the rule in that class of cases is entirely distinct from that in those cases where the entire premises are in possession of the tenant. The cases upon this subject are collected in a note to Jones v. Millsaps (Miss.) 23 L. R. A. 155.

Dangerous agency on adjoining premises.

If the landlord collects a large body of water

While there is no implied warranty of safety by the lessor of private buildings, there is in the lease of buildings meant to be used for public exhibitions; the lessor holding out here to the public that the structure is safe for its purpose, and being bound to use all reasonable precautions to protect those who attend from all known imperfections.

Ruger, Ch. J., in Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 260, 50 Am. Rep. 659; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 33, 17 Am. Rep. 295.

The cases at bar belong to class 2.

The landlord is liable to strangers, third persons—the public for injuries from a nuisance which he has leased. This rule does not belong to the law of landlord and tenant.

Penruddock's Case, 5 Coke, 100b; Ahern v. Steele, 115 N. Y. 203, 5 L. R. A. 449; Gandy v. Jubber, 5 Best & S. 78; Rosewell v. Prior, 2 Salk. 460; Todd v. Flight, 9 C. B. N. S. 377; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295; Godley v. Hagerty, 20 Pa. 387, 59 Am. Dec. 731; Carson v. Godley, 26 Pa. 111, 67 Am. Dec. 404; Jessen v. Sveigert, 66 Cal. 182; Albert v. State, Ryan, 66 Md. 325, 59 Am. Dec. 159; Waggoner v. Jermaine, 8 Denio, 506, 45 Am. Dec. 474; Durant v. Palmer, 29 N. J. L. 544.

Specimens of cases belonging to class 3, are: Cesar v. Karutz, 60 N. Y. 229, 19 Am. Rep. 164, where the landlord concealed from the tenant that the premises were infected with small pox; Minor v. Sharon, 113 Mass. 477, 27 Am. Rep. 122, a similar case, and Coke v. Gutkese, 80 Ky. 598, 44 Am. Rep. 499, based on the landlord's actual knowledge of the defect of the premises and neglect to warn the tenant, who could not, by ordinary care, ascertain the given defect.

In this class of cases, where the landlord has the knowledge of dangerous defects not ascerupon premises adjoining the leased property, and keeps it so negligently that it escapes and destroys the leased house, he will be liable for injuries to a guest of the tenant who is at the time upon the leased property. Denance Water Co. v. Olinger (Ohio) 32 L. R. A. 736.

In the rehearing opinion of STENBERG v. WILLCOX, which is reported with the case of Hines v. Willcox, post.—the court says the landlord's liability, leaving the contract of lease out of view, is the same to the tenant as to his servant, or his guest, or his customer, or his wife or child, or to the stranger passing along the streets or on the premises for any legitimate purpose. The force of the clause "leaving the contract of lease out of view" is not just apparent, but from the general tenor of the opinions it would seem that the court intends to state that the liability of the landlord to his tenant or the tenant's guest, in the absence of any express provision in the lease upon the question, is the same as his liability to a stranger passing along the street. If that is the intention it is certainly not supported by the authorities, as will be seen by reference to the citations in the present note and in the notes to Lee v. McLaughlin (Me.) 26 L. R. A. 197, and Hines v. Willcox, post.—There is a very marked distinction between the liability of the landlord to the tenant or the person on the premises under the tenant's title and to the person passing along the street. See note upon liability for fall of building or walls to Ryder v. Kinsey (Minn.) ante, 557.

H. P. F.

tainable by the tenant, by ordinary care, and conceals or negligently omits to disclose them, he is liable to anybody who is injured by reason of them.

The transaction involved in this case was the renting of an ordinary dwelling house the back porch of which was defective, but this was unknown to the landlord and his agents, though probably ascertainable by an examination with ordinary care. The inmates swore they had no idea it was dangerous, after living there eleven months. Their next-door neighbor swore that the porch could be seen from an upper window to pull away from the house, and that she repeatedly warned them of its condition.

The case was not one of hidden defects known to, and concealed by, the landlord.

There is no implied covenant that the demised premises are fit for occupation, or for the particular use which the tenant means to make of them.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case and the result of the trial in the court below, are the same, substantially, as in the case of Hines v. Wilcox, 96 Tenn. 148, post, —, except that the plaintiff, Mrs. Stenberg, was a boarder in the house which Mrs. Hines occupied as a tenant of defendant, Wilcox. She was injured at the same time and by the same accident as that which resulted in the injury to Mrs. Hines. The plain-tiffs have appealed, and assigned errors. The same errors are assigned as in the Hines Case, and others especially applicable to this, and not to that, case.

We need not go over the ground already occupied in that case, but merely content ourselves with saying that, if plaintiffs can recover at all in this case, it must be upon the ground that the landlord leased premises in a dangerous and unsafe condition, when he knew, or might, by the exercise of reasonable diligence and care, have known, of such unsafe condition, and upon the further ground that plaintiffs did not know of such unsafe condition, and could not have known of it by the exercise of reasonable diligence and care, and not upon any contract between the defendant and Mrs. Hines, of which Mrs. Stenberg may have known nothing, and to which she was not a party.

The court charged the jury that "if an owner of a building leases it while it is in a dangerous condition, he is liable to persons injured on account thereof, provided such persons stand upon their rights strictly as third persons. For illustration, if a house be rented where the wall fronting on a street is in a decayed and defective condition, and during the time of the lease it falls upon a passer-by in the street, then the owner is liable for injuries so sustained. But those who claim upon the ground that they were invited into a dangerous place must seek their remedy against the party extending the invitation. If they are guests of the tenant, or boarders of the tenant, then the tenant, not the owner, must be held liable for injuries to such persons, even though the defects existed when the lease was made. The reason of this is [continues the learned judge] that such persons would never have suffered injury from the defects, if they had not entered the premises, and such entry was not made at either the request or invitation of the owner, but upon the invitation of the tenant, who holds herself out to the public as a keeper of a boarding or lodging house." The language is substantially the same as in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (§ 711), but the same authors say, in the same section: "If the landlord lets the place for a purpose for which he knows, or ought to know, it to be unfit, knowing that strangers will be invited there, it has been held that he is liable to them." And the same authors say (§ 709): "Even the entire surrender of control over land to a lessee does not relieve the owner from liability to third persons for defects which existed in it when he parted with its control—not even if the tenant has agreed to make repairs, etc. It clearly appears by the proof in this case that the defendant knew the premises were to be used as a boarding house, recommended it for this purpose, and urged its location, near the Union Depot, as a desirable feature for this purpose. The court also charged: "It is admitted in this case that the plaintiffs were boarders with the tenant when injured; and, in consequence, there is no liability to them, upon the part of defendant, upon the ground that he rented premises while in a dangerous and defective condition. So, as to that theory of the case, you will not inquire, but will find for the defendant." These charges are assigned as errors, among others. Upon the legal questions raised by these assignments, the able counsel have furnished elaborate arguments, and have cited many authorities.

In the case of Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295, the owners, and not the lessee, of a pier used in unloading vessels, were held liable for injuries sustained by a longshoreman by reason of defects which existed at the time of the lease. The court held that the plaintiff, being in the employ of the vessel, was there by invitation, and was entitled to the protection which would result from having the pier in an ordinary state of strength and security. In Albert v. State, Bryan, 66 Md. 325, 59 Am. Rep. 159, plaintiff's parents were drowned by reason of the defectiveness of a wharf in the occupation of defendant's tenant. The jury were charged that if they found "that the defendant was the owner of the wharf, and that he rented it out to a tenant, and that at the time of the renting the wharf was unsafe, and defendant knew, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have known, of its unsafe condition, and that the accident happened in consequence of such condition, the plaintiff was entitled to recover." Approved on appeal as correct. In Godley v. Hagerty, 20 Pa. 387, 59 Am. Rep. 781 (approved in Carson v. Godley, 26 Pa. 111, 67 Am. Dec. 404), it was held that where the owner of real estate erected thereon a row of buildings, with the intention of renting them to the government as a bonded warehouse, and with the knowledge that they would be obliged to stand very great weight, he was liable in damages for an injury to a person employed in one of the storehouses, occasioned by its fall, after having been so rented, though the immediate cause of the accident was the storage of heavy merchandise in the upper story; it appearing that the building had been constructed on defective plans, and of insufficient strength. See also cases collected and digested in Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, Personal pp. 48-53. In Waggoner v. Jermaine, 8 Denio, 306, 45 Am. Dec. 474, it was held that the seller of premises upon which a nuisance existed at the time of sale was liable on the ground that the nuisance existed when the conveyance was made: and the same principle is recognized in Suttonsall v. Banker, 9 Gray, 105, where the court said that if the nuisance existed at the time of the lease the landlord would be liable. And in Durant v. Palmer, 29 N. J. L. 545, the landlord was held liable for a nuisance arising from the structure of the building. Camp v. Wood, 76 N. Y. 92, 32 Am. Rep. 282, was a case where defendant owned an inn or boarding house. In the third story was a hall, which he rented out to certain parties, who used it for the purpose of giving a dance. Plaintiff bought a ticket, and attended the ball. He left about 11 o'clock at night, somewhat under the influence of liquor, and instead of going to the ground floor, leading to the street, he walked out through an open door on to the top of a piazza, which had no railing around it, and from there stepped off to the ground. Held, that the landlord was liable. In Jessen v. Sweigert, 66 Cal. 183, it was held that the owner, and not the tenant in possession, was liable for injury resulting to a third person from the fall of an awning in front of the building.

It is the duty of the landlord, when he leases the property, to disclose to the tenant the true condition of the same, and to point out and make known to the tenant such defects as he knows to exist in the premises, or which he could know by reasonable diligence; and if he fails to do so, and the tenant or person relying upon his representations is injured, the landlord is responsible therefor. This principle was settled in Coke v. Gutkese, 80 Ky. 598, 44 Am. Rep. 499. This was an action for damages resulting to appellant by reason of a defective privy floor, through which she fell into the vault below and was injured. The petition alleged, in substance, that the father of the plaintiff had rented from the defendant the premises on which the privy was situated, for one year, and at the time he rented the defendant knew the timbers upholding the floor were unsafe, but did not disclose, but suppressed, his knowledge of its condition from the father; that neither she nor her father could discover the dangerous condition of the floor, by reason of the character of its construction; that she fell through the floor, and was precipitated into the vault below, and was greatly damaged physically and mentally by the fall, for which she prayed judgment for $10,000 as damages. The court said that, "although the law presumes that it was her father's duty to repair the premises in the absence of an agreement otherwise, still we are of the opinion that if the appellee rented the premises knowing that the privy was in the condition alleged, it was his duty to disclose his knowledge, because it was a portion of the premises which he knew, as all men know, would be in daily use by his tenant and family, and, unless apprised of the hidden danger, they would inevitably be injured, and the younger and more helpless perhaps lose their lives. And if, as alleged, he failed to disclose his knowledge, but nevertheless rented the dangerous tenement to the plaintiff's father, with whom she lived, he is responsible for the injury she received." To the same effect, see the holding of the New York court in Cesar v. Karutz, 60 N. Y. 229, 19 Am. Rep. 164, where the landlord knowingly rented to the tenant premises infected by a contagious disease, without notifying the tenant thereof. The landlord was held to be liable, in a case where the disease was communicated, for the damages sustained. In Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 249, 50 Am. Rep. 659, it was held that it is the duty of the landlord to disclose to the prospective tenant any defective condition from which danger or accident is likely to arise. The court says: "If he demises premises knowing that they are dangerous and unfit for the use for which they are hired, and fails to disclose their condition, he is guilty of negligence which will in many cases impose responsibility upon him. . . . If guilty of negligence or other delictum which leads directly to the accident and wrong complained of, he is liable; if not so guilty, no liability attaches to him. If he lets a building for a warehouse, knowing that it is so weak and imperfectly constructed that the floors will break down from the weight necessarily to be placed upon them, his negligence imposes liability upon him for injury to the person or property of anyone who may lawfully be upon the premises using them for the purposes for which they were demised. If one builds a house for public amusements or entertainments, and lets it for those purposes, knowing that it is so imperfectly and carelessly built that it is liable to go to pieces in the ordinary use for which it was designed, he is liable to the persons injured through his carelessness. And this rule of responsibility goes far enough for the protection of lessees and of the public generally." In the case of Ahern v. Steele, 115 N. Y. 208, 5 L. R. A. 449, numerous cases are cited by Earl, J., holding that, if the landlord lease premises with a nuisance on them, he will be responsible in damages. In support of the position the learned judge cites the case of Rosewell v. Prior, 2 Salk. 460, where a tenant for years erected a nuisance, and afterwards made an underlease, and the question was whether, after a recovery against the first tenant for years, for the erection, an action would lie against him for the continuance after he had made an underlease; and it was held that it would, "for he transferred it with the original wrong, and his demise affirms the continuance of it." Again, "in Todd v. Flight, 9 C. B. N. S. 377, it was held that an action lies against the owner of premises who lets them to a tenant in a ruinous and dangerous condition, and who causes or permits them to remain so until by reason of the want of reparation they fall upon and injure the house of an adjoining owner." Again, in Nelson v. Liverpool Brewery Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 811, it was held that a landlord is liable for an injury to a stranger by the defective repair of demised premises only when he has contracted with the tenant to repair, or when he has been guilty of misfeasance, as, for instance, in letting the premises in a ruinous condition, in all other cases he is exempt from responsibility for accidents happening to strangers during the tenancy." Again, in Woodfall, Land. & T. 18th ed. 735, it is said: "As regards the liability of landlords to third persons, it may be taken as a general rule that the tenant and not the landlord is liable to third persons for any accident or injury occasioned to them by the premises being in a dangerous condition, and the only exceptions to this rule appear to arise when the landlord has either (1) contracted with the tenant to repair, or (2) when he lets the premises in a ruinous condition, or (3) when he has expressly licensed the tenant to do acts amounting to a nuisance." Again, in Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 80 Me. 62, 77, Virgin, J., writing the opinion, said: "It is settled law that when the owner lets premises which are in a condition which is unsafe for the avowed purpose for which they are let, or with a nuisance upon them when let, and receives rent therefor, he is liable, whether in or out of possession, for the injuries which result from their state of insecurity, to persons lawfully upon them; for by the letting for profit he authorizes a continuance of the condition they were in when he let them, and is therefore guilty of a nonfeasance." Again, in the case of Gandy v. Jubber, 5 Best & S. 78, the owner of premises, attached to which was an area, let the same to a tenant from year to year, and died, having devised the property (with an iron grating over the area, improperly constructed and out of repair, so as to amount to a nuisance) to the defendant, who, having notice of the nuisance, suffered the tenant to remain in occupation of the premises upon the same terms as before, receiving the rent; and it was held that he was liable for the damage caused by the nuisance, on the ground that he had relet the premises with the nuisance thereon. Again, quoting from Wood, Land. & T. 2d ed. p. 1279: "The landlord's right to possession being suspended during the term, it follows that his liabilities in respect to the possession are also suspended, except as to such matters or defects in the premises as existed when the premises were let, arising from the manner of use, or defective construction. If a nuisance existed upon the premises at the time of the demise, the landlord as well as the tenant is liable for the damages resulting to third persons therefrom, although it becomes a nuisance only by the act of the tenant in using it for ordinary purposes." This we understand to be the holding of this court in Young v. Bransford, 12 Lea, 244, citing 1 Thomp. Neg. 817; Whart. Neg. § 817. See also collation of authorities holding the same doctrine in 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 690, 691, and notes; Taylor, Land. & T. 8th ed. § 175; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 175, 175a.

We think there was error in the charge of the learned trial judge, upon the liability of the landlord to plaintiff, under the facts of this case; and the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial. The appellee will pay the costs of the appeal.

A rehearing was denied in this case on March 5, 1896, and the opinion is printed in connection with the case of Hines v. Willook, post, —.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Simon OTTENBERG et al., Appts., v.W. J. CORNER et al.

(76 Fed. Rep. 268.)

A chattel mortgage executed and delivered, no matter how short a time before the making of an assignment for creditors, is not invalid, although the mortgagor contemplated the making of the assignment, where the mortgagee acted in good faith in demanding and accepting the mortgage, and without knowledge of the mortgagor's purpose to make an assignment.

(Sanborn, Circuit Judge, dissent.)

(October 5, 1896.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the value of certain property which had been assigned by chattel mortgage to the defendant bank and by it appropriated to its own use, but which complainants claim should have been applied to the benefit of all the creditors of the assignor. Affirmed.

Before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. V. Daugherty, R. R. Vermilion, and Kos Harris, for appellants:

Every voluntary assignment of lands, tenements, goods, chattels, effects, and credits, made by a debtor to any person in trust for his creditors, shall be for the benefit of all of the creditors of the assignor in proportion to their respective claims, and every such assignment shall be proved or acknowledged and recorded in the same manner as is prescribed by law in cases wherein real estate is conveyed.

Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, chap. 6, § 1.

A debtor in failing circumstances, engaged in making a general assignment of his property for the benefit of all his creditors, cannot at the same time make valid preferences of certain of his creditors, by chattel mortgages or otherwise.

Wyeth Hardware Co. v. Standard Implement Co. 47 Kan. 428; John Shillito Co. v. McConnell, 130 Ind. 41; Watkins Nat. Bank v. Sands, 47 Kan. 591; Jones v. Kellogg, 51 Kan. 268.

The Federal courts have uniformly held the same doctrine as that laid down by the supreme court of Kansas in construing similar statutes regulating assignments for the benefit of creditors, where it was sought to avoid the statute prohibiting preferences, by giving chattel mortgages or otherwise.

White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 329, 32 L. ed. 677; Martin v. Hausman, 14 Fed. Rep. 160; Kerbs v. Ewing, 23 Fed. Rep. 698; Freund v. Yaegerman, 26 Fed. Rep. 812; Gould v. Mulanphy Planing-Mill Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 181; Kellogg v. Root, 23 Fed. Rep. 525; South Branch Lumber Co. v. Ott, 142 U. S. 622, 35 L. ed. 1186.

In determining the question as to whether or not the assignment and the instrument creating the preference are to be taken together as one transaction and in violation of the statute, the dates of the several instruments with reference to each other, and the filing of the same, are in no way controlling in determining that question. But in reaching a conclusion we should take into consideration all of the evidence and circumstances, and determine whether or not the making of the assignment was in contemplation at the time of making the instrument or before, and it is not a question as to whether or not the making of the assignment was "seriously" considered at the outset.

South Branch Lumber Co. v. Ott, 142 U. S. 622, 35 L. ed. 1136; Watkins Nat. Bank v. Sands, 47 Kan. 591; Jones v. Kellogg, 51 Kan. 268.

The question of the knowledge of the bank, or want of knowledge, is immaterial.

Watkins Nat. Bank v. Sands, supra.

When a mortgagee takes possession of the mortgaged chattels for the purpose of selling the same at private or public sale to satisfy the indebtedness thereby secured, it is the duty of the mortgagee to act fairly, and so handle the property that it will bring its full value as near as possible.

Wygal v. Bigelow, 43 Kan. 477; Jones v. Franks, 38 Kan. 497; Alexander v. Rodriguez ("Villa v. Rodriguez"), 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 333, 20 L. ed. 406; Franks v. Jones, 39 Kan. 236.

Where sales are made by the mortgagee under the mortgage by him personally or by any person acting for him, he is not only required to act fairly and obtain full value, but the price of every dollar's worth of goods is a satisfaction of the debt, pro tanto, whether the same is actually paid over or not.

Conkling v. Shelley, 28 N. Y. 860, 84 Am. Dec. 848; Bannon v. Bowler, 84 Minn. 416; Warren v. His Creditors, 3 Wash. 49; Weill v. First Nat. Bank, 106 N. C. 1; Izenberg v. Fansler, 36 Kan. 402; Overman v. Quick, 8 Biss. 134; Hawkins v. Hastings Bank, 1 Dill. 463.

The mortgagee in possession of mortgaged chattels, having sold enough property to pay the debt, is liable to the mortgagor for the balance of the property, or its fair market value in case he withholds the same, or converts the same to his own use.

Cobbey, Chat. Mortg. § 1084; Ilor v. Baker, 82 Mich. 226.

Petition for rehearing.

The court followed the decision of the supreme court of Missouri in construing the assignment laws of Kansas, under the apparent impression that the Missouri statute was the same as that of Kansas, when, as a matter of fact, the Missouri statute on the subject of assignments is not only radically different from the statute of Kansas, but the decisions of the Missouri courts are in conflict with the decisions of the Kansas courts on the same subject.

NOTE.—For participation by a creditor in the fraudulent intent of his debtor which will avoid a transfer in payment or for security, see note to Rice v. Wood (Ark.) 31 L. R. A. 809.

In Missouri the assignee is designated by the assignor, and the courts of Missouri hold that the assignee steps into the shoes of his assignor, and the relation of these parties is controlled by the contract, and the assignee has no power except such is conferred upon him by the contract, and he could not assert any claim to any assets fraudulently conveyed, which his assignor could not assert, and that the assignee took simply the title of the assignor, subject to all equities, and under this theory the deed of assignment could not be set aside for fraud unless the assignee participated in the fraud and the fraudulent intent.

Dyrns v. Becker, 42 Mo. 264; State, Patrick, v. Keeler, 49 Mo. 548; Roan v. Winn, 93 Mo. 508; Heinrichs v. Woods, 7 Mo. App. 286.

In determining the validity of assignments under the Kansas statute, it is held that it is the fraudulent intention and acts of the assignor that control, and that it is not necessary to show that the assignee participated in the fraud.

Kayser v. Heavenrich, 5 Kan. 325; Smith v. Hunter, 4 Kan. App. 377.

It is also held that the assignee not only has power to do so, but that it is his duty to bring suits to set aside fraudulent conveyances, and to recover and distribute all of the assets pro rata among the creditors.

It must appear that the bank had full knowledge.

Thayer, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by Simon Ottenberg, Henry Ottenberg, and Herman Ottenberg, the appellants, against the Wichita National Bank, W. J. Corner, H. R. Farnum, W. S. Corbett, and W. B. Hanscom, the appellees, to recover from said Wichita National Bank the value of certain property that had come into the possession of the bank, and had subsequently been sold by the bank and converted to its own use. The bill of complaint alleged, in substance, the following facts: That Simon Ottenberg, Henry Ottenberg, and Herman Ottenberg, who were engaged in business in the city of New York under the firm name of Simon Ottenberg & Bros., were general creditors of W. J. Corner, H. R. Farnum, and W. B. Hanscom, three of the appellees above named, who were engaged in business at Wichita, Kansas, under the firm name of Corner & Farnum; that on July 2, 1891, the firm of Corner & Farnum was in a failing condition, and insolvent; that said last-mentioned firm on said day executed a chattel mortgage covering its entire stock of merchandise, in favor of the Wichita National Bank, to secure an alleged indebtedness of said firm to said bank in the sum of $24,534, and at the same time also executed a deed of assignment, whereby said firm conveyed to W. S. Corbett, one of the appellees, all of its property for the benefit of all of its creditors, the property so conveyed being the same property that was conveyed and described in the aforesaid chattel mortgage. The bill charged, in substance, that the determination to execute both the chattel mortgage and the deed of assignment was arrived at after a consultation had between the firm of Corner & Farnum and the president of the Wichita National Bank; that the intention to execute the mortgage and the deed of assignment was communicated to said bank by Corner & Farnum before either instrument was in fact executed; that the chattel mortgage and the deed of assignment were executed at the same time, and constituted one transaction, the intent being by such device to give the Wichita National Bank a preference over the other creditors of Corner & Farnum. The bill charged, in substance, that the Wichita National Bank had taken possession, under its chattel mortgage, of all the property of Corner & Farnum therein described, and had caused the same to be sold at public and private sale, and had thereby realized a large sum of money, which it had appropriated to its own use; that W. S. Corbett, the assignee named in the deed of assignment, had been requested to bring an action against the aforesaid bank to compel it to account for the money and property by it received, and that he had refused to bring such a suit. In view of the premises, the complainants below, who are now the appellants, prayed that an account might be taken of the property that had been appropriated by the Wichita National Bank under the aforesaid chattel mortgage, and that it be compelled to pay the value thereof to W. S. Corbett, assignee, to the end that it might be distributed pro rata among all the creditors of Corner & Farnum, pursuant to the laws of the state of Kansas regulating general assignments. The circuit court sustained the validity of the chattel mortgage, but, inasmuch as the proof showed to its satisfaction that the Wichita National Bank had realized out of the property conveyed to it more than enough to satisfy the mortgage debt, it decreed that the bank pay the excess of money in its hands to a special master appointed for that purpose, to the end that it might be distributed by him pro rata among all the creditors of Corner & Farnum who had proved their demands against the assigned estate. The complainants below have appealed from that decree.

One of the questions discussed at considerable length on the hearing of the appeal was whether the assignment that was executed by Corner & Farnum to W. S. Corbett was a valid assignment, the contention on the part of the appellees being that it was invalid, for the reason that it was not signed by W. B. Hanscom, one of the members of the firm of Corner & Farnum. Since the case has been under advisement in this court, the assignment in question has been adjudged to be a good and sufficient conveyance by the supreme court of Kansas in the case of Corbett v. Cannon (Kan.) 45 Pac. 80, where that was the sole question in controversy. We fully agree with the conclusion announced in that case, and for that reason shall follow the ruling there made, and accept the decision as controlling authority upon the point raised in the case at bar.

The appellants, who are general creditors of Corner & Farnum, found their right to maintain the present action upon the deed of assignment, and, inasmuch as that instrument must be treated as valid, it becomes necessary to determine whether the chattel mortgage which was executed by Corner & Farnum was also a valid conveyance, and operated to create a lien in favor of the Wichita National Bank. The appellants contend that the chattel mortgage was void, because the mortgage and the deed of assignment were executed at the same time, and constituted but one transaction, and because they were so executed, as it is claimed, in pursuance of a previous understanding or agreement between Corner & Farnum and the bank to the effect that the two instruments should be thus executed for the purpose of giving the bank a preference over other general creditors of the assignors. The weight of evidence shows, we think, that the execution and delivery of the mortgage to the mortgagee preceded the execution and delivery of the deed of assignment to the assignee by about two or three hours, so that the two instruments cannot be said to have been executed at the same time. Nevertheless, the execution of the assignment was so closely related to the execution of the mortgage in point of time that it is perhaps fair to infer that Corner & Farnum had in fact resolved to make an assignment when they executed and delivered the chattel mortgage. It is a much more debatable question, however, whether, as is claimed by the appellants, the firm of Corner & Farnum and the Wichita National Bank did in fact agree that the delivery of the mortgage should be followed immediately by the execution of a general assignment, and whether the bank did in fact accept the mortgage with that understanding. With reference to this latter issue the evidence was somewhat conflicting. The trial court evidently found, in accordance with the bank's contention, that it demanded security for its debt from Corner & Farnum, and obtained security in compliance with its demand, and that it was not advised of the mortgagor's purpose to execute a general assignment until some hours after it had accepted and recorded the chattel mortgage. This finding by the trial court upon a disputed issue of fact, depending, as it does, upon the weight of conflicting testimony, is entitled to every reasonable presumption in its favor. This court and the Supreme Court of the United States as well, have frequently declared that the findings of a chancellor on an issue of fact should be taken as presumptively correct, and that a decree should be permitted to stand, unless some obvious error has intervened in the application of the law, or some serious or important mistake has been made in the consideration of the evidence. Warren v. Burt, 12 U. S. App. 591, 600, 7 C. C. A. 105, and 55 Fed. Rep. 101; Gaines v. Granger, 32 U. S. App. 342, 15 C. C. A. 228, and 68 Fed. Rep. 69; Paxon v. Brown, 27 U. S. App. 49, 10 C. C. A. 135, 144, and 61 Fed. Rep. 874; Snider v. Dobson, 74 Fed. Rep. 757; Tuighman v. Proctor, 125 U. S. 136, 31 L. ed. 684; Camden v. Stuart, 144 U. S. 104, 36 L. ed. 385; Crawford v. Neal, 144 U. S. 585, 36 L. ed. 552, 557; Furrer v. Ferris, 145 U. S. 132, 36 L. ed. 649. It is also well settled that a decree will not be reversed by an appellate tribunal merely upon a doubt created by conflicting testimony. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & H. De G. Steam Towboat Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 209, 16 L. ed. 433; Morewood v. Enequist, 61 U. S. 28 How. 491, 16 L. ed. 516. Applying these rules to the case at bar, we are unable to say, after an attentive examination of the testimony, that the trial court was mistaken in its view of the evidence, and that it erred in finding, as it appears to have found, that the bank was not privy to the alleged scheme whereby the execution of the chattel mortgage in its favor was to be immediately followed by a deed of assignment. The conclusion which the trial court reached on this branch of the case, that the bank simply demanded security for its debt and obtained it, and that it was not a party to, nor in any way concerned in, the subsequent acts of Corner & Farnum, is not an unreasonable conclusion, when judged in the light of the evidence. The finding of the trial court on this issue is supported by the oral statements of several witnesses, and, so far as we can see, it is not inconsistent with any of the admitted facts or circumstances in the case. For these reasons we think that the presumption which exists in favor of the finding of the trial court has not been overcome, and that such finding should be adopted by this court.

It is contended, however, by counsel for the appellants, that the chattel mortgage was and is void, even though it be true that the bank was not concerned in the execution of the deed of assignment, and was not advised, prior to the delivery of the mortgage, that an assignment was to be executed. It is urged in substance that, although the Wichita National Bank may have acted in good faith in demanding and accepting the chattel mortgage, and without knowledge of the purpose of Corner & Farnum to forthwith execute a deed of assignment, yet, as the members of the firm of Corner & Farnum had both of these conveyances in contemplation at the same time, and executed them on the same day, the chattel mortgage is necessarily void. In support of this contention the following decisions by the supreme court of Kansas are cited and relied upon: Wyeth Hardware Co. v. Standard Implement Co. 47 Kan. 423; Watkins Nat. Bank v. Sands, Id. 591; Jones v. Kellogg, 51 Kan. 263. We think, however, that the cases thus cited may be fairly distinguished from the case at bar. In each of the cases to which our attention is directed it appeared that a debtor in failing circumstances, who desired to prefer a particular creditor, of his own volition, and without a previous conference with his creditor, had executed a mortgage in favor of the creditor, and at the same time, as a part of the same transaction, had also executed and delivered a deed of assignment conveying the same property. In each instance the evidence showed that the deed of assignment was delivered to and accepted by the assignee before the mortgage then in question had been delivered to the creditor, and before the creditor had elected to accept it, or was even aware of its existence. Upon this state of facts the court held that the mortgages in question were inoperative and void.

The facts developed in the case at bar are essentially different. The chattel mortgage which is now in controversy was executed and delivered to the creditor before the deed of assignment was either executed or delivered, and before it was known to the creditor that an assignment would be made. The mortgage was also executed in compliance with a demand made by the creditor for such security. It became operative, therefore, from the moment it was delivered to the mortgagee, unless it be held that it was invalid when delivered, and never had any legal operation or effect, because, when delivered, the mortgagor entertained a secret intent, not communicated to the mortgagee, to thereafter execute a deed of assignment. If such an intent on the part of a mortgagor, when carried into execution, will serve to invalidate a mortgage that was executed two or three hours before the execution of a deed of assignment, then we are unable to see why the existence of such an intent should not have the same effect when an assignment is executed two or three days, or even two or three weeks, subsequent to the execution of a mortgage. The Federal bankrupt law of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. at L. 517, chap. 176, § 85), did invalidate conveyances by way of preference that were made by an insolvent debtor in contemplation of bankruptcy within a certain period, to wit, four months prior to the execution of an assignment; but no such law exists in Kansas, and, in the absence of a statute upon the subject, the courts cannot say that a mortgage or other security is void, simply because it was executed a few hours or a few days prior to the execution of an assignment for the general benefit of creditors. We think, therefore, that it matters not how short a time may have intervened between the execution of the mortgage and the deed of assignment, if, as we find the fact to be, the mortgage was executed and delivered, and thereby took effect before the making of the deed of assignment. The transactions were separate and distinct, and took place between different parties. Waggoner-Gates Mill. Co. v. Ziegler-Zais Commission Co. 128 Mo. 475, and cases there cited. Moreover, as we construe the decisions cited from the state of Kansas, it has never yet been held in that state that a mere intent on the part of a debtor, when he executes a mortgage securing a particular creditor, to thereafter execute a deed of assignment, will have the effect of invalidating the former security, although the mortgagee was ignorant of such intent, and was in no sense a party to the execution of the assignment.

Entertaining these views, we conclude that the decree of the circuit court was for the right party, and it is hereby affirmed.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

May a chattel mortgage upon all their valuable property to secure a pre existing debt, made by insolvent debtors two hours before they made a general assignment, and after they had resolved to do so, be sustained under the laws of Kansas, either because the mortgagee pressed the debtor for security, or because it did not know that they intended to make the assignment until after it was made? In support of an affirmative answer to this question the case of Waggoner-Gates Mill. Co. v. Ziegler-Zais Commission Co. 128 Mo. 473, is cited. It may be that the mortgage in question in this case could have been sustained if it and the assignment had been made in the state of Missouri, and if they were to be construed and governed by the decisions of the supreme court of that state. But they were not. They were made in the state of Kansas, and their effect and the validity of the chattel mortgage must be determined by the statutes of that state as they have been interpreted by its highest judicial tribunal. The statute of Kansas, under which this assignment was made, provides: "Every voluntary assignment of lands, tenements, goods, chattels, effects and credits, made by a debtor to any person, in trust for his creditors, shall be for the benefit of all the creditors of the assignor, in proportion to their respective claims." Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, chap. 6, § 1.

In Waggoner-Gates Mill. Co. v. Ziegler-Zais Commission Co. supra, the supreme court of the state of Missouri declared that it had been repeatedly held in states having assignment statutes similar to those in Missouri and Kansas, where an insolvent debtor had executed different mortgages on all his property, when he intended at the same time to make, and shortly thereafter did make, an assignment subject to such mortgages for the benefit of all his creditors, that the mortgages and the assignment were one and the same transaction, and that the mortgages were void. Among the decisions which it cited as sustaining this proposition are Wyeth Hardware Co. v. Standard Implement Co. 47 Kan. 423; Watkins Nat. Bank v. Sands. 47 Kan. 591; Jones v. Kellogg. 51 Kan. 263; Preston v. Spaulding. 120 Ill. 208; Van Patten v. Burr. 52 Iowa, 518; Ellison v. Moses. 95 Ala. 221; Holt v. Bancroft. 80 Ala. 198; First Nat. Bank v. Bard. 59 Hun, 529; Berger v. Varielmann. 127 N. Y. 281, 12 L. R. A. 808; Peed v. Elliott. 134 Ind. 536; Berry v. Cutts. 42 Me. 445. After citing these decisions, the supreme court of the state of Missouri announced that there were a large number of authorities of equal merit which held to a contrary view, and that among the latter class were those of the state of Missouri. An examination of the cases in the supreme courts of Kansas and Missouri which involve this question has convinced me that this is a correct statement of the standing of the decisions of the highest courts of those states upon this issue. If this be so, this court ought not to be governed, in determining the validity of this chattel mortgage, by the decisions of the supreme court of Missouri, but by those of the highest judicial tribunal of Kansas. Upon this subject the Supreme Court of the United States said in a recent case: "The question of the construction and effect of a statute of a state, regulating assignments for the benefit of creditors, is a question upon which the decisions of the highest court of the state, establishing a rule of property, are of controlling authority in the courts of the United States. Brashear v. West, 82 U. S. 7 Pet. 603, 615, 8 L. ed. 801, 804; Massey v. Allen ('Allen v. Massey'), 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 851, 21 L. ed. 542; Lloyd v. Fulton, 91 U. S. 479, 485, 23 L. ed. 863, 865; Sumner v. Hicks, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 532, 534, 17 L. ed. 855, 856; Jaffray v. McGeehe, 107 U. S. 861, 865, 27 L. ed. 495, 496; Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 686, 33 L. ed. 696, 702; Jencks v. Quidnick Co. ('Randolph's Executor v. Quidnick Co.'), 185 U. S. 457, 34 L. ed. 200. The decision in White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 329, 32 L. ed. 677, construing a similar statute of Illinois in accordance with the decisions of the supreme court of that state as understood by this court, has therefore no bearing upon the case at bar. The fact that similar statutes are allowed different effects in different states is immaterial. As observed by Mr. Justice Field, speaking for this court: "The interpretation within the jurisdiction of one state becomes a part of the law of that state, as much so as if incorporated into the body of it by the legislature. If, therefore, different interpretations are given in different states to a similar local law, that law in effect becomes by the interpretations, so far as it is a rule for our action, a different law in one state from what it is in the other." Christy v. Pidgeon, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 196, 203, 18 L. ed. 322, 324. See also Detroit v. Osborne, 135 U. S. 492, 34 L. ed. 260." Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 186 U. S. 223, 235, 34 L. ed. 341, 345.

The very different effect which similar transactions have, under the opposing decisions of the courts of different states upon the validity of chattel mortgages, executed after the mortgagor has resolved to make a general assignment, and at about the same time that he makes it, is well illustrated by the case just cited, which is based on the decisions in Missouri, and in the case of White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 329, 32 L. ed. 677, which rests upon the rulings of the supreme court of Illinois. In the former case preferences are sustained that would have been avoided, if they had been given in Illinois, and in the latter case those are avoided that might have been sustained under the decisions in Missouri. Now, the decisions of the supreme court of the state of Kansas upon the question under consideration are in accord with those of the supreme courts of Illinois, Iowa, Maine, and New York. As I understand them, they do not rest upon the proposition that preferences made by an insolvent debtor, after he has resolved to make an assignment, are void because he or his preferred creditors intended thereby to hinder, delay, or defraud his other creditors. They rest on the ground that such preferences in themselves constitute a violation of the letter and spirit of that provision of the assignment law which requires the assigned property to be distributed pro rata among all the creditors of the insolvent. This provision is as much violated when preferred creditors are ignorant as when they are aware of the intention of the debtor to immediately follow their preferences with an assignment. It is as much violated when they have urged the insolvent to give them the securities as when he has done so voluntarily. It is as much violated when he gives the preferences, and they accept them in good faith, with the intent that the preferred creditors shall thereby secure the payment of their bona fide claims, as when the debtor and the creditors intend to delay the unsecured creditors. The question under this statute is not, What was the knowledge or the intent of the secured creditors? It is not whether the debtor or the creditors intended by the preferences to hinder, delay, or defraud unsecured creditors, but the only question is, Did the insolvent debtor contemplate, and intend to make, the assignment, when he was making the preferences? Did he intend to dispose of his property when he entered upon the transaction by the use of the instruments which gave the preferences and the assignment which immediately followed them? As Judge Love well said in deciding in the court below the case of South Branch Lumber Co. v. Ott, 142 U. S. 622, 630, 35 L. ed. 1136, 1139. "The intention of the assignor must be the true and guiding principle of decision." A careful reading of the opinions of the supreme court of Kansas had led me to the conclusion that a chattel mortgage in that state cannot be sustained under those decisions either on the ground that the mortgagee was ignorant that the mortgagors had resolved to make a general assignment when they made the mortgage, or on the ground that the mortgagee had urged them to give the securities. In Wells Hardware Co. v. Standard Implement Co. 47 Kan. 423, and in Watkins Nat. Bank v. Sands, 47 Kan. 591, the mortgagors made the mortgages just before making the assignments. The preferred creditors had no notice or knowledge that the mortgagors intended to make general assignments, and they had not pressed them for payment of their debts, nor asked for security, and yet the mortgages were set aside by the supreme court of Kansas. That they were not void on the ground that such preferences were made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors is demonstrated by the fact that the court found in the latter case that the debts secured were actual, that the mortgages and the assignment were made in good faith, and that for this reason an attachment could not be sustained on the ground that the debtor intended to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors; and yet it held that the mortgages were void, that they gave no preferences, and that the proceeds of the property must be distributed pro rata among all the creditors under the assignment. 47 Kan. 593. In Jones v. Kellogg, 51 Kan. 263, 274, the creditors who procured one of the chattel mortgages upon the property of the debtor, presented their claim to him, and demanded payment of it, or security for it, on November 17, 1886, and the debtor promised to give the security in case of any trouble. On November 29, 1886, he made a chattel mortgage to secure this claim and followed it with a general assignment, which he made on the same day. The supreme court of Kansas held that the mortgage was voidable. The opinion discloses the fact that an attempt was made in that case to distinguish it from the cases cited from 47 Kan. on the ground suggested in the opinion of the court in this case, namely, that the mortgage was not voluntarily given. The court answered this argument in these words: "It is claimed by the defendants in error, plaintiffs below, that the mortgage given to Charles P. Kellogg & Co. was not given by Townley of his own volition and unsolicited, as were the mortgages mentioned in the cases above cited, but were given because of importunities, demands, and active vigilance on the part of Charles P. Kellogg & Co. through their agents, in attempting to collect their claim or to obtain security thereon, and because of a promise on the part of Townley, the debtor, made several days before the execution of the mortgage, and before the assignment was contemplated, to give security upon the claim if trouble should arise. These things are not thought by this court to be material, however, for the reason, among others, that no intention was really formed by Townley to execute any mortgage to Charles P. Kellogg & Co. until the intention was also formed by him to execute a general deed of assignment for the benefit of all his creditors. When the mortgage was executed, it was not the carrying out of an agreement previously entered into between the parties, upon a new and sufficient consideration passing at the time when the agreement was made, and an agreement intended to be fulfilled by one of the parties in executing a mortgage to the other, but it was simply the carrying out of an intention formed at the very time that another intention was also formed, to execute a general deed of assignment. It does not appear that anything was said prior to this time with regard to mortgages, or that any new consideration passed for the mortgages; hence, as before stated, the mortgages must be considered as void." 51 Kan. 278.

In view of these decisions and the rule of the Supreme Court of the United States that they constitute the law of the state of Kansas which the national courts are bound to enforce, I am of the opinion that the chattel mortgage in this case should be set aside and the judgment which sustains it should be reversed.

2. A construction company becomes a subcontractor, and not an original contractor with a railroad company, when, with full knowledge that a contract company is unable to complete the work, it agrees with it to do so for an agreed sum in cash and bonds, with a provision that it shall have a "subcontractor's lien," although the railroad company has consented to the subletting of the contract, and that the construction company shall have a contractor's lien.

3. Payment in bonds under a contract by an embarrassed railroad contractor to pay a construction company for completing the contract, $1 for each $1 expended, and an equal amount in bonds of the railroad company, which were worth about 40 per cent of their face value when the contract was made, and greatly depreciated thereafter, will be applied ratably on the lienable and non-lienable expenditures, and the part applicable to the former, like other payments to subcontractors, will be applied on the excess of the claim over the security of the subcontractor's lien.

7. The agreed contract price of railroad construction payable in bonds should be diminished for the purpose of limiting the amount of subcontractor's liens by the amount of unpaid interest which the contractor had agreed to pay on the railroad bonds in order to maintain the credit of the railroad company until after completion of the road.

Before Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges, and Severens, District Judge.

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

These were appeals in the suit of Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. 68 Fed. Rep. 90, severally taken by the Richmond & Irvine Construction Co., L. F. Mann, J. E. Dougherty, G. W. Gourley, W. B. Smith, D. Shannon & Co., J. W. Walker and others, John Mitchell & Co., M. A. Sullivan, Dickason & Crawford, and John McLeod, from the decree of the circuit court settling the priorities among the various claimants of the fund arising from the sale of the railroad.

Each of the appellants named above has prosecuted a separate appeal. The general facts out of which the questions presented by them arise have been stated in the opinion filed upon appeal of Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. (being No. 240 on this docket) 68 Fed. Rep. 90. These general facts need not be again stated. Many of the questions arising upon the separate assignments of error filed by the several appellants are fully covered by the opinion in the case above referred to. The court, in this opinion, will confine itself to such questions as were not necessarily involved in the former case.

Messrs. Stone & Sudduth, for appellants:

The right of the owner to pay the contractor without seeing the subcontractor's claim satisfied is suspended during the whole time within which the act gives the subcontractor the right to file a lien.

Ballou v. Black, 21 Neb. 181; Courtney v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 49 Fed. Rep. 809, 4 U. S. App. 140; Havighorst v. Lindberg, 67 Ill. 466; Neilson v. Iowa Eastern R. Co. 44 Iowa, 71; Clough v. McDonald, 18 Kan. 114.

In this case the mortgage itself put the mortgagee upon notice that the road was not built when the bonds were issued, for it recites the fact that the road is to be built, and when the bondholders purchased from the contract company their bonds, they were charged with notice that those who furnished the materials and built the road would be entitled to a lien.

Under statutes which give the subcontractors a direct lien, the amount for which the property may be charged is not limited by the amount that may be due from the owner to the contractor, nor does it in any way depend upon the state of the account between them.

The subcontractor is not bound by the terms of the original contract.

Benedict v. Hood, 184 Pa. 289; Mulrey v. Barrow, 11 Allen, 152; Hartman v. Berry, 56 Mo. 487; McLaughlin v. Reinhart, 54 Md. 71; Clough v. McDonald, supra.

A subcontractor has two sources of payment. He has a right to look to the solvency of the original contractor for payment, and, that failing, he has the right to rely on his lien against the railroad.

Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, § 812.

The only limitation upon the right of the subcontractor to have his lien is that the aggregate amount of the liens shall not exceed the contract price of the original contractor.

The proper construction of this contract gave to the railroad company the right of election as to whether it would pay in money or in the securities, and wherever this right of election on the part of the debtor exists, then it is an alternative contract, and the contract price in this case should be measured in money.

It is the duty of the debtor to seek the creditor for the purpose of paying the debt.

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 198; Sanders v. Norton, 4 T. B. Mon. 464.

The mere agreement of the owner to pay the mechanic in securities, which if delivered by the owner to the mechanic would prevent a lien, does not waive a lien at all.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

1. One of the principal questions presented by the appeal of the Richmond & Irvine Construction Company concerns the relation which it bears to the appellee the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine, & Beattyville Railroad Company. Its contention is that it is properly to be considered as a contractor with the railroad company, and it assigns as error that the circuit court did not so hold, instead of construing it to be a subcontractor under the Ohio Valley Improvement & Contract Company. As will appear more fully by the opinion of the court heretofore filed in the case of Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. 81 U. S. App. 675, the Ohio Valley Improvement & Contract Company had contracted with the said railroad company to construct and equip the entire line of railroad of the said railroad company. The Ohio Valley Improvement & Contract Company, hereafter designated as the "Contract Company," after doing the larger part of the work and furnishing the greater part of the materials for that purpose, became financially embarrassed, and unable to complete its contract without assistance. It had agreed to construct and equip the said line of railroad for the bonds and stocks of the railroad company. Thus all the assets of the railroad company had either been paid or pledged to it, and when the latter became unable to go on with the work the railroad company was in no condition, financially, to complete the construction itself. In this situation of affairs the contract company entered into an agreement with the appellant the Richmond & Irvine Construction Company, hereafter designated as the "Construction Company," that the latter should complete the work of construction between Richmond and Irvine, Kentucky, and furnish all necessary materials. It also agreed to purchase and hold certain coupons detached from the bonds of the railroad company, which coupons the contract company, under its agreement with the railroad company, was under obligation to pay, and to purchase and hold certain subcontractors' lien claims due by the contract company. The agreement between the construction company and the contract company provided that the former should have a subcontractors' lien" on the property of the railroad company. The subscribed capital stock of the construction company was estimated to be $200,000. It contracted to do work and furnish materials of an estimated value of not more than $140,000, and to expend the balance of its subscribed capital stock in the purchase of the coupons and "subcontractors' liens designated by the contract. The contract concluded in the following words:

"And said contract company agrees to pay the said construction company for said work, materials, and such claims as may be so purchased, the sum $400,000, to be paid as follows: In the new 5 per cent first-mortgage bonds of said railroad company the sum of $200,000 as soon as the bonds are printed and ready for delivery, and the sum of $200,000 in money due and payable at the expiration of thirty days after the track of said railroad is laid and completed as aforesaid from Richmond, Kentucky, to the Kentucky river, opposite Irvine, Kentucky; but, should said sum not be paid at maturity, the same shall bear no interest until January 1, 1892."

It was signed only by the contract company and the construction company. The contention of appellant that this contract is to be construed as a contract of the railroad company, and in its relation as that of an original contractor, is based upon two propositions:

First. It contends that under the evidence in this case the contract company was, in legal effect, the railroad company, and that engagements made by it were, in legal effect, engagements made by the railroad company. In support of this, appellant has endeavored to show that the stockholders in each corporation were the same, and that the contract company dominated and controlled the railroad company. The contract company was a legal corporation, wholly distinct and separate from the railroad company. The fact that the stockholders in each may have been the same persons does not operate to destroy the legal identity of either corporation. Neither does the fact that the one corporation exercised a controlling influence over the other through the ownership of its stock or through the identity of stockholders, operate to make either the agent of the other, or to merge the two corporations into one. There is no pretense of any fraudulent concealment of the interest of the one corporation in the other, or of the fact that the persons controlling the one corporation likewise controlled the other. The officers and agents of the construction company were fully aware of the relations which existed between the two companies. They also knew that the contract company was under obligation to build and equip the railroad for the railroad company. With this knowledge of the relations of each corporation to the other, it deliberately entered into a contract with the contract company to do work for and under the contract company, as a subcontractor. The facts of this case are very much the facts which appeared in the case of Central Trust Co. v. Bridges, 6 C. C. A. 539, 57 Fed. Rep. 753, 16 U. S. App. 115. In that case the court distinctly held, on substantially the same facts, that the corporations were to be treated as distinct entities, and that neither was to be treated as the agent of the other, when openly contracting for itself, and in its own corporate name.

Second. Appellant also rests its contention upon the legal effect of the action of the board of directors of the railroad company contained in certain resolutions found upon the minutes of the board, as follows:

"Whereas, the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine, & Beattyville Railroad Company, hereinafter designated the 'Railroad Company,' is informed by the Ohio Valley Improvement & Contract Company, hereinafter designated the 'Improvement Company,' that it desires to make a subcontract with the Richmond & Irvine Construction Company, hereinafter designated the 'Construction Company,' substantially as follows, to wit: First. That said construction company will finish the work of construction necessary to be done upon the railroad of the railroad company from Versailles to Irvine, according to the construction contract of October 11, 1888, which, it is estimated, will require something less than $140,000. Second. That said construction company shall purchase and take up certain lien claims of subcontractors, now existing and unpaid, for work heretofore done and material furnished on the line of the railroad, the lien claims to be purchased, added to the cost of the work and materials, to aggregate $200,000. Third. That said improvement company will pay to said construction company, in money, the amount so paid out both in construction and in the purchase of subcontractor's lien claims, amounting in the aggregate to $200,000, and will pay to the said construction company, as an additional consideration, in 5 per cent bonds of this company, an amount equal, at par value, to the amount of money to be so paid by the improvement company to the construction company. Now, be it resolved, that the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine, & Beattyville Railroad Company does hereby consent to the subletting by said improvement company to said construction company upon substantially the terms above mentioned, and consents, so far as this company can lawfully do so, that said construction company shall have a contractor's lien upon the railroad for all work done and material furnished and claims purchased as above mentioned."

These resolutions do not operate to make the railroad company a principal contractor, within the meaning of the Kentucky lien act of March 14, 1888, being §§ 2492-2495, Ky. Stat. 1894, revised by Barbour and Carroll, and which have been fully set out in the opinion of this court filed in the principal case. A contractor, within the meaning of that act, is one who does work or furnishes material for the owner, and upon a contract with the owner for the payment of the contract price. A subcontractor, within the meaning of that act, is one who contracts under and with the principal contractor. Now, nothing in these resolutions obligated the railroad company to pay the construction company for the work and materials which it was to do and furnish, and for the lien claims which it was to purchase and hold. The railroad company was obligated to the contract company to the extent of the contract price mentioned in the contract between them. The labor and materials which the construction company undertook to furnish are a part of the same labor and materials which the contract company had agreed to furnish, and for which the railroad company was bound to pay. There is nothing in these resolutions which indicates that the railroad company intended to personally assume liability to the construction company. The language that "it consents, so far as this company can lawfully do so, that said construction company shall have a contractor's lien upon the railroad for work done and material furnished and claims purchased," implies simply a lien by contract. In other words, it amounts to nothing more than this: That if the railroad company has the power to bind its property by a lien called a "contractor's lien," to secure the payment of an amount agreed to be paid by the contract company, the railroad company consents that its property shall be thus charged with such a lien. A contractor's lien, per se, is one that arises by operation of law, independently of the express terms of any contract. It springs out of the obligation to pay for the stipulated labor and the promised materials, when furnished, provided the contractor shall give the notice required by statute. McMurray v. Brown, 91 U. S. 266, 23 L. ed. 324. This, at most, is an agreement for a lien by contract. No lien dependent upon a contract for a lien would be effectual as against mortgages, or the liens of contractors or subcontractors created by the lien statute. We agree with the holding of the circuit court that the relations which existed between the Richmond & Irvine Construction Company and the railroad company were not those of contractor and owner, but of subcontractor and owner.

2. The nineteenth assignment of error filed by the construction company presents a question concerning the application of a payment of part of the contract price in railroad bonds, made by the contract company to the construction company. The rule in regard to partial payments made by the contract company to its subcontractors, and the effect of such payments upon the lien of such subcontractors, is fully stated and explained in the opinion filed upon the questions involved by the appeal of the Central Trust Company, 81 U. S. App. 675, and need not be here repeated. That rule was applied to all payments made to subcontractors, except only the construction company. The learned district judge who heard this case in the circuit court deemed the contract between the contract company and the construction company so peculiar as to justify a departure from the general rule adopted with reference to partial payments made to other subcontractors by the contract company. The peculiarity of that contract consisted, not only in the great variety of things which the construction company undertook to do, but in the odd way in which the price was to be fixed which was to be paid for all its undertakings. The construction company was a corporation organized for the express purpose of helping the contract company out of its difficulties. It obligated itself to do all that the contract company had contracted to do, and had not done, on that part of the road between Richmond and Irvine, Kentucky. This involved the acquirement of rights of way, grading, track laying, bridge and depot building, the furnishing of all necessary materials, including steel rails, etc. The contract company bail, as more fully appears in the principal opinion, obligated itself to pay the interest upon the bonds of the railroad company during construction, and for one year thereafter. It owed a great deal of money to subcontractors for work finished and materials furnished. Its obligation to pay matured coupons, and to pay subcontractors having liens, had to be provided for, and so the construction company undertook to buy and hold matured coupons not exceeding $12,000 in par value, and to purchase and hold for its benefit subcontractors' lien claims to be designated by the contract company. The total capital stock of the construction company was fixed at $200,000. Of this capital it undertook to use $140,000 in expenditures on the work of construction. The expenditures upon this account, it was provided, should include "the actual costs and expenditures" on account of labor done, materials furnished, and rights of way acquired, "including the salaries of said construction company's officers and agents." The remainder of its capital, estimated at $40,000, was to be expended in the purchase of matured coupons and lien claims. Thus it was contemplated that the construction company should actually expend $200,000 for the benefit of the contract company in the completion of a considerable part of the work undertaken by that company for the railroad company. How was it to be compensated for this use of its capital? What price was the contract company to pay for all the undertakings included in this rather unusual contract. This is answered by the contract. The concluding covenant is in these words:

And said contract company agrees to pay the said construction company for said work, materials, and such claims as may be so purchased, the sum of $400,000, to be paid as follows: In the new 5 per cent first-mortgage bonds of said railroad company, the sum of $200,000 as soon as the bonds are printed and ready for delivery, and the sum of $200,000 in money due and payable at the expiration of thirty days after the track of said railroad is laid and completed as aforesaid from Richmond, Kentucky, to the Kentucky river, opposite Irvine, Kentucky, but should said sum not be paid at maturity, the same shall bear no interest until January 1, 1892.

Subsequently, on February 7, 1891, a modification of the contract was agreed upon, as follows:

The agreement attached hereto between the undersigned, bearing date January —, 1891, was made with the expectation and understanding that the paid-up capital stock of the Richmond & Irvine Construction Company should equal the sum of $200,000 in money which was to be expended in the prosecution of the work of constructing the R., N. I. & B. R. R. and the purchase of the lien claims mentioned in said contract. Now, this writing witnesseth, that if the said paid-up capital stock should fall short of the said $200,000, then the Richmond & Irvine Construction Company shall only be paid under said contract an amount of bonds equal to said paid-up capital stock, and a like amount in money. In testimony whereof, we have hereunto subscribed our names, this the 7th day of February, 1891.

The capital expended did in fact fall short of that anticipated, and the bond payment made by the contract company was correspondingly reduced. This agreement comes at last to this: that in place of agreeing, in the first instance, upon a definite price to be paid for what the construction company agreed to do and expend, the parties to that contract agreed that the price to be paid should be the actual amount of the cash expenditures plus the value of an equal amount of securities, which, as shown by the master's report, were worth 40 per cent of their value. This arrangement settled definitely the profit allowed the construction company upon its entire outlay, provided the whole of the price should be paid or collectible. The contract may have been a hard bargain, as between the contracting corporations, and this view, in part, may account for the exceptional rule enforced in regard to the application of the partial payment so as to reduce the amount of its lienable claim, as well as the amount of its pro rata enforceable against the property of the railroad company. On the other hand, it is to be remembered, in mitigation, that this profit was more apparent than real. The market value of the bonds rapidly depreciated after their delivery, and, when these suits were instituted, had declined to perhaps 15 per cent of their par value. There was no probability of the payment of the cash part of the contract price, except through the enforcement of the statutory lien. The cost, delay, and uncertain result of a suit enforcing such a lien, as well as the uncertain and speculative value of the payment in bonds, were proper matters to be taken into consideration in fixing the gross price to be paid for all the construction company undertook to do and expend. The contract was one which did not affect the legal liability of the railroad company, nor did it subject its property to any larger lien than was already fastened upon it. It had an indirect effect due to the fact that the railroad company had already paid the contract company more than its ratable share in the original contract price, and so it indirectly affected the holders of the mortgage bonds, and of subcontractors' lien claims. But this indirect effect would result from any unwise subcontract made by the principal contractor. In the absence of intentional fraud, such indirect consequences are not matters of which the parties affected can complain. What the court was called upon to do was to ascertain the contract price due from the principal contractor to each subcontractor, eliminate from that so much of the price as was for work or expenditures nonlienable under the statute, and then ascertain the pro rata of the original contract price properly earned by each subcontractor. The mere hardness of the bargain between the principal contractor and its subcontractors, not amounting to a fraud upon other lienors or the railroad company, should have no effect in determining the pro rata of each subcontractor in the original contract price. The first direction in the decree, for an apportionment of the bond payment ratably between so much of the claim of the construction company as was entitled to the benefit of the statutory lien and that which was nonlienable, seems to be justified by the terms of the contract, and is therefore affirmed. In substance, that agreement was, that for each $1 of money expended, the contract company would pay $1 in money and $1 in bonds. The bond payment must be treated as having been made ratably upon the lienable and nonlienable expenditures. But so much of the decree as directed that that part of the bond payment applicable to its lienable claim should be again prorated between that part of its lienable claim as was in excess of, and so much of it as was within its pro rata share of, the original contract price, was erroneous. We see no reason for applying that payment in any other manner than was adopted with reference to other subcontractors' liens.

3. The same appellant assigns as error that the court disallowed interest on its pro rata, except from the date of the decree. We think this was error. The agreement between the contract company and the construction company provided that the actual cost of work and labor and expenditures for material, etc., made by the construction company for the contract company should be "payable at the expiration of thirty days after the track of said railroad is laid and completed as aforesaid from Richmond, Kentucky, to the Kentucky river, opposite Irvine, Kentucky, but should said sum not be paid at maturity, the same shall bear no interest until January 1, 1892." We think this is an express contract for payment upon the completion of the work, and an implied promise to pay interest from and after January 1, 1892. Redfield v. Ystaferra Iron Co. 110 U. S. 176, 28 L. ed. 110. Under this contract the appellant should have been allowed interest, in accordance with the terms of the contract, after January 1, 1892.

for the doing of many things, and the expenditures of money on many accounts, which the circuit court held were not lienable matters. All these expenditures made by the construction company, and which were excluded from the lienable claim of that company, were made matters of exception to the report of the special master, and the ruling of the court thereon has been assigned as error. We are of opinion that the court's ruling was correct, with respect to each and all of these matters thus excluded from the lienable claim. Money paid for purchase of rights of way is neither work nor material, within the meaning of the lien act. Neither is money expended in the payment of the salaries of the president of the construction company and its other general officers, although properly chargeable to the contract company, as between it and the construction company. Nor were the expenses of the construction company for stationery, and like office material, lienable claims. The construction company paid $2,346.29 to a trust company to secure its guaranty upon a contract made by the construction company for the purchase of steel rails. Appellant insists that this expenditure constitutes a part of the actual cost of the steel rails which it had contracted to furnish for the completion of the road. We think that that expenditure was one resulting alone from its own want of sufficient cash capital, or its own insufficient credit, and that no such expenditure was within the meaning or spirit of the contract between it and the contract company. If its own capital or credit had been sufficient, no such expense need have been incurred; and the contract makes no provision, directly or indirectly, for compensating the construction company for expenses directly due to its own insufficient capital or credit. The construction company paid out some $10,000 for legal expenses incurred in purchasing or condemning rights of way. The court held such expenditures were not lienable. There was no error in this, for two reasons: First, because the furnishing of rights of way is not the furnishing of "materials," within the meaning of the lien act; second, legal services rendered by counsel are not "labor," within the meaning of the lien statute.

5. Each of the appellants has filed numerous assignments of error touching the improper exclusion of items of expenditure which it is now insisted should have been included in ascertaining the total original contract price entitled to the statutory lien, and to be prorated among all who contributed to the proper work of construction. It is sufficient to say that we have given careful attention to the various assignments and the evidence relating to them upon which this class of objections to the decree have been presented to this court, and we find that none of the assignments of error to the manner in which the original contract price was ascertained are well taken. The deduction from the gross contract price of a sum regarded as necessary on the evidence for the completion of the railroad seems to us to be well supported by the weight of proof. Error has been assigned because of an alleged erroneous deduction from the gross contract price on account of the agreement of the contract company to pay the interest upon the bonds of the railroad company during its construction, and two instalments after the completion, of the road. We are of opinion that the ruling of the circuit court upon this point was correct. It was very essential to the contract company that the interest upon the bonds should be provided for during construction, and for such a period thereafter as it was reasonable to presume that the earnings of the road would be insufficient to pay. As the prospective owner of the bonds to be issued, it was directly interested in the maintenance of the credit of the railroad company. And so much of the contract as obligated the contract company to maintain the credit of the railroad company seems to have been based upon this obvious proposition. This agreement was not, in our judgment, at all dependent upon the operation of the road as completed by the Louisville Southern Railroad Company. It was an absolute contract to pay accruing interest for the time indicated, and formed a considerable element in the determination of the contract price. The interest unpaid was properly deducted from the contract price, and all the assignments of error relating thereto are overruled.

6. The decree allowed none of the subcontractors interest except from the date of the final decree. This has been assigned as error. We have already passed upon this matter, so far as the construction company is interested. The disallowance of interest seems to have been based upon the assumption that there was no contract between the contract company and the subcontractors for the payment of interest, and that the allowance of interest upon such claims, in the absence of a local statute, was within the sound discretion of the court. The court seemed also to attach importance to the fact that the litigation which has resulted in delay was not vexatious, but necessary for the proper marshaling of liens. The question divides itself: First, is interest properly allowable as between the contract company and its subcontractors? Second, is there any reason which should move the conscience of a chancellor to disallow interest because of its indirect effect upon the rights of another class of creditors? In general terms, it may be stated that the contracts between the contract company and its subcontractors provided for payments of a proportionate part of the contract price on monthly estimates as the work progressed, and for payment of all balances due on the completion of the work. There seems never to have been any serious controversy as to these balances due to subcontractors, except in regard to a claim for so-called extra work and materials asserted by the appellant Walker and others. Their claims were not paid because the contract company was unable to pay them, and not because it disputed its liability. As between the contract company and the subcontractors, there can be no serious contention but that interest should be paid from and after the completion of the work and the filing of their lien notices as required by statute. That filing is the full equivalent of the rendition of a stated account. In the case of Young v. Godbe, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 566, 21 L. ed. 251, the court said with regard to the allowance of interest upon an open account: "If a debt ought to be paid at a particular time, and is not, owing to the default of the debtor, the creditor is entitled to interest from that time by way of compensation for the delay in payment. And if the account be stated, as the evidence went to show was the case here, interest begins to run at once."

This rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States seems to be in entire accord with the latest utterances of the supreme court of the state of Kentucky. In the case of Henderson Cotton Mfg. Co. v. Lowell Machine Shops, 86 Ky. 668, 675, the court said, concerning the allowance of interest upon an account for machinery sold and payable at a definite time by agreement of the parties: "The true ground upon which to put the allowance of interest is the fault of the party who is to pay the debt. If he has made default of payment, then, ex aequo et bono, he should reimburse the creditor for keeping him out of the use of his money. He should render an equivalent for the use of what is not his own. If there be a specified time for payment, and a failure to then pay, or a demand of payment of a liquidated claim, and default, then the debt should, as a matter of law, bear interest from the time of such failure. This is the current of authority, and it is supported by both right and reason."

Neither is there anything in the case of Redfield v. Ystalyfera Iron Co. 110 U. S. 174, 28 L. ed. 109; or Thomas v. Western Car Co. 149 U. S. 116, 37 L. ed. 670, which conflicts with the doctrine as stated in Young v. Godbe and Henderson Cotton Mfg. Co. v. Lowell Machine Shops, cited above. In Redfield v. Ystalyfera Iron Co. Mr. Justice Matthews, in discussing this question, said, for the court: "Interest is given on money demands as damages for delay in payment, being just compensation to the plaintiff for a default on the part of his debtor. Where it is reserved expressly in the contract, or is implied by the nature of the promise, it becomes part of the debt, and is recoverable as of right; but when it is given as damages, it is often matter of discretion. In cases like the present one, of recoveries for excessive duties paid under protest, it was held in Erskine v. Van Arsdale, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 75, 21 L. ed. 63, that the jury might add interest, the plaintiff ordinarily being entitled to it from the time of the illegal exaction. But where interest is recoverable, not as a part of the contract, but by way of damages, if the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in unreasonably delaying the prosecution of his claim, it may be properly withheld. Bann v. Daltell, 8 Car. & P. 876; Newell v. Keith, 11 Vt. 214; Adams Exp. Co. v. Milton, 11 Bush, 49."

In Thomas v. Western Car Co., heretofore cited, there seems to have been no definite time agreed upon as to payment, and interest was disallowed because, as the court said, the delay in payment "was occasioned by resisting demands made by the car company, which the result of the litigation shows were excessive, if not extortionate." The contract company was in default, and interest is properly allowable from the time it failed to pay according to its promise, by way of compensation for the delay in payment. Neither is there anything in the fact that the railroad company is insolvent, nor in the fact that the allowance of interest will diminish the fund to which the bondholders may look for the payment of their bonds. The language relied upon in support of the decree disallowing interest, from the opinion in Thomas v. Western Car Co., that "as a general rule, after property of an insolvent passes into the hands of a receiver, or of an assignee in insolvency, interest is not allowable on the claims against the funds," was not a point upon which that case turned, and was doubtless intended to apply only to a case where the fund is insufficient to pay all, and the creditors are all of the same rank, as in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent bank, as in United States, White, v. Knox, 111 U. S. 784, 28 L. ed. 603, and Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 8 C. C. A. 155, 59 Fed. Rep. 872, 16 U. S. App. 465, 28 L. R. A. 281. This is not a case of the distribution of an insufficient fund among lienors of the same rank. The lien claims of the subcontractors are by the statute preferred over the mortgage, and the bondholders are entitled only to that which remains after senior liens are satisfied. If interest is properly due, as between creditor and debtor, the interest is just as much a part of the principal claim as the principal thereof. A like controversy arose in the case of Central Trust Co. v. Condon (decided by this court March 5, 1895), 81 U. S. App. 887, 67 Fed. Rep. 84. There, as here, the contest was between subcontractors and mortgage creditors. The distinctions between the two cases is that, under the Tennessee statute construed in that case, the lien of the subcontractor was derived from, and subordinate to, the lien of the contractor, and his recovery against the property of the owner was limited to such sum as might be found due the principal contractor at the time the several subcontractors' liens accrued. The question in that case was as to the extent of the liability of the railroad property to the contractor. Judge Taft, who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, concerning these subcontractors' liens, said: "They were liens superior to the bonds. They should bear interest, or, what is the same thing, the fund from which they are payable should bear interest until paid. The security and priority of the lien attach as well to interest as to principal. The aggregate of the subcontractors' claims exceeds by at least 50 per cent the sum due Eager, even with interest, so that in the distribution no interest need be calculated on the claims after December 15, 1890, for the share applicable to each will not be varied by adding interest to all claims for the same period from December 15, 1890, to the date of the decree. But the limit in the aggregate of the liens fixed on the property must be increased by interest until satisfaction. This is not a case where the distribution is to be made pro rata between the lienholders and the bondholders, in which case, of course, interest is not to be calculated upon the claims after the time of the sequestration of the property for sale and distribution, so long as the claims cannot be paid in full. Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 16 U. S. App. 465, 8 C. C. A. 155, 59 Fed. Rep. 872, 28 L. R. A. 281. In the distribution of the proceeds of a common security between liens of different priorities, we know of no principle by which interest can be stopped on the amount of the superior lien until its satisfaction. As between the bondholders and the lienholders, the lienholders are entitled to interest to the day of payment, and the decree should therefore include interest on the amount herein found due Eager from December 15, 1890, until it shall be entered."

One error assigned by appellant Walker and others needs to be especially noticed. J. W. Walker had a contract with the contract company for the erection of four bridges, for which he was to receive the sum of $146,200. One of these bridges was known as the "Marble Creek Bridge," and its price was to be $37,000. During the erection of this bridge a large portion of it fell into a deep ravine, destroying or seriously damaging a large part of the material which had been placed in the incomplected structure. New material, of the value of $15,828.62, was furnished by Mr. Walker, and replaced in the bridge. The court declined to allow this claim, being of opinion that the loss should fall upon him, and not upon the contract company, nor upon the railroad company. The cause of the accident is unexplained. The employees of the bridge contractor were in the exclusive control of the work. The bridge fell, not from any violent storm, or by reason of any extraordinary natural cause. The clear inference is that it fell by reason of defective engineering; that it was insufficiently supported, or subjected by the bridge builders to some unnecessary strain. Appellant insists that he should be reimbursed for the new material: First. Because he alleges that the contract company agreed to reimburse him for the material destroyed by the falling of this bridge. We quite agree with the master and the district judge who tried this case, that appellant did not successfully sustain his contentions to an agreement to reimburse him for the new material necessitated by the falling of the bridge. Second. He insists that the title to the material damaged or destroyed was in the contract company, and that therefore it ought to sustain the loss. This contention is bottomed upon the fact that the agreement provided for the payment of the contract price in instalments, as the material was delivered on the ground, less 10 per cent of the value thereof. The contract concluded as follows:

The balance of the contract price for each structure, including the 10 per cent reserved on the monthly estimates, is to become due and payable as each structure is completed and inspected and approved, according to both specifications attached hereto. As payments are made upon the material, the title to the same is to become vested pro rata in the party of the second part.

The proof fails to show that the material was in fact paid for as delivered, to any considerable extent. But we are of opinion that, even if the material had been in part paid for, so that the title had vested in proportion to the payments in the contract company, under the circumstances of this case the appellant ought not to be allowed to recover the value of this material destroyed by an accident for which his own employees were manifestly respon-

v.

STATE of Alabama.

(106 Ala. 35.)

A constitutional provision "that no person shall be imprisoned for debt" is violated by act December 12, 1892, making it a misdemeanor for a person engaged in banking to receive a deposit when insolvent, and punishing it with a fine not less than double the amount of the deposit, one half of which shall go to the depositor, and that payment to him before conviction shall be a defense to prosecution.

The principal case of CARR v. STATE might be distinguished from similar cases upon the constitutionality of like statutes to be found in other states, upon the ground that the Alabama Constitution does not except fraud from the constitutional inhibition against imprisonment for debt, yet it is difficult to reconcile the decision with that of Ex parte King (Ala.) infra, VII., wherein the court upheld the constitutionality of an act passed for the protection of landlords against dishonest persons upon the ground that the party was punished, not for owing a debt, but for the wrongdoing, which was by the act made a crime. It would seem that if the act of a party violating the law as to landlords and others is to be deemed within the statutes passed against false pretenses, frauds, cheats, acts to injure and the like, so ought the act of a banker receiving a deposit when insolvent to be held within such statutes; and the courts of the other states have so held. See infra, VII.

So, there would seem to be a difference between the act of a banker refusing to honor or cash a check as shown in the case of State v. Paint Rock Coal & C. Co. 92 Tenn. 81, infra, VII., and that of a banker receiving money knowing himself or his bank to be insolvent.

The position of debtor and creditor exists in the first instance, while in the latter, although it exists, it is attained by fraud, false pretense, or other wrongful act.

I. General extent and construction of constitutional provisions.

The legality or illegality of imprisonment for 34 L. R. A.

debt depends entirely upon the construction to be placed upon the articles in the several state Constitutions prohibiting imprisonment for debt, and the state statutes passed for the purpose of carrying out such constitutional inhibitions.

As a general rule it may be stated that the inhibitions contained in the state Constitutions relate only to debts arising out of contracts, express or implied, that is, to actions ex contractu, and have no application to cases of tort wherein the action is ex delicto in its nature, for the reason that the damages recovered therein do not arise from any contract entered into between the parties, but are imposed upon the defendant for the wrong he has done, and are considered as a punishment therefor.

In this connection it has been stated that it is a sound rule, to be adopted in construing such constitutional provisions, that such charters of liberty are always to be interpreted, not only in the light of the common law, but also by comparison with previously existing Constitutions. Ex parte Hardy, 68 Ala. 303.

So, statutes in restraint of personal liberty are to be construed strictly with a reference to current decisions and the usual practice which existed at the time of and before their adoption. Hamsay v. Foy, 10 Ind. 498.

The object of such statutes being to prevent fraud, they should be strictly construed as to the debtor, and liberally as to the creditor. Wendover v. Tucker, 4 Ind. 381.

It is the policy of the law relating to arrests for debt to throw around the person of the debtor every proper safeguard, and the provisions relating thereto must be construed favorably to the personal liberty of the individual. Newcomb v. Weber, 1 Cin. Super. Ct. Rep. 12, 16.

So, the courts have held that such constitutions, so far as they prohibit imprisonment for debt, were designed to relieve from imprisonment debtors who were unable to fulfil their engagement, provided such debtors acted in good faith toward their creditors. People, Brennan, v. Cotton, 14 Ill. 414.

The following cases are the same in effect: Cowles v. Day, 30 Conn. 403, 412; Ex parte Clark, 20 N. J. L. 643, 45 Am. Dec. 394; Moak v. De Forrest, 5 Hill. 605; National Bank v. Temple, 39 How. Pr. 432, 435, 2 Sweeny, 344; People, Latorre, v. O'Brien, 6 Abb. Fr. N. S. 63; Wanser v. De Baun, 1 E. D. Smith, 261, 264; State v. Manuel, 4 Dev. & B. L. 20, 34; Brown v. Walk, 3 Fred. L. 517, 520.

No man can be imprisoned for mere inability to pay his contract debts, nor for failure to pay over to a receiver money which he does not have. Warren v. Rosenberg (Wis.) 69 N. W. 339.

The mere inability to pay debts is no longer to be regarded as deserving of punishment, such a remedy for the collection of debts being too harsh. Armstrong v. Ayres, 19 Conn. 540, 555.

The harshness which attended the old practice when a capias ad satisfaciendum, or a capias ad respondendum was allowed, led to the constitutional provisions, but yet they should not be construed as confined to arrests on such writs alone. Goshorn v. Purcell, 11 Ohio St. 641, 649; White v. Gates, 42 Ohio St. 109.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Cobert County convicting him of receiving, contrary to the provisions of the statute, a deposit in his bank knowing at the time that the bank was insolvent. Reversed.

And even under state statutes regulating proceedings against debtors, in order to render the proceedings taken thereunder constitutional, the provisions of such acts must be substantially complied with in order to render the imprisonment of the debtor constitutional, for the reason that the mere fact that the defendant is in debt does not subject him to arrest, neither does the fact that he suffers an execution to remain in the hands of the officers unsatisfied, when he is of sufficient ability to pay it, even though it may clearly be his duty to do so, a mere neglect of duty not justifying the creditor in resorting to harsh measures. Maher v. Huette, 10 Ill. App. 58. Here § 12 of the Illinois Bill of Rights was construed along with §§ 62 and 63 of the Illinois Statutes of 1872, relating to judgments and decrees, which prescribed the manner in which and the circumstances under which an execution against the body of the defendant for the causes named in the exceptions in the state Constitution might be mentioned.

So, in view of the constitutional inhibition, it has been uniformly held that in order to justify a resort to arrest, all the provisions of the law relating thereto must be complied with. Huntington v. Metzger, 51 Ill. App. 222, 224.

Where the provisions of a state Constitution provided that "no person shall be imprisoned for debt, except in case of fraud," it was held that its provisions were so limited in their scope, so clear and well defined, that their full force was easily understood and applied without difficulty, whether they were considered as restrictions upon inherent, or conditions of granted power, to the full extent of the provision being tangible and definable, reaching to a single ill, full effect being given to it without difficulty. State, St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co., v. Nemaha County Comrs. 7 Kan. 555.

Such a constitutional provision practically precludes imprisonment, except as a punishment for acts of a criminal or quasi-criminal character, and leaves the unfortunate but honest debtor free from any possibility of personal restraint. Doyle v. Boyle, 19 Kan. 168, 172.

Again, in Atchison Street R. Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 31 Kan. 660, 665, such declarations were said to be clear, precise, and definite limitations of the power of the legislature, and of every officer and agency of the people, their meaning and extent being clear, limiting the power of the legislature; no act of that body being sustainable which conflicts with them.

So, it has been stated that the provisions of a state Constitution upon this question ought to have a common-sense interpretation; that is, they ought to be understood in the sense in which they were construed by those adopting them, and that even though it was a well-recognized canon of construction that where legal terms were used in a statute they were to receive their technical meaning unless the contrary clearly appears to have been the intention of the legislature, that principle does not apply to the organic law, which is to be construed, according to the acceptance of those who adopted it, as the supreme rule of conduct both for officials and individuals, the evident intention of such Constitution being to relieve those who could not pay their debts, and not to shield from punishment persons who had violated the public law. State v. Mace, 5 Md. 337, 350.

Where the state Constitution provided that no person should be arrested or imprisoned on any civil process issued out of any court of law, or on any execution issued out of any court of equity, in any suit or proceeding instituted for the recovery of any money due upon any judgment or decrees founded on contract, or due upon any contract express or implied, or for the recovery of any damages for the nonperformance of any contract, it was held that if its language was to be taken according to its ordinary acceptance and meaning, it must be intended to prohibit arrest and imprisonment on civil process absolutely, in existing as well as in future cases, the terms being clear and explicit, although under the rule of construction that no statute should be construed retrospectively, unless the intention of the legislature to give it such effect clearly appeared, it must be concluded that the legislature did not intend to make the law apply to pre-existing cases. Bronson v. Newberry, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 33, 43. In that case, however, the subsequent section excluded such a construction, its language being too plain and positive to be misunderstood.

So, the true spirit of the New Jersey Constitution would seem to be, that the honest debtor who was poor and had nothing to pay with should be exempt from imprisonment at the mercy of his creditor. Ex parte Clark, 20 N. J. L. 648, 45 Am. Dec. 394.

And the same is the spirit of the North Carolina Constitution, when the insolvency of the debtor is bona fide. State v. Manuel, 4 Dev. & B. L. 20, 34; Brown v. Walk, 8 Ired. L. 517, 520; Burton v. Dickens, 3 Murph. (N. C.) 108; Burgwyn v. Hall, 108 N. C. 489.

In Mims v. Lockett, 20 Ga. 474, 476, it is stated that there are only three things for which a ca. sa. debtor may be imprisoned. If, when the court comes to which his case is returnable, he has failed to give notice to his creditor regarding his intention to take advantage of the insolvent debtor's act, or refuses at that time to take the oath, or is convicted of fraud by the jury, the debtor may be committed; and in the first two cases the confinement will terminate whenever he has complied with the requirements of the statute, and in the third case notwithstanding the fraud the debtor cannot be kept in custody after he has made a full surrender of his effects; and it is erroneous to suppose that when a debtor is incarcerated upon the finding of a jury, he is deprived of his liberty until he discharges the debt. Such law would be in the teeth of the Constitution; and in view of the state Constitution, to say nothing of the strong tendency of the public mind to abolish entirely imprisonment for debt, the insolvent laws are entitled to a liberal construction in favor of the debtor.

In Messenger v. Lockwood, 9 West. L. J. O. S. (Ohio) 621, the defendant was arrested upon a ca. sa. in a suit brought for breach of contract, the cause assigned for the writ being that he was a nonresident of the state, but he was discharged on common bail, the court stating that the incarceration of a man's body would not be tolerated simply because he did not reside in the state, no fraud or crime being committed within the meaning of the Constitution.

So, in Morrow & Hazzard v. Finch, 7 West. L. J. O. S. (Ohio) 144, it was held that nonresidence, or want of citizenship of a debtor, was not sufficient to authorize the arrest of a citizen of another state; and further, that to arrest a citizen of another state under the Ohio laws was a violation of art. 4, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Asa E. Stratton, James Jackson, and Isaac Orme for appellant.

Mr. W. C. Fitts, Attorney General, for the State.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, Hinton E. Carr, is charged in one count as the president, and in another as a member, of a banking firm, with receiving

II. What are debts.

a. Meaning of the word "debt."

In considering the question of the constitutionality of imprisonment for debt, the question arises as to what are debts within the meaning of the constitutional provisions. There would, however, seem to be very little conflict in the authorities, which almost unanimously hold that the debt intended to be covered by the Constitution must be a debt arising exclusively from actions ex contractu, and was never meant to include damages arising in actions ex delicto, or fines, penalties, and other impositions imposed by the courts in criminal proceedings as punishments for crimes committed against the common or state law.

Such inhibition, however, exists only where the contract is free from fraud, the Constitutions of nearly all the states excepting cases of fraud, and making that a ground of imprisonment. Alabama would appear to be the only state which does not make the exception in cases of fraud. Kennedy v. People, 122 Ill. 649, 652; People v. Brennan, v. Cotton, 14 Ill. 414, 415; McCool v. State, 23 Ind. 127, 131; Lower v. Wallick, 25 Ind. 68; Ex parte Bergman, 18 Nev. 331; Long v. McLean, 88 N. C. 8; Moore v. Green, 73 N. C. 394, 21 Am. Rep. 470; United States v. Walsh, Deady, 231, 235.

Liabilities arising ex contractu are not punishable by imprisonment in Pennsylvania in the absence of fraud. Hammer v. Ladner, 17 Phila. 315.

It has been held that imprisonment for debt has been forbidden on process issuing from a court of the United States in any state where, by the local law, imprisonment for debt has been or shall be abolished, and all modifications, conditions, and restrictions upon such imprisonment provided by the law of any state are made applicable to Federal process, to be executed therein, under § 990 of the Revised Statutes; but imprisonment for debt as used in that and like statutory or constitutional provisions means debts arising out of contract, and does not extend to actions for tort, nor to fines or penalties arising from a violation of the penal laws of the state. Deimel v. Arnold, 34 U. S. App. 177, 185, 60 Fed. Rep. 937, 932; Lathrop v. Singer, 39 Barb. 393; Kennedy v. People, and McCool v. State, supra; Hanson v. Fowle, 1 Sawy. 497; Long v. McLean, supra; United States v. Walsh, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 66; Harris v. Bridges, 57 Ga. 407, 4 Am. Rep. 495, and Ex parte Bergman, supra.

So, in Dixon v. State, 2 Tex. 431, it is said the words "imprisonment for debt" have a well-defined and well-known meaning, and have never been understood or held to apply to criminal proceedings. It is not to be supposed, and it will scarcely be contended, that it ever entered into the minds of the framers of the Constitution that they were to be understood as having any application to the administration of the criminal laws, or that they were to have the effect of preventing the punishment of crimes.

Again, in United States v. Walsh, Deady, 231, 235, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 71, it is stated: "The word 'debt' is of very general use, and has many shades of meaning. Looking to the origin and progress of the change in public opinion, which finally led to the abolition of imprisonment for debt, it is reasonable to presume that this provision in the state Constitution was intended to prevent the useless and often cruel imprisonment of persons who, having honestly become indebted to another, are unable to pay as they undertook and promised to."

In this view of the matter, the clause in question should be construed as if it read: "There shall be no imprisonment for debt arising upon contract express or implied except, etc."

And it has been stated that the word "debt" is of large import, including not only debts of record, or judgments, and debts of specialty, but also obligations under simple contract to a very wide extent; and in its popular sense includes all that is due to a man under any form of obligation or promise. Re Sutherland, 3 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 314, in which case the question arose whether a fine amounted to a debt.

So, the legal acceptance of debt has been said to be a sum of money due by certain and express agreement. Re Sutherland, supra, citing 3 Bl. Com. 154.

Again, in Turner v. Wilson, 49 Ind. 581, 584, where the contention was that a sum of money ordered to be paid by the father of an illegitimate child for its support was a debt within the meaning of § 22 of art. 1 of the Indiana Constitution, the court stated that a debt was a sum of money due by agreement, which must be certain; as to amount and arise upon contract, and that under the system of common-law pleading, at the time of the adoption of the Indiana Constitution, and before the distinction between forms of action was abolished by the Code of that state, the word "debt" in law had no other meaning, and therefore it must be supposed that the framers of the Constitution so understood and used the word; and further, that the words of the Constitution could not be fairly understood in any other sense, inasmuch as in the section abolishing imprisonment for debt, the words "any debt or liability thereafter contracted" are expressly used.

And the cases McCool v. State, 23 Ind. 127; Lower v. Wallick, 25 Ind. 68; Ex parte Tesque, 41 Ind. 273; State v. Billman, v. Hamilton, 33 Ind. 502; Reynolds v. Lamont, 45 Ind. 303; and Ex parte Volts, 37 Ind. 237,—are to the same effect.

It must be a debt within the proper and legal meaning of that term. McCool v. State, 23 Ind. 127, 131.

The term "debt" as used by the convention in framing the Maryland Constitution was meant to be used in its popular sense, and was so understood by the people, and was regarded as a protection to the unfortunate, and not as an immunity to the criminal, the term "debt" being understood as an obligation arising otherwise than from the sentence of a court, or a breach of the public peace, or the commission of a crime. State v. Mace, 5 Md. 337, 350.

The term "debt," as employed in § 15 of the Constitution of North Dakota, is used in a broad sense, and will embrace such obligations to pay money as arise upon the law, as well as those which arise upon contract. Granholm v. Sweigle, 3 N. D. 473.

In Perry v. Orr, 35 N. J. L. 295, 298, it was stated that the 1st clause of § 17 of art. 1 of N. J. Const. 1844, "no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any action," was not confined to the technical meaning of debt, but included debt in the popular sense of a demand founded on contract, express or implied, and comprised all actions ex contractu, the purpose of the legislature being to abolish imprisonment for debt coextensive with the 1st and 2d sections of the Statute of 1842, leaving it to the legislature to define what should constitute fraud, and therefore the statute, after the Constitution was established, stood in harmony with its provisions, and was not repealed by it.

The provisions in Wis. Const. § 16, art. 1, "no person shall be imprisoned for debt arising out of or founded on contract, express or implied," clearly implies that there may be debts "not founded upon contract." Smith v. Omans, 17 Wis. 566, 397.

And the 39th section of the North Carolina Constitution has been held to have no application to debts due the state. State v. Manuel, 4 Dev. & B. L. 20, 26.

There would not, however, seem to be any authority holding that the constitutional inhibition has any greater import, or includes other debts, than those above specified.

This would seem to be so, for the reason that in construing the meaning of the word "debt," the court in the case of United States v. Walsh, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 71, Deady, 231, 235, stated that a person who willfully injures another in person, property, or character is liable therefor in damages, and in some sense he may be called the debtor of the party injured, and the sum due for the injury might be considered a debt to such a party, but he is in fact a wrongdoer and trespasser, and does not come within the reason of the rule exempting an honest man from imprisonment, because he is peculiarly unable to pay that which he has promised.

The construction given to the word "debt" by the court in the case of United States v. Walsh, supra, was commented upon and adopted by the court in Norman v. Manclette, 1 Sawy. 484, and also in Hanson v. Fowle, Id. 497, 505.

And the word "debt" when used in a statute without some plain or explicit declaration making it applicable thereto does not include taxes nor claims for unliquidated damages. The legal definition of the word is opposed to unliquidated damages, or a liability in the sense of an inchoate or contingent debt, or an obligation not enforceable by ordinary process. Bolden v. Jensen, 69 Fed. Rep. 745.

b. In general.

In Ruddell v. Childress, 31 Ark. 511, proceedings were taken by a surety against his principal under § 5694 of Gantt's Digest, which provides that a surety may maintain an action against his principal to obtain indemnity against the debt or liability for which he is bound before it is due, whenever any of the grounds exist upon which, by the provisions of chapters 8 and 9, an order may be made for arrest and bail or for attachment; and it was held that such proceedings were not contrary to the provisions contained in § 14, art. 1, of the Constitution of that state of 1868, which prohibits imprisonment for debt, but provides that the general assembly may provide for imprisonment or holding to bail persons charged with fraud in contracting said debt, the court stating that such a case was not the arrest of a debtor for debt, but was a proceeding to indemnify the surety in the manner pointed out by the section.

An amount due upon an open account was held to be a debt within the meaning of art. 1, § 15, of the California Constitution. Re Vinich, 86 Cal. 70.

So, the Michigan Constitution having abolished imprisonment for debt, except in certain cases therein set forth, an alleged balance between a principal and agent for which an action of debt is brought does not come within the exceptions to the Michigan laws passed to carry out such constitutional provisions, even though there may be an allegation of a refusal to account, and of a fraudulent conversion of the same by the agent to his own use. People, Singer Mfg. Co., v. McAllister, 19 Mich. 215.

Again, where the claim against an agent was a debt, and the action was a civil one, and the process wherewith the defendant was arrested was a meane process, and there was nothing whatever to show any fraud, or suspicion of fraud, on defendant's part, or a demand or refusal of payment, the court held that § 15 of art. 1 of the California Constitution prohibiting arrest and imprisonment for debt applied, and that § 7 of the California practice act of 1860, upon which the plaintiff relied, should be construed so as not to conflict with the Constitution, and that if such construction were not possible the statute must yield to the Constitution. Re Holdforth, 1 Cal. 438.

And where the case made out, in an action commenced by capias, was that the defendant had collected moneys as superintendent of a company and had not accounted for the same upon demand, it was held that the defendant's arrest and imprisonment was illegal, being in conflict with the Michigan laws, the debt arising upon contract, it not being a loan, an action for which was allowed to be so commenced. Re Stephenson, 33 Mich. 60.

And, imprisonment for debt having been abolished by the Constitution of Georgia, an attachment for contempt is not a remedy for obliging the payment of a mere debt from executors under a will to a legatee, adjudged upon citation to account by the ordinary under § 2508 of the Code of that state. Wood v. Wood, 84 Ga. 102.

Again, a sum lost in gaming does not come within § 549 of the New York Code, as being an injury to property including the wrongful taking, detention, or conversion of personal property, for the reason that the same is a debt and recoverable in an action for money had and received, and therefore an arrest made in an action to recover the same is illegal, and the order therefore will be set aside. Tompkins v. Smith, 62 How. Pr. 409. In this case, however, there were no constitutional provisions to be construed, the question turning upon the right to imprison the defendant under the provisions of the Code.

In Ex parte Prader, 6 Cal. 239, where the petitioner was arrested on final process to answer a judgment obtained against him in an action for assault and battery, the court held that assault and battery was not a case of fraud, in the sense that the term was employed by the Constitution, and could not be made so by the legislature, and therefore the judgment was a debt as much as though recovered in an action of assumpsit. The defendant was therefore discharged from arrest.

Under the provisions of the Illinois Constitution prohibiting imprisonment for debt, any liability to pay money growing out of contract, express or implied, constitutes a debt within the meaning of such constitutional provisions; and therefore before a party can be held to bail on a capias ad respondendum, it must appear by affidavit that he has been guilty of fraud, or that there is a strong presumption that he is guilty, and the affidavit must show both the constitutional and statutory grounds before issuing the writ. Parker v. Follensbee, 45 Ill. 473, 478.

In Vermont the Constitution prohibits imprisonment for debt in cases where the debtor has delivered up his property for the benefit of his creditors in the manner provided by law, and it has been held that the provision of the Vermont statute of January, 1839, that no person who is a resident citizen of the state shall be arrested upon an execution issued upon a judgment recovered in an action founded upon contract, express or implied, was meant to embrace all kinds of contracts, whether by record, specialty, or parol. Therefore a judgment is a contract within the meaning of § 63 of chapter 28 of the Vermont Revised Statutes, and an execution obtained in an action of debt upon a judgment rendered after January, 1888, cannot be issued against the body of the debtor. Sawyer v. Vilas, 19 Vt. 43.

Failing or Insolvent Condition," approved December 12, 1892, which is in the following words:

And in that state on all judgments rendered on contracts accruing before the 1st day of January, 1880, the creditor was entitled to an execution against the body of the debtor with some exceptions, but on judgment rendered on contracts, express or implied, made or entered into after that date, no writ or execution could issue against the body of the debtor if he was a citizen of Vermont. The statute which took away the remedy against the body of the debtor in the latter contracts made no provision for a case where the judgment was rendered on different contracts, some of which were before and some after that date. But the courts of that state were of opinion that if a party voluntarily embraced in any one declaration several acts on different contracts and several on which he would have been entitled to a capias, and on the others would not have been so entitled, he could not on such judgment have an entire execution against the body of the debtor, and the same principles would apply to a recovery in an action on a book account where part of the demand was since the passing of the statute abolishing imprisonment. Witt v. Marsh, 14 Vt. 303, 306.

Where, in a judgment on the report of an auditor, the court granted a certified execution as to so much of the judgment as was for money held in a fiduciary capacity, and the writ issued as an attachment, and the defendant took exception under the Vermont Statute, § 1728, which provides that no person who is a resident of the United States shall be arrested or imprisoned on mesne process, issuing on a contract express or implied, nor on an execution issued on a judgment recovered in an action founded on such contract, except as hereinafter provided,—it was held that as part of the judgment was not for a fiduciary debt, it was for a liability incurred when the defendant contracted to guarantee certain sales, and therefore a judgment founded in part upon the defendant's contract of guaranty could not be enforced against his body, nor could an execution on such a judgment lawfully issue against the body, the section of the statute in question expressly prohibiting the arrest upon a judgment founded in contract, and the statute nowhere provided for the arrest and imprisonment of a debtor on an execution issued on such a judgment as was recovered in that action. Williams & C. Fertilizer Co. v. Rudd, 68 Vt. 607.

In Hosack v. Rogers, 11 Paige, 603, it was held that since the passing of the New York act abolishing imprisonment for debt, a final decree against an executor for the payment of a debt due by the testator can only be enforced by execution against the individual property of the executor, where he has wasted the funds which came into his hands, the decree being made in a suit instituted for the recovery of money due upon a contract, and merely directing the payment of money in satisfaction of the amount due.

Where the action was brought on a warranty, but the narr. was in assumpsit, alleging fraud in the warranty, the court held that a ca. sa. would not lie. Fleming v. Maguire, 14 W. N. C. 210. The Pennsylvania Constitution abolishes imprisonment 84 L. R. A.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Alabama, that any president, cashier, or other officer, by whatever title he may be called for debt except in cases where the debtor has not delivered up his property for the benefit of his creditors as prescribed by law.

Where defendant, an agent, was sued in trover, required to find bail, and in default was committed to jail, and the plaintiff elected to take an alternative verdict for money, to be discharged on the defendant's delivering the package, and the defendant sought to be discharged upon the ground that he was imprisoned for debt contrary to the terms of the Constitution, the court held that the verdict authorized a judgment for money, which, when entered, became a judgment for money, or the highest form of debt known to the law, and therefore the defendant's imprisonment for such debt was contrary to the provisions of the state Constitution, although, had the verdict been for the delivery of the package alone, it would have been against the property, and not for debt, and therefore would not have been within the constitutional provisions. Southern Exp. Co. v. Lynch, 65 Ga. 240.

In Meyer v. Berlandi, 30 Minn. 435, 1 L. R. A. 777, § 3 of chap. 170 of the Minnesota General Laws of 1887, known as the mechanic's lien law, which made the mere failure of a contractor, who had received his pay from the owner, to pay his laborers and materialmen, although he might not be guilty of any fraud, a felony punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, was held unconstitutional, as fairly repugnant to § 13 of art. 1 of the state Constitution prohibiting imprisonment for debt, inasmuch as it was a return to the old barbarous fiction upon which imprisonment for debt was originally based, namely, that a man who owed a debt, and did not pay it, was a trespasser against the peace and dignity of the Crown, and for this supposititious crime was liable to arrest and imprisonment.

So, the act of bail indorsing his name on the writ has been held, in proceedings by way of audita querela, to be a contract between the bail and the creditor, and as such within § 63, chap. 28, of the Revised Statutes of Vermont, and therefore the execution against the body of such bail, in proceedings by way of scire facias, was illegally issued; and that the plaintiff (the debtor) was entitled to his writ. Stoughton v. Barrett, 20 Vt. 385.

And in Atobison Bd. of Edu. v. Scoville, 13 Kan. 17, 33, it was held that under § 16 of the Kansas Bill of Rights an order against a garnishee could not be enforced by his imprisonment, and that § 490 of the Civil Code, which provided that the court or judge may order the money to be applied towards satisfaction of the judgment, and "may enforce the same by proceedings for contempt in case of refusal or disobedience," probably did not mean that the court might imprison a garnishee for not paying money which he owed (a debt) into court, or to a judgment creditor, but even if they did so mean the words were unconstitutional to that extent.

In Stroheim v. Deimel, 73 Fed. Rep. 420, 436, where the action was on the case for false representations in obtaining goods on credit, the court held that although the general rule was, that constitutional provisions abolishing imprisonment for debt did not necessarily include or comprehend imprisonment on a judgment in an action ex delicto, yet in cases within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, § 990, U. S. Rev. Stat., which prohibits imprisonment for debt, and declares that all modifications and restrictions imposed by state statutes shall apply, was to be construed as including under the term "imprisonment for debt" actions ex delicto in cases where the state statute was to be construed in favor of personal liberty, such a judgor known, of any bank, banking firm, or corporation engaged in a banking business, or any other person or persons, engaged in said business, or the agent or agents thereof, who shall receive for deposit any bank notes, specie money, or other thing of value, knowing at ment debtor being in fact "imprisoned for debt" within the fair scope of the words, the creditor's right being in the nature of a property right, which a statute or Constitution abolishing imprisonment for debt in effect takes away from the creditor.

The above case of Stroheim v. Deimel was, however, appealed (77 Fed. Rep. 802), and it was contended that the proposition in the opinion below, that § 900, U. S. Rev. Stat., was applicable to judgments for torts, was inconsistent with the opinion of the court in Deimel v. Arnold, 34 U. S. App. 177, 69 Fed. Rep. 987, wherein it was said that imprisonment for debt, as used in this and like statutory provisions, means debts arising out of contracts, and does not extend to actions for tort, nor the fines or penalties arising from a violation of the penal laws of the state; but the court stated that whether the circuit court was justified in treating that part of the opinion as a dictum intended simply as a reiteration of the rule that in a constitutional provision abolishing imprisonment for debt the word "debt" does not necessarily comprehend, and should not be considered as comprehending, judgments in tort, it did not deem it necessary at that time to consider.

It was not the design of the Wisconsin Constitution to wholly abolish what was formerly known as a writ of ca. sa., but only to prohibit its use in a certain class of cases, the inhibition extending its use to imprisonment for debt, arising out of, or founded on, a contract, express or implied, thereby simply prohibiting what had been a remedy in the collection of debts so arising. Re Milburn, 59 Wis. 24, 31.

It has been stated that the language of the Wisconsin Constitution, taken in its broad and proper sense, indicated a right accruing, a sum of money or other thing due or deliverable by virtue of a contract express between the parties, or implied from their acts and circumstances, or on account of a breach of it in respect to some matter provided for or contemplated by them when it was made,—something springing out of the contract and for the enforcement of which resort must be had to it; and seems not to include damages for those wrongful acts which either party may possibly do, and which when done were remotely connected with it, but were not anticipated by them at the time of making it, the act in that case being precisely of that character. Re Mowry, 12 Wis. 52.

See also The Blanche Page, 16 Blatchf. 1, 8, infra, VIII. c.

a. Breach of promise to marry.

It has generally been contended that an action for breach of a promise to marry is based upon contract, the action being for damages for the breach thereof, and therefore within the constitutional provisions prohibiting imprisonment for debt, and such would seem to be the conclusions arrived at by the courts, the defendant being exempt from punishment except in cases where fraud is shown.

In Re Tyson, 32 Mich. 262, the applicant for a writ of habeas corpus and certiorari was arrested on a capias in a civil action issued upon an affidavit charging him simply with a breach of promise to marry. He was held to bail, which was given, but he afterwards surrendered in exoneration of his bail and remained in custody under the writ of capias. It was held that the cause of action was based simply upon a breach of promise to marry, and in the absence of any charge involving fraud it was within the constitutional inhibition against imprisonment for debt contained in art. 4, § 33, of the state Constitution.

So where, in such an action, the defendant was arrested and held to bail, under chap. 17, § 149, N. C. Stat., which provided that the defendant might be arrested as hereinafter prescribed in the following cases, inter alia, on an action on a promise to marry,—the court held that such provision was a violation of the articles of the state Constitution, there being no fraud, a mere breach of promise to marry being no more a case of fraud than a breach of any other promise, and for that reason the prosecution could not be made to include a breach of promise to marry without extending it to a breach of any other contract, the words "except in cases of fraud" being used in a restricted sense, namely, as fraud in procuring a contract to be made, or fraud in attempting to evade performance. Moore v. Mullen, 77 N. C. 327.

The court distinguished the above case from the New Jersey cases infra, which upheld the defendant's arrest in actions of a similar character, upon the ground that in those actions the defendant, in addition to the breach of promise or contract, had been guilty of illegal acts, and had sought to abandon the plaintiff by fleeing from the state, there being additional circumstances which, in those cases, caused the court to consider the case as one of fraud and so within the provisions of the Constitution, while in the case in hand there was no fraud but a mere breach of contract.

A different opinion is, however, held by the court in cases where fraud exists.

In Re Sheahan, 25 Mich. 145, which was an application for a writ of habeas corpus, the petitioner being arrested on a capias in an action for a breach of promise to marry, the court held that whether in actions for breach of promise to marry in general the defendant was liable to arrest or not, yet a case like the one then before the court, which partook of the nature of fraud, seduction being proved, was within the exceptions contained in the provisions of the Constitution relating to imprisonment for debt.

So, where the defendant's contention was that a promise of marriage was a contract for a breach of which the defendant could not be arrested without proof of fraud, either in contracting the obligation, or in his subsequent action to avoid his responsibility, the court stated that if such were an action founded on a contract, it would be within the act respecting imprisonment for debt in cases of fraud, if it were not specially excepted in § 7 of that act, but that the provisions of that act did not extend to actions on promises to marry, the exemption not meaning that a writ of capias ad respondendum should not be awarded in such cases, the classification of such cause of action in the 7th section with contempts, etc., showing that a harsher rule was intended than was applied in cases of breach of ordinary contracts, and that a wider scope was to be given to judicial discretion in holding to bail in such cases, than that prescribed by the statute in mitigation of the rigor of the old law of imprisonment for debt, the New Jersey statute being an exposition of ¶ 7 of art. 1 of the state Constitution, the case being within the exception made in cases of fraud as contained in such constitutions, as fraud was proved against the defendant. Perry v. Orr, 35 N. J. L. 286.

And § 201, ¶ 2, of the Code of North Carolina, which provides that a defendant may be arrested for seduction, is valid and not in conflict with art. 2, § 16, of the state Constitution, though it provides that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud, and damages recovered in such a case not constituting a debt in the sense im-

the time said deposit is received, or having good cause to believe, that such bank, banking firm, corporation, person, or persons are in a failing or insolvent condition, shall for each offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be fined not less than double the amount of said deposit.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that in all plied by that provision. Kinney v. Laughenour, 97 N. C. 325, 327.

III. Actions founded in tort.

a. In general.

As to distinctions between debts and torts, see also supra, II.

The constitutional inhibition as to imprisonment for debt does not apply to cases founded upon torts committed by the defendant, even though it may be contended that the judgment for damages recovered in such action constitutes a debt owing by the defendant to the plaintiff, the Constitution only prohibiting such imprisonment in actions arising ex contractu.

In cases where the ground or form of action is ex delicto, or in tort for damages for a wrong committed, the courts generally hold that the constitutional inhibition does not apply, and therefore a defendant is liable to be imprisoned, not, however, for the debt he owes, but for the wrong he has done, either to the plaintiff himself, or to the public at large. Kennedy v. People, 122 Ill. 649, 652; People v. Brennan, 14 Ill. 414, 415; McCool v. State, 23 Ind. 127, 131; Lower v. Wallick, 25 Ind. 68; Ex parte Bergman, 18 Nev. 331; Long v. McLean, 68 N. C. 8; Moore v. Green, 73 N. C. 394, 21 Am. Rep. 470; United States v. Walsh, Deady, 281, 285.

The provisions of the Alabama Constitution prohibiting imprisonment for debt apply only to actions based on contracts express or implied, and they do not extend to actions originating in tort. Ex parte Hardy, 68 Ala. 303, 316.

In that case it was stated that it was yet to be supposed that the framers of the Constitution intended to prohibit the legislature from authorizing the remedy of incarceration as a means to coerce the payment of damages originating ex delicto, but only of a debt originating ex contractu. Ibid.

The provision of the Illinois Constitution exempting debtors from imprisonment has no application to an action for a tort, as such provision applies only to actions of contract, express or implied. McKindley v. Rising, 23 Ill. 337, 343.

And in such a case the statute must receive its natural construction without the restraining influence of the Constitution, which has been applied to it in cases ex contractu. Ibid.

It has been held that chap. 52, Ill. Rev. Stat., relates to arrests for debts, and has no application to arrests for torts, its object being to carry out the policy of the Constitution that a man shall not be imprisoned on account of his debts if he acts honestly and fairly toward his creditors, and it is confined exclusively to arrests made in suits brought upon contracts, express or implied, such intention being further manifest by the provisions of Ill. act Feb. 23, 1845, which prescribes a different mode for the discharge of those held in custody in final process, in cases not provided for by chap. 52, Rev. Stat. People v. Brennan, 14 Ill. 414.

A Constitution which abolishes imprisonment for debt does not prohibit the legislature from passing a law to imprison on judgments founded on torts. Turner v. Wilson, 49 Ind. 581, 584.

And the Indiana courts have stated that the distinction between tort and contract exists in the nature of things, and cannot be confounded or abolished by law. One arises by agreement, the other by wrong, and none but honest debtors are protected from imprisonment for debt; the wrongdoers and dishonest men cannot claim the exemption. Ibid.

So, Me. Stat. 1831, chap. 520, for the abolition of imprisonment of honest debtors for debt, passed in order to carry into effect the provisions of the state Constitution abolishing imprisonment for debt, does not apply to actions founded on tort, or to process on judgments for costs. Gooch v. Stephenson, 15 Me. 129.

And in New York, where there does not seem to be any express constitutional inhibition, the act abolishing imprisonment for debt does not apply to suits founded in tort, though a contract between the parties is alleged by way of inducement. Moduff v. Beddoe, 7 Hill, 578.

In Mallory v. Leach, 23 How. Pr. 507, 509, where the action was on contract, and subd. 1, § 179, N. Y. Rev. Stat., declared that no defendant could be arrested except in an action for the recovery of damages on a cause of action not arising out of contract, the court stated that inasmuch as it was a question of personal right as distinguished from the rights of property, the law must be strictly construed, and that in order to arrest under subdivision 1, the action must be in tort as distinguished from an action on contract, and that such was the plain meaning of the language employed. The action must be for the recovery of damages, a term inappropriate when applied to the principal recovery in an action for debt; but usual and appropriate when applied to actions in tort.

Where, by the laws of the state, the owner of personal property was entitled to the possession thereof, and any deprivation of such property was a tort, the object of such statute being the more effectually to quiet and protect the possession of personal property, and to prevent the taking possession thereof by fraud or violence, it was held that the defendant's imprisonment in proceedings thereunder could not in any legal sense be considered as an imprisonment for debt, within the provisions of the Georgia Constitution of 1868, which declared that there shall be no imprisonment for debt. Harris v. Bridges, 57 Ga. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 495.

And where the record showed that a wrong had been committed, and that the defendant had embezzled the property of the plaintiff, and the latter was entitled to the remedy in case of tort, but brought his suit in form ex contractu, it was held that he was still entitled to process on his judgment, in the same manner that he would be entitled in an action of tort, although the Illinois statutes provide that "no execution shall issue against the body of the defendant except when the judgment shall have been obtained for a tort committed by such defendant," the statute not saying that the plaintiff must necessarily pursue the form of an ex delicto action, in order to entitle him to an execution against the body of the defendant, if it appears on the record, and has been adjudged against him, that the real right of action was for a tort committed by the defendant. Barney v. Chapman, 21 Fed. Rep. 904.

Again, where a relator was under arrest on account of debt, and the judgment against him was founded upon a tort, it was held that the plaintiff had a right to sue out an execution against his body under § 90, chap. 59, Ill. Rev. Stat., and that he was not entitled to be discharged under chapter 52 of such Revised Statutes, but must proceed under the act of February, 1845. People v. Brennan, 14 Ill. 414.

Where the action was not brought to recover money loaned by the plaintiff to the defendant, but for the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant in respect to certain collateral securities, convictions under this act, the fine shall be paid in lawful money of the United States only, one half of which shall go to the person who made the deposit.

"Sec. 8. Be it further enacted that the payment back to the depositor of the bank notes, specie money, or other thing of value deposited, before the conviction hereunder, and the

upon the faith of which the loan was made, it was held that the action was in form ex delicto and not ex contractu, and that therefore the defendant was not entitled to a discharge from imprisonment by virtue of the Pennsylvania act of 1842 abolishing imprisonment for debt, the gravamen being in form and in fact deceit. Tryon v. Hassinger, Clark (Pa.) 184.

In Messenger v. Lockwood, 9 West. L. J. O. S. (Ohio) 521, it was stated that the provision in the Ohio Constitution prohibiting imprisonment for debt was an explicit declaration that the people had reserved to themselves the sacred boon of personal liberty, and had denied to the government all control over their persons except for the commission of crimes, and the isolated case of fraud in their business transactions, such declaration being regarded as an ample safeguard without either legislative or judicial construction admitting of no such thing by either the one or the other department of the government.

In an action in case in the nature of a conspiracy, it was held that the action was for a tort, and not for a mere breach of contract, and therefore the court committed no error in committing the defendant on a ca. sa. Kalbfus v. Rundell, 184 Pa. 102.

In Jack v. Shoemaker, 3 Binn. 280, a capias was allowed in slander, the court stating that such a writ might issue for any cause of action whatever against a freeholder who neglected to put in special bail upon notice so to do.

So in the case of a judgment for damages and costs recovered in an action of replevin in the circuit court, imprisonment on an execution does not fall within the prohibition, either of article 6, § 88, of the Michigan Constitution, or of the nonimprisonment act of 1839 (2 Comp. Laws, chap. 166), of that state. Fuller v. Bowler, 11 Mich. 204, 209.

The Constitution of Wisconsin abolished imprisonment for debt, arising on contract, and superseded the territorial statute so far as it related to actions ex contractu, but so far as it related to actions ex delicto such statute would appear to remain in force until the Revision of 1849, when such revision continued the practice in actions of tort,—and the same practice of arrest on mesne process, or at any time before judgment in actions of tort upon order of the judge of the court, is still continued by law, and therefore, under the Constitution, the judges of courts of record have power at chambers to make an order to hold to bail in proper cases, and the arrest of the prisoner for the tort with which he is charged upon the order of the judge of the county court in which he was sued for tort is therefore legal, and such order warrants his imprisonment, unless its force has been arrested or spent. Re Kindling, 39 Wis. 85, 90.

In Re Mowry, 12 Wis. 52, the applicant for mandamus sought to be discharged from imprisonment under an execution rendered against his body, upon a judgment in an action for damages for the wrongful and fraudulent misapplication and conversion of school-land certificates deposited as security, his contention being that such execution would not lie, as the judgment was a debt arising out of a contract and therefore within the inhibition imposed by § 16, art. 1, of the state Constitution, and the court held that he was not entitled to the privilege from arrest therein contained.

b. Mesne profits.

Where a judgment in ejectment had been obtained, and an action of trespass for mesne profits 34 L. R. A.

was afterwards brought upon the judgment, and a ca. sa. issued against the defendant, who applied for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that his detention was unlawful, the court remanded the relator or petitioner upon the ground that he was not exempt from imprisonment within the meaning of the Pennsylvania act of 1842, prohibiting imprisonment for debt, the action not being in contract. Com. v. Bowman, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 74.

A claim for mesne profits in an action of ejectment is not founded "upon any contract, or due upon any contract, express or implied," and the recovery is not for "any damages for the nonperformance of any contract," and therefore the defendant is subject to arrest under the exceptions contained in the Pennsylvania act of 1842 abolishing imprisonment, the action being founded upon the wrongful holding, the recovery of mesne profits arising from such wrong or trespass. Hopkinson v. Cooper, 8 Phila. 8.

In Howland v. Needham, 10 Wis. 466, the question was whether an execution could issue against the body of a defendant upon a judgment for damages for the withholding of real property, and the rents and profits, where, pursuant to § 88 of the Code of Procedure, the claim for such damages was united with the claim in an action for the recovery of such property, and the court held that such an execution was legal and not within the provisions of Wis. Const. art. 1, § 16, inasmuch as an action of ejectment was an action ex delicto, and that the wrongful receipt by the tenant in possession of the mesne profits, or the withholding of the possession from the lawful owner, was a tort for which by the common law an action of trespass might be maintained. See also Lang v. Finch, 166 Pa. 255, infra, VI. a.

c. Trespass.

In a case where a verdict was rendered in an action of trespass for damages for negligence on the part of an employer in not furnishing his employees with reasonably safe appliances for work, wherein a ca. sa. was issued upon a judgment, and it was contended that the same was illegal by reason of the Pennsylvania act of 1842, abolishing imprisonment for debt, it was held that the case did not come within the exceptions contained in the provisions of the statute, the court reversing the order of the court below setting aside the ca. sa. Romberger v. Henry, 167 Pa. 314.

Where the action was clearly ex delicto, although the statement commenced by reciting a contract, which was mere matter of inducement to show how the defendant became possessed of the property on which he afterwards committed the trespass, and such recital was wholly unnecessary, and the defendant contended that the judgment was founded upon contract, or represented judgments for non-performance of the contract, and hence came within the provisions of the Pennsylvania act of 1842 abolishing imprisonment for debt, and exempting him from arrest and imprisonment,—the court held that such was not the case, as it was the result of the trespass pure and simple, outside of the contract, and therefore a capias ad satisfaciendum would lie to enforce the judgment. Dungan v. Read, 167 Pa. 308.

And the arrest upon a ca. sa. issued pursuant to a judgment in an action brought before a justice of the peace, for trespass upon personal property upon which an execution had been issued and returned "no property found," was held not an arrest on account of a debt, the judgment being founded upon a tort which gave the plaintiff a right to sue court costs thereof, which may have accumulated, shall be a good and lawful defense to any prosecution under this act." Acts 1892-93, pp. 94, 95.

By demurrer to the indictment and motion in arrest of judgment, defendant raised the question of the constitutionality of the foregoing statute, and reserved the court's ruling, sustaining the indictment and statute, for our consideration.

1. The statute, it is insisted for the appellant, is violative of article 1, § 21, of the Constitution, which provides that no person shall be put to death or imprisoned for debt, even in cases of fraud, even though fraud was excepted out of the earlier Constitutions, and therefore no exception can be made in that state on the ground of fraud. Ex parte Hardy, 68 Ala. 303.

d. Fraud.

As a general rule fraud is excepted by most of the state Constitutions, and therefore a debtor who has been guilty thereof cannot plead the unconstitutionality of his imprisonment as a means of securing his release from arrest.

Fraud is treated both by the legislature and the convention as in its nature criminal, and it is for this reason that arrests for this cause are tolerated, but it will not be allowed that without a specification of the facts and proof of them citizens should be placed beyond the protection of the Bill of Rights, and have their bodies incarcerated, simply because some frightened or hard creditor may believe that they intend to commit a fraud. Messenger v. Lockwood, 9 West. L. J. O. S. (Ohio) 521.

Persons may be imprisoned for a wrong by them maliciously done, a tort willfully and with malice committed, where, on account of such tort, damages have been recovered by the party injured. Sawyer v. Nelson, 44 Ill. App. 184, 185.

Alabama seems to be the only state in which fraud is not made an exception, and wherein imprisonment for debt is entirely abolished.

Every intendment must, however, be in favor of the liberty of the subject, and the liberty of the subject is not to be presumed away by the theory that the district courts have jurisdiction over the subject of fraud, nor is it to be presumed when its process issues that it has been issued in a proper case, for if such a rule of presumption were adopted there would not be a single case in which a party might not be arrested and imprisoned on final process, although fraud never entered into the elements of the original suit or controversy. Matoon v. Eder, 6 Cal. 57, 60.

In construing the provisions of the Constitution of California the court stated that fraud is a fact which must be proved, and the party undertook to do so when he issued out his process; it gave character to his judgment and determined his rights, and he should substantiate it. Ibid.

So, as a writ of arrest is only an intermediate remedy or process to secure the presence of a party until final judgment, the facts on which it is based must be affirmatively found, and the fraud stated in the judgment, in order to authorize an arrest on final process, and where this is not done no ca. sa. can properly issue against a judgment debtor. Ibid.

And this is so for the reason that the writ issues in the language of the statute in the "enforcement" of the "judgment." Davis v. Robinson, 10 Cal. 411, 412.

Where the case raised a strong presumption of fraud on the part of the debtor, in that he had conveyed large amounts of real and personal property to persons for the purpose of cheating and defrauding his creditors, it was held to be a sufficient case to justify his imprisonment under the Illinois Constitution. Re Salisbury, 16 Ill. 350, 352.

And it has been stated that fraud in contracting a debt in the ordinary nature of things means some fraudulent conduct at the time of the contract whereby the other party was deceived. Van Kirk v. Staats, 24 N. J. L. 121, wherein it was sought to imprison a debtor for debt, the plaintiff alleging fraud.

Alabama.

The Alabama Constitutions of 1868, 1875, entirely 34 L. R. A.

did away with imprisonment for debt, even in cases of fraud, even though fraud was excepted out of the earlier Constitutions, and therefore no exception can be made in that state on the ground of fraud. Ex parte Hardy, 68 Ala. 303.

Arkansas.

There does not seem to be any direct inhibition against imprisonment for debt in the Arkansas Constitution of 1836, but it has been held that the effect of the Arkansas act of February 2, 1843, abolishing imprisonment in civil cases, was not to enlarge the instances in which a capias or ca. sa. might issue, but to make all the statutes then in force authorizing arrest and imprisonment for debt inoperative, except in cases of fraud on the part of the debtor, alleged by the plaintiff and sustained by the affidavits prescribed by the act. Hatheway v. Jones, 20 Ark. 109, 111.

By the Constitution of that state of the year 1868, however, imprisonment for debt was abolished except in cases of fraud.

In Ruddell v. Childress, 81 Ark. 511, proceedings were taken by a surety against his principal under § 5694 of Gantt's Digest, which provides that a surety may maintain an action against his principal to obtain indemnity against the debt or liability for which he is bound before it is due, whenever any of the grounds exist upon which by the provisions of chapters 8 and 9 an order may be made for arrest and bail or for attachment; and it was held that such proceedings were not contrary to the provisions contained in § 14, art. 1, of the Constitution of that state of 1868, which prohibits imprisonment for debt, but provides that the general assembly may provide for imprisonment or holding to bail persons charged with fraud in contracting said debt, the court stating that such a case was not the arrest of a debtor for debt, but was a proceeding to indemnify the surety in the manner pointed out by the section.

By the Constitution of that state of 1874, art. 2, § 16, imprisonment for debt is abolished except in cases of fraud.

California.

As the Constitution of the state of California does not prohibit, but by implication authorizes, imprisonment for fraud, execution may be ordered against the person of the defendant who is adjudged guilty of fraud, as where the defendant has fraudulently purchased goods. Stewart v. Levy, 26 Cal. 159, 167.

And in Re Vinich, 86 Cal. 70, where an order of arrest was issued in a civil action by a justice of the peace, and it was conceded that the action was for the recovery of moneys claimed to be due upon an open account, it was held that, under art. 1, § 15, of the California Constitution, which prohibits imprisonment in any civil action, on mesne or final process, unless in case of fraud, before the defendant could be subjected to such imprisonment fraud must be shown to exist.

Connecticut.

The Connecticut Constitution, art. 1, § 10, provides: "No person shall be arrested, detained or punished except in cases clearly warranted by law."

The statutes of that state abolishing imprisonment in all actions for debt arising upon contract express or implied, except in cases of fraud and fraudulent dealings as therein specified, have defined the cases wherein such imprisonment is warranted, and therefore, in cases falling within the stitution of the state, which provides "that no person shall be imprisoned for debt." It is to be observed in the outset that this provision of the organic law is essentially different from the provisions on this subject in many other state Constitutions, in that it contains no exception of "cases of fraud;" and, on the same line, is essentially different from the Constitutions of this state of 1819, 1831, and 1865, in each of which the language is that "the person of a debtor, where there is not strong presumption of fraud, shall not be detained in exceptions named therein, imprisonment is justifiable, and not in violation of the Constitution.

It has been stated in construing the Connecticut statute relating to this subject that the gist of all actions is either ex contractu or ex delicto, that is, they sound either in tort or contract, and the statute is not intended to abolish the distinction; and that under the statute the mere inability to pay debts is no longer to be treated as deserving of imprisonment, such remedy for the collection of debts being too harsh, the legislature in very positive language abolishing it by the introductory clause of the statute, but all other causes of action enumerated under the proviso were left to be enforced as before, and remedies by action on the case for fraud were provided for even beyond former limits, so that all tortfeasors and fraudulent debtors should be discouraged and checked by danger of imprisonment. Armstrong v. Ayres, 19 Conn. 540, 545.

Where in an action on the case it was alleged that the defendant, indebted upon certain notes, had fraudulently conveyed away and concealed his property so as to avoid legal process, and had made false and fraudulent representations in obtaining the goods on credit and in giving the notes therefor, it was held that such action was in tort for the fraud committed, and within the proviso to the Connecticut statute of 1842 abolishing imprisonment for debt, under which the defendant might be lawfully arrested and held to bail. Ibid.

And this is so for the reason that it was not intended to abolish such imprisonment in respect to that dishonest class of debtors who were guilty of fraud in contracting their debts, or who concealed or conveyed away their property so that it could not be reached by the ordinary process of attachment. Cowles v. Day, 30 Conn. 403, 412.

The creditor is entitled to the benefit of the remedy in an action on the case, in which both the debt and the fraudulent act or acts, which, by the statute were to deprive the fraudulent debtor of the benefit of the act abolishing imprisonment for debt, were to be set forth and proved, in order to secure the benefit of an execution against the body as well as the property of the debtor, the fraud irrespective of the debt not being an injury to anyone pecuniarily; but accompanied by the debt it is an injury, since it deprives the party of the means of obtaining payment by an attachment of the property secreted or removed. The object of the Connecticut Statute of 1854 was to continue the remedy provided by the act of 1842 against fraudulent debtors. Ibid.

And it has been held that the statute regulating the levy and executions and warrants was made pursuant to a fundamental principle of the law, that personal liberty should not be unnecessarily restrained, but if a debtor, for whose benefit the rule exists, neglects to offer property or refuses to turn out when demanded, declaring that the proceedings are illegal, he waives the privilege the law gives him, and the officer is excusable if he levies on the body. Allen v. Gleason, 4 Day, 378, 382.

And in this connection it is the undoubted object of the law, in prevention of fraud, to render the imprisonment of such debtors as are able available to the collection of their debts; the Connecticut statute giving authority to the court, at their discretion, on notifying the parties concerned, and on due inquiry, to order the close confinement of prisoners committed on execution. Frisbie v. Fowler, 3 Conn. 87, 89.

Georgia.

In the case of Harris v. Bridges, 57 Ga. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 495, the court stated that "If one man obtains the possession of the personal property of another by fraud or violence, or having possession of it, and there is reason to apprehend that it will be eloiigned or moved away, or will not be forthcoming to answer the judgment that may be made in the case, there would seem to be no good reason why he should not be proceeded against, and be required to comply with the terms of the statute made and provided for such cases; and if the defendant should be imprisoned in accordance with the terms of the statute, on his failure to comply therewith, he cannot be said to have been imprisoned for debt," within the meaning of the provisions of the Georgia Constitution.
